them, now to stack their arms and surrender themselves without condition to their prisoners? That will be the state of affairs if the present reconstruction policy of the Administration succeeds. If in our work of reconstruction we do not secure the rights of loyal men who were our friends and allies in the late rebel States, we shall come short of our duty and be guilty of a blunder which, in such an hour as this, is worse than a crime. Sir, I want the loyal men of the nation, who saved it in its hour of peril, not only to administer the national and State governments, South as well as North, but to say who shall vote for their law-makers in those States consecrated by the blood of half a million men.

Our friends are mistaken, honestly mistaken I grant you, but nevertheless mistaken, when they say there are no loyal men in the South. Sir, I know the South better than that, and I stand here to say that I do not believe at the time the ordinances were passed in the eleven rebel States that more than two States—South Carolina and Mississippi—and possibly not more than one would have voted by ballot at any fairly conducted election for secession and rebellion. I grant that after the rebellion was inaugurated a majority were carried into it, and that a majority in all those States, unless it be in Tennessee and Arkansas, and perhaps even these are hostile at the present time to this Government. But there are large numbers of men in those States who are loyal to the Government, and I desire to strengthen their hands by giving the black man the ballot. In that way only can we strengthen these men and preserve the local State governments. The unfortunate reconstruction "experiment" of the Administration has put the loyal men, black and white, under the foot of the traitor in nearly all the late rebel States, and they are powerless and compelled to submit, because the Government has bound them hand and foot and turned them over to the tender mercies of their enemies and ours. Sir, it is the cause of the loyal white and black men of the South which I plead; it is their cause which this Congress is fighting. What I demand, and what this Congress demands, is that the loyal men of the South shall administer their local and State governments of the South; that none shall hold the offices, national and State, but loyal men. We have the right to demand this.

Sir, if we would have loyal Representatives here, we must first secure a loyal constituency at their backs. It is idle to talk of loyal Representatives and disloyal constituents. It is not worth while to deceive ourselves on this point, or attempt to deceive others. The solution of this great question of restoration is the work of statesmen, not of demagogues. All over the land demagogues are clamorous, and denounce Congress because they do not at once declare the late rebel States restored to all their constitutional relations to the national Government and at once admit their disloyal Representatives, who have the unblushing hardihood to approach and demand admission to this temple. Everywhere demagogues and traitors unite in denouncing the Congress of the United States because they have given six months to the consideration of this new and difficult problem of reorganizing constitutional State governments in eleven rebel States. Why, sir, we have spent six months on the tax bill, a subject with which we are familiar, and which has been in the hands of one of the ablest and most experienced committees of this House, yet with all the aid of the Treasury Department and the special commission authorized by the last Congress we could not get through with the tax bill until last evening. This question of taxation is an old and familiar one, and if we commit a blunder time will develop it and legislation can correct it. But this question of reconstruction is a new and perplexing question; a question which ought to command the best ability of the nation, because we are to walk in new and unknown paths, paths which have never been illuminated by the foot-print of the statesmen who have preceded us. If we commit a blunder it may be fatal, at least for a generation. This Congress is honestly laboring to secure an early restoration of these States, and while I do not believe the propositions reported by the committee are all the loyal men of the South had the right to expect and to demand at our hands, I shall vote for them if I can get nothing better.

But it is said that there are no loyal men in the South; that all were swept into this rebellion, and we are coolly and refreshingly told that the oath must be modified in order that rebels may be appointed to office. Sir, this claim that there are no loyal men in the South is a fallacy. I have lived in the South for years, and I know that there is not a State in which loyal men cannot be found to fill all the offices of the State and national Government. If they have not, then I would import them. I would do as I advised Mr. Lincoln to do in 1861, when he had up the question of appointing a postmaster at Louisville. He happened one morning when I was in his room, when the case was up, to do me the honor to ask me what I would do. There was a loyal man who had been always faithful to our ideas an applicant for the place, and also a new convert. I said, "If I had the appointing power, and there were but one man in the State who had voted for me or voted to maintain our ideas, I would appoint him to the best office in the State in the gift of the Executive, and if he could not write his name I would appoint and pay a clerk out of the secret service fund to sign his name for him." You need not talk to me about there not being loyal men enough in the South to discharge the duties of all the offices there. It is a fallacy. Many honest men of my own personal acquaintance went into the rebellion believing it to be right; and before the close of the war and since the close of the war, have come out of it just as honest, and are satisfied that it was wrong.

Sir, I do not believe, with all the political heresy which has been taught at the South for the past thirty years, with all the political iniquity which has been taught in the name of religion and in the name of Christ in the South by men professing to teach the Gospel; I do not believe that all this, with the war and all the terrible consequences which have followed in its train, has been enough to obliterate from the South an entire love for the old flag and the old Union.

I know that there are men in the South everywhere capable of filling all the offices. My judgment has been strengthened on this point by many letters which I have received during the war and since the war. A private soldier in the Union Army wrote me a letter after Sherman had passed through Georgia, in which the following beautiful and touching incident was related. At one of our military posts where thousands came to receive rations from the Government which they were madly fighting to destroy, there came one morning a tall, elderly lady of commanding appearance, and of evident culture and refinement, asking for bread. When it was handed to her by a brave boy in blue who stood proudly beneath the stars and stripes, she betrayed emotions which she could not suppress, and the tears stole down her cheeks as she said, "Little did I think three years ago, when decking my three sons for the war, that I would ever come to this; then I had husband, sons, home, and all that heart could wish; now I am homeless, childless, a widow, and a beggar, asking alms of the Government which we have sought to destroy. But it is all right. It is the punishment meted out by Providence for our sins, and I submit."

Sir, there are thousands of just such mothers as this in every State in the South to-day, and there is not a loyal man or woman in this nation who would not do all in their power to alleviate their wants and bind up their bleeding and broken hearts.

There is another beautiful incident which I must not omit. Last summer, when the convention met in North Carolina, in response to the President's proclamation to reorganize a constitutional State government, Mr. Reade, the president of that convention, on taking the chair, uttered words which thrilled the continent. I have no language to tell you, Mr. Speaker, how they touched my heart as I read them on the shores of the Pacific. I know that every loyal man in this nation called down benedictions on his head. These are his golden words:

"Fellow-citizens, we are going home. Let painful recollections upon our late separation and pleasant memories of our early union quicken our footsteps toward the old mansion, that we may grasp hard again the hands of friendship, which stand at the door; and, sheltered by the old homestead which was built upon a rock, and has weathered the storm, enjoy together the long, bright future which awaits us."

Sir, every loyal Representative in this Hall stands ready with open hand to-day to welcome all who thus speak from the heart; and, sir, whatever of local interest or of prejudice or of passion may have carried an erring brother into this rebellion if he but set his face toward the old homestead, uttering such brave words as these, I will run to meet him afar off, and for him the fatted calf shall be slain. But I do not propose to start out laden down with pardons and with the fatted calf smoking hot from the oven and hunt up and thrust both pardons and feast upon unrepentant, malignant, and defiant rebels. Nor do I propose to stand before them, hat in hand, and ask them on what terms they propose to return to the old mansion. Sir, every rebel shall resume his citizenship upon the terms and conditions prescribed by the loyal men of this nation, or, so far as I am concerned, he shall remain an alien forever.

Mr. Speaker, to me the only vital and living question growing out of this subject of reconstruction is whether the loyal men of the South, whether all citizens of the United States residing in the South, shall have the right of the ballot. And when I say all loyal citizens I mean all, black as well as white. I hold that every man born in the United States is a citizen of the United States, and that every citizen, native-born or naturalized, has the right to a voice in the Government under which he lives. It is a natural right, a divine right if you will, a right of which the Government cannot justly deprive any citizen except as a punishment for crime. Sir, every American citizen of the age of twenty-one years, not convicted of an infamous offense, has the right to vote for or against those who are to make and administer the laws under which he lives. That is the high prerogative of every American citizen. Anything short of that is but a mockery.

I want this Congress, before it shall adjourn, to insist that every man who has been loyal to the Government in the South, whatever his race or color, shall have the right to the ballot. We now have the golden opportunity. If you do not guaranty these precious rights of the citizen now you leave the great work before us unfinished; and I warn you that agitation will follow your refusal to enact justice, and that there shall be no repose until every citizen of the Republic is enfranchised and stands equal before the law. Shall we falter, Mr. Speaker, in this sublime hour of victory which God has given us, or shall we finish the work which He has committed to our hands by securing the complete enfranchisement of all citizens of the United States?

The voice of every friend of this country in Europe, as it comes to us across the sea, cries out to us to enfranchise the men who in the late struggle were our friends and our allies. From Switzerland, the grand republic of the Old World, there come to us words of counsel and wisdom which we ought not to disregard. From every land beneath the sun, where liberty is loved and human hearts have been touched by our heroic struggle, there comes to us a plea that in reconstructing this Government we shall first of all see to it that justice is the basis upon which we build.

And better than all this, from the loyal men of the South, both white and black, there comes up to us the prayer that we will see to it that they have justice; that we will not falsify the pledges which the nation has made. Sir, do gentlemen expect that we can make the pledges we have made, and then turn these people over to the tender mercies of their enemies and ours without calling down upon us the execrations and denunciations of all right-thinking men? If they do, they are mistaken. Shall we hear and answer these words of counsel and wisdom and the prayer of our friends and allies, or shall we turn for counsel and advice to our late enemies?

We are as a nation either to go forward in the great work of progress or go backward; we cannot stand still. And I am desirous to know whether this Congress is going to attempt the work of staying the great anti-slavery revolution which has swept over the country and obliterated all the pro-slavery landmarks erected by parties and by men. Sir, I have faith to believe that neither President nor Cabinet nor Congress can long stay with their puny efforts the grand decree of the nation. He who attempts it, be he President, Cabinet minister, or statesman, will fall before its advancing power, and his political grave will be marked by the skeletons of those who for the past quarter of a century, having betrayed liberty, were wrecked along the political coast and to-day lie unburied and unhonored because there were none so base as to do them reverence.

Sir, I know that our hour of triumph may be delayed; but I have faith to believe that we cannot be defeated. Let the ballot be placed in the hands of every loyal man in the South, and this nation is safe—safe from rebellion, safe from repudiation, safe from a war of races, safe from the domination of traitors in its councils. Sir, without the ballot in the hands of every loyal man the nation is not safe. The ballot is the only sure weapon of protection and defense for the poor man, whether white or black. It is the sword and buckler and shield before which all oppressions, aristocracies, and special privileges bow. Sir, Mr. Lincoln, in a letter written to Governor Hahn, of Louisiana, pleading for the right of the black man to vote, said most beautifully and, as I believe, prophetically that "in some trying time the vote of the black man may serve to keep the jewel of liberty in the family of freedom."

I believe this most fully; and believing it, I would be false to myself and false to my country if I did not demand it. If I were a black man, with the chains just stricken from my limbs, without a home to shelter me or mine, and you should offer me the ballot, or a cabin and forty acres of cotton land, I would take the ballot, conscious that, with the ballot in my hand, rightly used, all else should be added unto me.

Sir, I would like to know whether there is one professedly loyal man in this nation who would rather confer the ballot upon a traitor to his country than upon a loyal black man who has fought to save the Republic. I should like to hear such a man speak out here or elsewhere. Sir, however much brazen-faced impudence there is in every public assembly, there is no man in this House so bold or so bad as to make such a declaration.

Mr. LE BLOND. With my colleague's permission, I wish to ask him a question. I infer from his remarks that he is in favor of negro suffrage. I wish to know whether he is in favor of negro suffrage in the States.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Everywhere.

Mr. LE BLOND. In the State of Ohio?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Everywhere.

Mr. LE BLOND. Then I wish to ask the gentleman another question: does he claim that Congress has the power to confer the right of suffrage upon negroes in the States?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Well, sir, I do not intend to put myself on record against the right of Congress to do that. I am not prepared now to argue the point with my colleague; but I will say to him that when the time comes for the American Congress to take action on the question, I will be ready to speak. I will not say now whether I would vote for or against such a proposition.

Mr. LE BLOND. I wish to ask my colleague one more question: is he in favor of the report of the reconstruction committee?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Well, sir, I am voting for it.

Mr. LE BLOND. Is my colleague in favor of keeping the States out until the conditions prescribed in that report are complied with?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. If my colleague had listened to my remarks and to the amendment which I presented, he would not have felt called upon to interrupt me to put this inquiry.

Mr. LE BLOND. I would like to inquire why the gentleman yields the question of suffrage, as he does, in supporting the proposition of the committee.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Because I cannot get it. [Laughter.] Is not that a fair answer?

Mr. LE BLOND. That is honest.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Now, sir, let us look at this question for a moment from the stand-point of the black man. And he who will not look at this question from the stand-point of the black man is unfit to sit in judgment on this question. Let me ask gentlemen on the other side, with whom I always deal fairly, suppose your ancestors had been in bondage for two hundred years, and that this nation—this nation of hypocrites and liars for more than eighty years—had enslaved and degraded you as no people were ever degraded before—making merchandise of your entire race, while professing Christianity and a love for liberty. I say suppose this to have been your condition when this war began—a war inaugurated on the part of your masters to establish a government which should perpetuate your bondage—and after becoming satisfied that we could not conquer your masters without your aid, we had invited you in the hour of the nation's agony to join our army and help put down the rebellion, promising you your freedom, and that you had come two hundred thousand strong, and had stayed, if you did not turn, the tide of battle, thereby giving us the victory. I say suppose this to be the case, and after the rebellion had been crushed and your masters were put down by your aid, we had coolly and unblushingly turned you over to the control of local State governments administered by your late masters. I ask, what kind of justice would you call that?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to inquire—

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. If you will answer that I will yield the floor.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Was that so from the beginning?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. It was so with me. I do not know what issue the gentleman had. So far as his votes indicated, his position was on the other side.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Was that the position of Mr. Lincoln and those who supported him from the beginning of the war?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I do not think it was at the beginning.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Was it at the end of the war?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that my colleague's time be extended.

Mr. LE BLOND. He is entitled to credit, and deserves extension. [Laughter.]

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I want my friend from Ohio, or any one on that side of the House, to tell me, if after having fought to save the nation under the promise of freedom and the protection of his life and property, what would be his feelings toward those who committed the great crime of turning him over to the control of his enemies and ours? What would you say of such a Government? What would you say of the honor of its rulers? Sir, I know not what other men would say, but if I were a black man I would not submit. I would rather be the slave of one man who had a pecuniary interest in my health and life than to be the slave of a State whose government was controlled by my late masters. It is a terrible thing to be the slave of a State whose government is administered in the spirit of caste. Sir, if the members of this House could witness what I have often seen, free men made the slave of the State, they would know how intolerable is such a condition, and would not sleep soundly if by their vote they permitted four million people, who were our allies and friends in this late war, to become the slaves of a State whose government was in the hands of rebels.

Mr. HIGBY. They have reenacted the same laws.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. These laws have been reenacted in some of the so-called reconstructed States, as my friend from California remarks. Sir, I repeat, if this great injustice was done me I would not submit; and I tell you that these four million people, soon to increase to ten millions, will not submit to such monstrous legislation. If I were a black man I would rather go into rebellion and revolution than submit to such an intolerable wrong. I would take my children and go daily with them to the altar and swear eternal hostility to those who thus betrayed me. I would consecrate all the powers of mind and strength which I possessed to brand those with infamy who had been so false to my people, and to put them into history along with those who, in every generation, have disgraced the world as the betrayers of mankind and enemies of the human race.

Sir, nothing can give such security to the poor man as the ballot. The prejudice of caste is strong, but the ballot will soon banish its baneful spirit. If in the days of Know-Nothingism the Irishman had not had the protection which the ballot alone could give him his condition would have been intolerable. How much more intolerable the condition of the black man without the ballot when completely under the dominion of his late slave-master!

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Let me ask a question.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Not now. When Richmond fell, when Lee surrendered, when the last rebel army surrendered, and the bells all over the North were ringing out their peals of joy, who were the men that stood up first in this Union and asked for mercy to a fallen foe? The men who had a right to speak, Garrison, Phillips, Beecher, Greeley, Bryant, and Gerrit Smith—the men of heart, of intellect, and of soul. While they demanded justice for black men and the loyal men of the South, they plead also for mercy to a fallen foe.

When I came here last spring to see the President he was talking about making treason odious, and declaring that traitors should take a back seat. I was more anxious to secure justice to our friends and allies than to execute vengeance on our enemies. All we asked then and all we ask now is justice—justice to our friends and mercy to a fallen foe. All we ask now for white men and black men in the South and in the North is justice; and I tell you, that by the blessing of God, we intend to have it. Be not deceived. You cannot always postpone the demands of justice. As a nation we have learned by sad experience that we cannot trample upon it with impunity. Neither laws nor customs nor despotism can silence its claim, because it is a principle implanted by the Creator in every human heart, and can never be wholly eradicated by the selfishness or tyranny of man. He who understands the simple teachings of the golden rule comprehends the application of justice alike by Governments and men.

It needs no learning or superior wisdom to interpret it. The ignorant black, so recently a slave, and the most scholarly white alike understand it. Justice demands liberty and equality before the law for all. It speaks in the heart of every man, wherever born, with an inspiration like unto that which spoke on the day of Pentecost with tongues of fire. Woe to the statesman or party or nation which tramples on this principle! Its complete recognition by our Government will bring us national grandeur and national glory, and secure unity, peace, prosperity, power. Its rejection will tarnish the fair fame of our country, and bring discord, dissension, adversity, war.

Let the corner-stone of each reconstructed State be justice and the cap-stone will be liberty. With liberty and justice as the fundamental law of our national and State governments there can be no war of races, no secession, no rebellion. It is injustice and oppression which bring dissension and war. The opposite will bring harmony and peace. He who votes injustice to-day will be held accountable by the people now, and in the great tribunal of human history will be justly chargeable with all the oppression, wrongs, and wars which must follow the enactment of injustice into law. The law-maker who demands nothing for himself which he will not concede to the humblest citizen is the only true statesman. Make the community of interests one by guarantying the equal rights of all men before the law, and the fidelity of every inhabitant of such a commonwealth becomes a necessity not only from interest but from a love of justice.

Sir, this Congress is writing a new chapter in American history. Let every man whose great privilege it is to record his name where it will stand forever, so record it as to secure the triumph of justice, and his name and memory shall have a life coequal with the Republic.

Sir, he who has comprehended the logic of the terrible conflict through which we have passed and studied with profit the lessons which it has taught, will have learned the point at which in our great march as a nation we have reached, and know something of the course which in the future it will travel.

Animated for many years by conflicting, sectional, hostile forces, I have lived to see since my entrance into Congress these antagonistic views so modified and melted into one that to-day the condition is accepted by all patriotic, right-thinking men, and the historian without confusion can make up the record. If this war has taught us any one lesson more clearly than another, it is that we are inseparably one people, that this continent can never again become the abode of human slavery, and that in all our future deliberations in these Halls old antagonisms will cease to divide us, and our hopes and aspirations become one, because our interests are one.

Let this measure, or those which the Senate may perfect, pass and go into the Constitution of the country; let the propositions before us become the law of the land, and you will have done something toward securing the triumph of justice. Pass these acts, and justice as a flaming sword will stand at the doors of the nation's council halls to guard its sanctuary from the presence of traitors. Pass them, and he who approaches this temple of liberty shall pause at the threshold before entering and swear eternal fidelity to the Republic.

Let these propositions pass and the proposed amendment of the Constitution become part of our fundamental law, and a generation shall not pass away before witnessing the complete enfranchisement of every freeman and the entire abolition of all class legislation.

In this faith and with this hope, believing that Providence in the future as in the past will overrule all for our good and supply where we have failed, I am prepared to give my voice and my vote for whatever measure a majority of the loyal members of the American Congress may adopt for the restoration of the States lately in rebellion.

Mr. LATHAM obtained the floor.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask now to have the question answered which I put to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASLEY,] namely, what does he mean by a loyal man? I doubt very much whether he can answer it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. LATHAM] has the floor.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope the gentleman from West Virginia will allow the gentleman from Ohio to answer the question. I understood him to say he would answer it when he got through.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has resumed his seat.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think he waited to answer the question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LATHAM. Mr. Speaker, we seem to have fallen upon an age of theories. We are told from day to day with much seeming sincerity and an air of the most profound political sagacity that the Union when restored must be restored upon a basis which will make it as permanent as the everlasting hills and as invulnerable as the throne of the Eternal, and with such safeguards that even treason will no longer be possible within its jurisdiction. I need not refer to particulars or quote authorities or precedents upon this point to show that I state the case fairly. To attempt to do so would be but to recite a hundred speeches made upon this floor during the present session, and the daily editorials of a thousand newspapers, made and published throughout the length and breadth of the land during the same period, and would be only an insipid reiteration of what everybody knows. The people have heard so much upon this subject; they have heard such declarations so often and so confidently made, and by those whom they have confidence will do what they themselves say ought to be done and must be done, that those of them who really love their country and are devoted to their Government are almost ready to believe that the long-looked for millennium will be ushered in with the reconstruction of the Union.

The only question with them is, how is it to be done? The nation has been in labor upon this subject for six months, until recently relieved by the delivery of the congressional committee on reconstruction. All now, except a few copperheads and their sympathizers in the country, throw up their hats and exclaim, "It is done! Eureka!" Now, sir, my mind is not so constituted and has not been so educated as to enable me to weave fine-spun theories or to comprehend the metaphysical affinity between principles which seem to have no connection with each other; and it is for the purpose of stating as briefly and candidly as possible the difficulties under which I am laboring with reference to the series of measures now under consideration, with a view to having those difficulties removed by the Gamaliels of the House, at whose feet I so willingly sit, that I have sought this opportunity of addressing you. And as I desire to be as brief as possible, I will enter at once upon a statement of my case.

With reference to the disqualifying bill reported by the committee, but which is not now under immediate consideration, I have no difficulty; and you may extend the disqualification of the enemies of my country to any extent you please without doing any violence to my feelings. All I ask with reference to this bill is an opportunity to vote upon it. I confess, however, that I do not see that the bill adds anything to the disqualifications which now exist, or disqualifies any one who is not disqualified by existing laws. No one who ever gave voluntary aid to the rebellion is now permitted to qualify in any position of trust under the Federal Government without taking the test oath; and of course no one would be permitted to take the test oath and enter upon the discharge of official duties under the Government if it was known at the time that he was committing perjury.

Further, should it be objected that the test oath may be decided unconstitutional or that it may be repealed by a majority vote, I reply that the test oath and this bill stand constitutionally upon exactly similar foundations. But I pass to the consideration of the measure under immediate consideration.

Now, sir, the prominent idea with me, and with gentlemen who advocate this measure, is to restore the Union upon a basis which will secure the future peace of the country. This idea is inseparably connected in my mind with whatever is denominated a plan of reconstruction or restoration. Now, I propose to examine the provisions of this bill and test them severally and as a whole by this rule. This bill recites an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as having been submitted by Congress to the several States for their final action, and provides, in substance at least, that the ratification of this amendment shall be a condition precedent to the right of representation in the eleven States lately constituting the so-called confederate States of America. This amendment contains four distinct propositions.

The first provides that no State shall make any discrimination in civil rights of citizens of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery. If the term "civil rights" be construed not to include what is properly understood as "political rights," I think this provision just within itself, and that it probably includes nothing more than the Constitution originally intended to include. But, sir, we are not called upon to consider this proposition as connected with this bill on its individual merits. That was done when it was under consideration by this House as a constitutional amendment. We are now called upon to consider its bearing upon reconstruction—how, under its operation, rebellion and treason will be rendered impossible, or the Government will be made stronger to resist and overcome them. This, sir, is the point which is beyond my comprehension, and upon which I desire information.

In what way would constitutional equality of "civil rights" prevent the manufacturers of Massachusetts, the distillers of Pennsylvania or elsewhere, or the cotton-growers of the South from resisting forcibly the execution of unjust and oppressive laws, or from attempting to establish an independent government, if in their opinion such government would be more conducive to their best interests than the Federal Government? In a word, what additional security for future peace would be given by this provision, or what additional power would it give to the Government to crush rebellion or punish treason? Besides, sir, the "civil rights bill," which is now a law, and is enforced in Tennessee by Tennessee State officers, covers exactly the same ground as this amendment; and yet the Congress which passed this bill refuses to recognize the right of representation in a State which enforces it by its own officers, until the Constitution can be amended in a particular which when accomplished will give to Congress no power which it has not exercised without the amendment.

The second proposition in this bill is to base representation upon suffrage instead of aggregate numbers, as at present. I confess I am more doubtful of the merits of this as a distinct proposition than of the other. Taxation and representation are principles the separation of which has never before been attempted or for a moment countenanced by the American people. Their attempted separation by the British Parliament precipitated the American Revolution, and their union was the one principle upon which our forefathers were united throughout the bloodiest conflicts and darkest hours of that ever-memorable struggle. It is the principle which was submitted to "wager of battle," vindicated by the sword, and baptized with the best of patriots' blood. Shall we now abandon it on the plea of party expediency only, and for an experiment which has so far been discarded by the wisdom of the world? Suffrage has never in the history of the world been made the basis of representation, at least by any Government which does not itself prescribe the qualifications of electors. And, for one, I should hesitate before throwing what I believe would prove so corrupting an influence upon the political morals of the country. I am willing, however, that this proposition too should go to the people for their consideration as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

This proposition, however, and the first of which I have spoken, are not of the issues which were involved in and decided by the late war. They were as germane, as fundamental principles upon which to erect our political fabric when the Constitution was framed, and at any time prior to the war, as now. If they are right in our form of government now, they were right then; if they were wrong then, they are wrong now; and there is, in my humble opinion, no propriety in attempting to connect them with the question of the restoration of the Union. How would this provision, if incorporated into the Constitution, deprive the people of any portion of the country of the power to rebel against it, or give to the Government any power to crush such rebellion which it does not now possess? The history of the world does not prove that depriving any portion of the people of political rights or of political power ever made them better citizens or more loyal subjects.

With reference to the third or disfranchising proposition, I have only to say that I regard it as wholly impracticable, and as calculated, if not intended, to defeat the whole plan for the restoration of the States lately overrun by the rebellion until after the next presidential election. Its effect, whatever its purpose may be, is purely partisan, because in the nature of things it can never be ratified, and its ratification is made a condition-precedent to restoration. On this account only I voted against the entire proposition as a constitutional amendment.

I am in favor of restoration, and this proposition is opposed to it. That is the simple issue. Gentlemen pretend, and the country, credulous and not given to thorough investigation, but disposed to take things as they appear on their face, believe that this House has voted, by voting for this proposition, to disfranchise rebels. The issue is deceptive, is false. Those occupying the position to which the responsibility attaches have voted to shift that responsibility by submitting the question of disfranchisement to the rebels themselves. Sir, what would you think of the judge, who, upon the trial of a prisoner for murder, when the jury brought in their verdict of "guilty," should say to the criminal, "You are convicted by the evidence; the finding of the jury is 'guilty'; the penalty of the law is that you hang by the neck until you are dead; you deserve to hang, but I propose to submit the question of hanging to yourself?" This House, sir, has done as much.

If the committee on reconstruction found, upon this six months' investigation, that the governments of the "States lately constituting the so-called confederate States of America" are in the hands of or controlled by the enemies of the United States, why did they not say so, and bring in a bill providing for wresting those State governments from the hands of our enemies, and placing them in the hands of our friends, that we might act upon something practical, and that the country might understand what we meant? The committee was organized with instructions to inquire into the condition of those States, and to report the result of such inquiry to Congress. If this is all they intend to report, they have not discharged the duty which was imposed upon them.

My impression is that the troubles by which we find the subject of reconstruction now surrounded do not of necessity result from the appointment of a committee or from the investigation. Ordinarily the report of the President, the sworn executive officer of the Government, should be conclusive upon questions involving the harmonious relations of the several parts of the Union, the execution of and obedience to the law; but I do not regard such report as necessarily conclusive, and consequently the appointment of a committee with the instructions given this one was not, in my opinion, unwise. The present weakly, sickly, puny condition of the child is not the necessary consequence of having given it out to nurse, but of giving it to those who cared not for its life.

Upon the merits of the fourth as a distinct proposition I presume we are all agreed, but how its adoption is to prevent another rebellion is the point upon which I desire information.

I now ask indulgence for a few moments while I explain as briefly as possible the difficulties which stand in the way of my support to this bill as a whole. Before, however, entering directly upon this discussion I will just here remark that I do not comprehend how or why the reconstruction or restoration of the States lately overrun by the rebellion involves the necessity of reconstructing the Constitution and Government of the United States. Was the Government of the United States overthrown, or were any of its parts or functions destroyed by the rebellion? If not, where or why the necessity of its reconstruction? Did the rebellion expose imperfection or weakness in any of its parts? Or did we, during its existence, feel the need of the exercise of any power which we did not at the same time feel we had the right to exercise? Did we experience during the rebellion that any change in the Constitution, or even in the form of our Government, could make us stronger than we were?

Sir, we had the right to use, and did use, all the means which God and nature had given us to preserve the life of the Republic. More men and more money were the only agencies which could have given us additional strength, and constitutional amendments could not supply these demands. Sir, even the success of the rebellion would have proved nothing against the wisdom of the provisions of our Constitution, the success of republican institutions, or the strength and permanence of our form of government which it would not have proved equally against that system called the laws of nations, and which we are informed supplanted the Constitution during the war. Much less does the mere fact of rebellion prove anything against either, for all the systems of which we have any information, from the most arbitrary and unjust on earth to that which was established by eternal wisdom for the government of angels in heaven, have been assailed by organized rebellion.

"Irreversible guarantees against rebellion" are a myth, a farce, a deception—mere claptrap, coined for party purposes—the device of demagoguery, and not the dictate of statesmanship. Security against rebellion is in the administration rather than in the form of government. Place all political power securely in the hands of its friends, and then make it, by the manner of its administration, what the Almighty intended civil government to be—"a terror to evil-doers, and a praise to them that do well"—by making the punishment of crime and the reward of virtue swift and certain, and you have the guarantees, and all the guarantees, against the renewal of the conflict here that the Almighty has in heaven against its renewal there.

There are two principles involved in the provisions of this bill which I desire to notice. First, that the approval of three fourths of the States now represented in Congress is sufficient to ratify the constitutional amendment. And second, that the ratification of the constitutional amendment recited in this bill shall be a condition-precedent to the right of representation in the States now unrepresented in Congress. These principles are necessarily based upon the presumption that these are not now States of the American Union. If this presumption be true, I ask gentlemen when and by what act they ceased to be States? Was it by the act of rebellion? That I admit was the design of the rebellion; but the rebellion failed in its purposes. Was it by the formal act or ordinance of secession? To state this proposition is now to answer it.

Am I told that the recognition of belligerent rights by the law of nations severed the connection? That the law of nations prevailed during the war and must prevail during the settlement growing out of it? I admit that the United States had the right to, and did, exercise and accord belligerent rights during the war to any extent justified either by policy or the dictates of humanity; but in so doing they never for a moment surrendered the rights of the sovereign; and that upon the submission of those in rebellion to the Constitution and laws the right to the exercise of belligerent powers under the law of nations ceased. Sovereignty alone prevailed—had triumphed; the Constitution and municipal law of the land attached, and the treatment to be accorded the offenders must be under the provisions of and in accordance with these instead of the law of nations, administered by the United States as sovereign and not as belligerent. Who, until at the present time, ever heard of a sovereign Power governing in time of peace any portion of its subjects as belligerents under the law of nations? Oh, what fools the wise men of past generations have been! How they must have desired to see the things that we see, to hear the things that we hear, to know the things that we know! How hard to die without seeing, hearing, and knowing them!

Sir, I assert, without fear of overreaching the principles of law governing the case, that loyal citizens, by being for a time overpowered by the rebellion, have lost none of the rights which attach or ever attached to them by virtue of the Constitution of the United States; and that consequently when they restore their State governments in harmony with that of the United States, they are entitled to exercise all the functions of a State, and to all the rights of a State in the Union. I say the "loyal citizens," for I believe the disloyal are entitled under the Constitution to no right except the right to be hung. When, however, an amnesty or pardon for past offenses is granted, the party having received it may then appeal for protection, and as of right in all matters affected or reached by such amnesty or pardon, to that law which, had it been enforced against him, might have demanded even his life. The law against which he had offended and by which he was condemned, which, while under condemnation, only thundered its anathemas against him, has, upon pardon and reconciliation, become his friend and the advocate of his rights which attach by virtue of such pardon. Now, in what do these rights consist? Do they consist solely of what we term "civil rights," or do they include "political rights" also? My own impression is that they include just what the sovereign granting the pardon may elect to have them include, nothing more, nothing less. And that if it is not yet safe to trust political power in the hands of the reconstructed, it should simply be withheld from them, and that those only who have been continuously loyal should be permitted to exercise it.

The committee, however, has failed to give us any information as to whether those State organizations are in the hands of the friends or the enemies of the Federal Government, or whether those recently in rebellion, but who have been pardoned, may yet be safely invested with "political rights." Where is the protection or encouragement they propose for the Union men of the South? Where, where are the recommendations of this committee upon the most vital question of the day, or involved in all the issues now upon us—the reward and encouragement of loyalty in the section lately overrun by rebellion? Echo answers, where! Gentlemen have labored hard to prove that the loyal are in like condemnation with the disloyal, because they were within rebel lines during the war; that all are "alien enemies" together; that the law of nations justifies us in treating them as such, and that we can make no discrimination between them. Let us see how this is. Allegiance and protection are reciprocal duties, binding, the one upon the citizen, the other upon the Government; and inseparably connected with the faithful observance of all the obligations of allegiance are all the rights which attach by virtue of citizenship. Now, when do these mutual obligations cease? Vattel, page 96, says:

"The natural subjects of a prince are bound to him without any other reserve than the fundamental laws; it is their duty to remain faithful to him, as it is his, on the other hand, to take care to govern them well. Both parties have but one common interest; the people and the prince together constitute but one complete whole, one and the same society. It is, then, an essential and necessary condition of political society that the subjects remain united to their prince as far as in their power."

Am I told that the late civil war dissevered all these bonds and relieved both parties from the observance of these reciprocal obligations and duties? Chitty, in his note to Vattel, page 97, says:

"No individual can shake off his natural allegiance until the part of country where he resides is absolutely conquered and the parent State has acknowledged the severance."

And in his Treatise on Commercial Law, page 129, he elaborates the same doctrine; and I assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that all the authorities on public law, where they touch upon this doctrine, confirm it.

The questions, how the subjects of a government who have been engaged in an unsuccessful rebellion may be treated, and how loyal citizens residing within the rebellious districts should be regarded, have never been considered questions legitimately belonging to the department of international law; because as subjects and citizens they are the objects of the local municipal regulations and laws of the country; the law of nations ceases to operate so soon as the state of war ceases to exist; and when we look to works of international law for authorities or precedents upon these points, we become bewildered because we are traveling out of the record. I have, however, some authorities which, though not bearing directly upon these points, go beyond and cover them. These authorities presuppose—necessarily, because wise men who have written upon these subjects never dreamed of the application of the principles of international law to a country subsequent to the overthrow of an unsuccessful rebellion. These authorities, then, presuppose the success of the rebellion and the permanent partition of the country. In the case of Respublica vs. Samuel Chapman, 1 Dallas, page 56, the court held that—

"None are subjects of the adopted government who have not freely assented thereto."

And in the case of Kelly vs. Harrison, 2 Johnson's Cases, page 29, the court held that—

"The division of an empire works no forfeiture of a right previously acquired, and as a consequence of it all the citizens of the United States who were born prior to our independence, and under the allegiance of the King of Great Britain, would be still entitled in Great Britain to the rights of British subjects."

This very language has been reaffirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States; and all these principles here contended for are as old as the law and are of universal acceptance, except with the new school of authorities, who have not yet published their works.

Does, then, the obligation of impartial justice on the part of the Government toward the subject or citizen cease, while that of fealty on his part remains; or does the obligation of fealty attach without carrying with it all the rights and privileges of citizenship? No, they both cease at one and the same time, the same instant, when the Government acknowledges its inability to extend its protection to him, and not until then. But am I told that the exercise and according of belligerent rights during the late civil war actually amounted, in contemplation of public law, to an acknowledgment of the severance by the United States? If so, then all, loyal and disloyal, "without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of slavery," within the limits of the late rebellion, are now aliens, foreigners, not citizens of the United States; and you have no more right, except as might makes right, to extend over them the provisions of your municipal law for the collection of taxes, and for other purposes, than you have to extend them over the people of Mexico, China, or the Russian empire. And why is Jeff. Davis to-day a state prisoner if you can deal with him only in accordance with the law of nations? The United States, sir, by the result of the late war, have acquired no right by conquest which does not legitimately belong to them as sovereign. It was simply a reassertion and triumphant vindication of their disputed sovereignty. The application of the law of nations works an extension or enlargement rather than a forfeiture or limitation of the rights of revolted subjects during the revolt, but all the rights and remedies of the sovereign, and all the pains and penalties which the law denounces against the offenders, an enlargement of power in the Government, and an abridgment of the rights of the offender, attach immediately upon the vindication of the national integrity.

I know that I am now trenching upon the doctrines of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and I desire information from him upon the point I now make. Admit, for sake of argument, that all within the lines of the late rebellion were and are "alien enemies." By what principle or upon what authority would you define the limits of the late rebellion with sufficient certainty to ascertain who are "alien enemies?" When and by whom were they so defined? Was it by the President in his proclamation of August 16, 1861? The Government of Great Britain accorded "belligerent rights" to the rebels, by proclamation of the Queen, on the 13th day of May, 1861. The right to the exercise of "belligerent rights" by the United States has been recognized by the Supreme Court from the 15th day of May, 1861, and the President frequently changed the limits by proclamations of different dates, and on April 2, 1866, declared it without form and void—without "a local habitation or a name." As I remarked in this House, on the 8th day of January last, "the rebellion was never bounded by State lines, but its authority was extended wherever its power could carry it." The Supreme Court of the United States, upon this point, (2 Black, page 673, the decision being made during the existence of the rebellion,) say:

"It has a boundary marked by lines of bayonets and which can be crossed only by force; south of this line is enemy's territory, because it is claimed and held in possession by an organized, hostile, and belligerent power."

Now, who can define any fixed limits to the rebellion? To-day that "line of bayonets" is at Gettysburg, and all "south of that line is enemy's territory, because it is held by an organized hostile and belligerent power;" to-morrow that line is at Richmond, and then all between Gettysburg and Richmond is not enemy's territory, because it is not held by the enemy. To-day that "line of bayonets" bears hard upon Louisville, and "all south is enemy's territory;" to-morrow that line is at Chattanooga, Atlanta, Savannah, Columbia, Raleigh! To-day that line is at Jefferson City; to-morrow at Little Rock, at Shreveport, at Galveston, at the Rio Grande—nowhere! Now, who, I ask, ever has defined or ever shall or can define the limits of the rebellion, so as to determine that all were enemies within certain fixed geographical limits? How long occupancy by the enemy and peaceable acquiescence by the inhabitants, does it require to convert the citizen into a "public enemy"—a day, a month, or a year? I trust the gentleman from Pennsylvania never got south of that "line of bayonets," and thus became an "alien enemy," though it strikes me I have heard that the "line of bayonets" was at some time extended north of some of his property, which must now be liable to seizure by the Government as "enemy's property," because it was within "enemy's territory," "claimed and held in possession by an organized, hostile, and belligerent power."

What, sir, is the legitimate bearing of this doctrine upon the fundamental principles of our Government? This bill, sir, contains on its face, though somewhat veiled, and is so interpreted by its author, the monstrous doctrine the enormity of which I have been endeavoring to expose. Recognize this doctrine as a principle in our Government and rebellion will cease to be an individual crime and treason will be impossible, because the instant you engage in them you become an "alien enemy," entitled to "belligerent rights," and can be dealt with only in accordance with the law of nations as a "public enemy." In this way, sir, I admit that the committee has found the great panacea for all our troubles—the great and "irreversible guarantee against rebellion and treason"—by legalizing them. Wonderful discovery! Yet how plain, how simple! How is Columbus outstripped in teaching his wondering admirers how to set an egg on end! "The invention all admire, and each, how He to be the inventor missed; so easy it seems, Once found, which, yet unfound, most would have thought Impossible."

What, think you, would our revolutionary fathers, who said that levying war against the United States was treason to be punished by the municipal law, think if they should rise from their graves to find what fools they are discovered to have been? "Angels and ministers of grace," spirits of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Hamilton, "defend us" from such heresy!

I, sir, am neither misrepresenting the principles of this bill nor placing a false construction upon this doctrine. It is the one leading idea which has been persistently pressed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] in connection with every measure which has been introduced looking to a restoration of the Union. It is the construction which he gives to this bill, of which he himself is the author. It is the principle further presented by him in the following section of the bill offered by him to the House on yesterday:

Sec. 6. All persons who held office, either civil or military, under the government called the "confederate States of America," or who swore allegiance to said government, are hereby declared to have forfeited their citizenship and to have renounced their allegiance to the United States, and shall not be entitled to exercise the elective franchise until five years after they shall have filed their intention or desire to be reinvested with the right of citizenship, and shall swear allegiance to the United States and renounce allegiance to all other governments or pretended governments, the said application to be filed and oath taken in the same courts that are authorized by law to naturalize foreigners.

"Forfeited their citizenship;" not citizens, then aliens. Citizens only can be punished for treason. Jeff. Davis "held office under and swore allegiance to the so-called confederate States of America;" hence Jeff. Davis is an alien, and hence he cannot be tried and punished for treason against the United States. Let us pause, sir, before we make this leap.

Sir, this is a subject which deserves the most careful and serious consideration of this Congress and of the country. It is a subject which should be approached and considered by all in no party spirit, but in the spirit of true and unbiased statesmanship and patriotism, and with a view to its bearing upon generations—millions of American citizens—yet unborn, and upon the future prosperity, security, and happiness of our entire common country. I have examined the plan (if plan it may be called) of reconstruction submitted by the committee, with a mind, I think, divested of prejudice and with the permanent welfare of my country only in view, and I am unable to give the plan my support, believing, for the reasons stated, that if adopted it would be productive of more evil than good. It is probably not my place to suggest or offer any plan further than has been indicated in the remarks I have made in opposition to the one proposed. I am prepared, however, to support any plan which promises a restoration of the Union upon principles which promise security to the country and do justice to the downtrodden and long overrun loyalists of the South, and which do not render treason impossible by simply legalizing it. I could even support this bill, not, however, as an ultimatum, if this monstrous doctrine was expunged from it; for though I would not make the reconstruction of the Government of the United States a condition for the restoration of the Union, I would be willing for restoration to take place either with or without the other conditions contained in this bill, the essentials of loyalty, properly organized constituency, &c., being complied with.

If the State governments, organized under the auspices of the President, are to be accepted as legitimate—and which is necessarily to be inferred from the action of the committee, because they do not, after six months' investigation, propose any change—then let us say so, and let the country so understand it. If they are not to be accepted as legitimate, then let the committee recommend what changes shall be made and how, and I venture it will be done. A stroke of his pen and a crack of his whip by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee, are all that would be needed. If political power is in the hands of those who should not be its custodians, let us wrest it from them. If disloyalty to the United States is made honorable and loyalty made odious, let us reverse the order of things, and let us meet the issue fairly, and do it without any indirection, that the country and the world may know what we intend and why we intend it. If we have to appeal to the law of necessity to accomplish our purposes, let us do it. If those purposes are legitimate, are necessary for our present peace and future security and happiness, the country and the world will approve and justify it. I need not tell you, sir, that it is time Congress had a practicable policy before the country. The eyes of the world are on us, and the historian pauses with ink-dipped pen. What shall he write—that the virtue, intelligence, and patriotism of the American people have triumphed, or that a great people, powerful in war, united by disaster, have failed in the hour of triumph, have proved themselves incapable of securing the blessings and reaping the fruits of victory? Heaven save my country!

Mr. BROMWELL obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. STEVENS, who moved to postpone the further consideration of this bill till to-morrow, after the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had concurred in the amendment of the House to Senate bill No. 237, granting a pension to Mrs. Martha Stevens.

CANAL AND SEWERAGE COMPANY.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to call up the motion to reconsider the vote of the House on Friday last by which it agreed to certain amendments to Senate bill No. 290, to incorporate the Canal and Sewerage Company of the District of Columbia.

The question was on agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. F. THOMAS] may not probably have expected this to be called up to-day. I therefore, with his leave, will move that the House adjourn so as to let it come up to-morrow morning.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow the motion to reconsider to go over till Friday, when the bill will come up regularly. It takes me certainly by surprise.

Mr. STEVENS. I am really not acting for myself but for the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] who is not present at this moment.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has the floor on the motion to reconsider, which brings up the bill. It will be the unfinished business if the House adjourns now.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I very much prefer that the gentleman from Pennsylvania should let this go over till Friday, because on last Friday when it was before the House it was understood that it would not be called up till the Friday ensuing.

Mr. STEVENS. Friday is private-bill day.

Mr. F. THOMAS. This was ruled to be a private bill against my objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill was reported on Friday. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. F. THOMAS] objected that it was not a private bill, and the Chair ruled against him. On Friday next a great number of committees desire to make reports, and this would block their way.

Mr. F. THOMAS. Notwithstanding the prompting of the Chair, I still hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me one single moment. I have reason to believe that a much wider range is to be given to this subject than he anticipated. I believe it is to be contended very gravely that the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company have forfeited their charter.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. F. THOMAS. If the gentleman will allow me one moment—

Mr. STEVENS. I suggest that we had better adjourn, and when it comes up to-morrow morning anything that I can do to accommodate the gentleman—

Mr. F. THOMAS. Allow me to finish what I have to say. I have other business to-day engaging my attention, and this new issue that is made will impose upon me the necessity—

Mr. STEVENS. I will refer the gentleman now to the gentleman for whom I am acting, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] who has just come in.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I would really like to know for whom the gentleman is acting.

The SPEAKER. The allusion to the Chair's prompting the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. F. THOMAS] is not just. It is the duty of the Chair always to state to the House the condition of public business, and the manner in which a bill may impede public or private business.

Mr. F. THOMAS. It was not in any bad temper that I made the remark, it was jocular. I was about to repeat—

Mr. STEVENS. I have nothing further to say. The subject is before the House.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I will then ask that this bill be postponed until next Friday morning, because I find that there is this labor imposed upon me: to look into all the laws of Maryland, of Virginia, and of the United States from 1825 to 1850, with a view to meet this new issue, that the Chesapeake and Ohio canal corporation have forfeited their charter. I had not expected that this bill would come up so soon as this, and I therefore ask that its further consideration be postponed until Friday next.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would ask if that postponement would have any effect upon the special order, the bill to regulate the pay of the Army.

The SPEAKER. It would come up as unfinished business, and would take up all Friday until disposed of.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I hope the House will not postpone the consideration of this bill till next Friday. The question as to whether the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company have forfeited any of their rights under their charter from Rock creek to Seventeenth street is not a question that this House will be called upon to consider and settle. If they have any existing right there, that right is reserved under this bill. I notify the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. F. THOMAS] that that question will not be settled by the House.

Mr. F. THOMAS. If that is so it will save me a great deal of trouble.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is so, and therefore the gentleman may save himself that trouble. If there has been any forfeiture it will be for the court to declare it, and not for the House; if there has been no forfeiture it will still be the same, so that it is simply a question of expediency in regard to incorporating this Canal and Sewerage Company. And that question, it seems to me, might as well be disposed of to-morrow as any other time. I hope, therefore, the House will not postpone the consideration of this subject until next Friday.

Mr. F. THOMAS. Then I will vary my proposition. I will ask the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia [Mr. INGERSOLL] to take the sense of the House now for or against these amendments. If it be his purpose to insist upon those amendments, or rather, I refer to one in particular, then the bill will have one character. If it be his purpose to ask the House to reconsider its action in that respect, and to refuse to amend the bill as the gentleman himself proposed on last Friday, then the bill will have another character. I wish, therefore, that the gentleman would now have this question of amendment disposed of, so that the House may have the bill up to-morrow, not in two aspects, but in one only.

The point to which I wish to call the attention of the gentleman is this: there was a section in this bill, as it came from the Senate, which assumes that the rights granted to the city of Washington in this city canal have been forfeited to the Government. The same section also assumes that the rights which the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company enjoyed east of Rock creek have also been forfeited to the Government. If I remember aright that is the second section of the bill. The Senate thought proper subsequently to incorporate into the bill a provision to this effect: that no rights are to be disposed of under the provisions of this bill but those which the United States may possess. When the bill was under consideration in the House last Friday, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] moved to amend that last section, which says that no rights shall be granted except those which the United States may possess, by inserting the words "except as herein before provided," or words to that effect. In other words, he was disposed, as I then supposed, to abrogate that section which was inserted in the Senate, and to suffer this subject to go before the commissioners, who are to be appointed under this law, to condemn all these interests, under the assumption that Washington city had no title, and that the Chesapeake and Ohio canal had no title to this property.

Now, if the gentleman from Illinois means to insist upon that amendment, it will give the bill one character; if he does not intend to insist upon it, then the bill will have another and an entirely different character. I wish, therefore, he would signify his determination one way or the other in regard to that amendment. Does he adhere to it, or does he desire the House to abandon it?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I cannot conceive, nor do I yield the point, that the character of the bill will be changed, whether the amendments be adopted or not. Certainly there is but one amendment that can have any special bearing on the bill, and that is the amendment to the seventeenth section adding the words referred to by the gentleman from Maryland. The other amendment relates merely to the names of the corporators. Now, that amendment to the seventeenth section was proposed by the committee in order to save more certainly the rights not only of this corporation, but of other parties, whether bodies-corporate or private persons. I do not understand that it changes the character of the bill, or that it is material whether the amendment be adopted or rejected.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I merely desire to know from the gentleman from Illinois whether he adheres to that amendment or desires to expunge it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not know that I can give the gentleman a direct answer with regard to that; for I really do not know whether or not the retention of the amendment is essential to secure the rights of the corporation or of individuals who may be affected by the bill.

If it is not essential, I have no desire that it shall be retained. If it is essential for the rights of any parties I want it to be retained.

Mr. F. THOMAS. The gentleman surely does not understand me. A motion has been made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to reconsider the amendment adopted by the House. I take it for granted that the motion was made for some practical purpose. I take it for granted that it was with the view of bringing those amendments again before the House for consideration, so that they may be either rejected or acquiesced in. I simply desire now to know whether it is intended to expunge the amendment to which I have referred or to adhere to it. If the design of the reconsideration is that the House shall reject the amendment which has been adopted, let us determine the question now, and then we shall know in what shape the bill will come up hereafter.

Mr. INGERSOLL. My present impression is that the committee are anxious that the House shall adhere to the amendments, and do not desire that the House shall reconsider the vote by which the amendments were adopted.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I do not understand, then, for what purpose the motion to reconsider was made.

Mr. INGERSOLL. So far as my feelings are concerned, I should prefer that the discussion of the bill should go on this evening.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. F. THOMAS, to postpone the further consideration of the subject until Friday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, there were—ayes 47, noes 24; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. F. THOMAS and INGERSOLL.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes fifty-seven, noes not counted. So the motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 208) entitled "An act to protect American citizens engaged in lumbering on the St. Croix river, in the State of Maine," in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

Mr. McKEE asked leave of absence for one week.

Leave was granted.

USE OF THE HALL.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be instructed to inquire into the expediency of suspending the rule of this House which forbids the use of the Hall except as stated in said rule, so that the House may grant the use of the Hall to such persons as may be deemed proper, who may desire to lecture for the benefit of the soldiers' and sailors' fair about to be held in this city.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

MARY C. HAMILTON.

On motion of Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, Senate bill No. 56, for the relief of Mary C. Hamilton, was recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

FRESH-WATER BASIN FOR IRON-CLADS.

Mr. LYNCH. I ask unanimous consent that Senate joint resolution No. 92, authorizing the appointment of examiners to examine a site for a fresh-water basin for iron-clad vessels of the United States Navy, be taken from the Speaker's table and considered at this time.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

BANGOR CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill making an appropriation for the enlargement and repair of the custom-house and post office building at Bangor, Maine; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

MICHAEL HAAK.

Mr. ANCONA, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill granting to Michael Haak compensation for the use of his farm near Reading, Pennsylvania, by troops of the United States as a camp of rendezvous and instruction; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled Senate bill No. 237, granting a pension to Mrs. Martha Stevens; when the Speaker signed the same.

And then, on motion of Mr. DAVIS, (at four o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BUCKLAND: The petition of soldiers of Ottawa county, Ohio, in favor of equalizing bounties.

By Mr. DAVIS: The petition of Mary Riggles, for relief.

Also, the petition of R. N. Gare, Alfred Wilkinson, and eighty others, citizens of central New York, praying for an increase of the duties on imports.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The memorial of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, urging the favorable action of Congress upon the bill now before the Senate relating to appointments to the Naval Academy, and especially upon that section which directs a selection of naval cadets to be made from the deserving and qualified naval apprentices who have served not less than one year in that capacity.

By Mr. PHELPS: The petition of F. P. Salas, for return of duty on imported goods.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 30, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON presented two petitions of citizens of Mercer county, New Jersey, who were mustered into the service of the United States as soldiers or sailors in the years 1861, 1862, and 1863, praying for a balance of bounty which they allege to be due them; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of soldiers and sailors honorably discharged from the service of the United States, praying for an equalization of bounties; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury addressed to him, transmitting statements in regard to the public debt; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. POMEROY presented the petition of Henry S. Davis, praying for the payment of a balance claimed to be due him for work done in the west wing of the Patent Office building, under a contract with the Commissioner of Patents, dated November 6, 1857; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. RIDDLE. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 227) to incorporate the Washington Glass Company, to report it back with an amendment, and to ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the bill on the day it is reported.

Mr. GRIMES. Is it printed?

Mr. RIDDLE. The Committee on the District of Columbia have had the bill before them, and unanimously recommend it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the honorable member if the bill has been printed.

Mr. RIDDLE. It has never been printed that I am aware of.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill lies over, and will be printed, under the rule.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 95) amendatory of a resolution regulating the investment of the naval pension fund, approved July 1, 1864, reported it without amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred resolutions of the Legislature of New York in favor of an increase in the pay of naval officers, a memorial of the Board of Trade of Buffalo for the same purpose, a memorial of Rear Admiral S. W. Godon, and other naval officers of the Brazil squadron, praying for an increase of pay, thirteen petitions of officers of the Navy attached to the navy-yard at Mare Island, California, the petition of officers of various navy-yards, a memorial of Vice Admiral D. G. Farragut and other naval officers of the United States, a memorial of assistant and acting assistant surgeons of the United States Navy, and resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York on the same subject, have instructed me to report them back, and to ask to be discharged from their further consideration. I will state that an order has been made—Order No. 75—by the Navy Department in regard to the increase of the pay of naval officers, which, in a measure, accomplishes the purpose sought by the memorialists in these cases, and which order, I am happy to say, meets with the approval of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and therefore obviates the necessity of any further legislation on the subject.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Iowa, praying for the enactment of just and equal laws for the regulation of inter-State insurance of all kinds, to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, the committee thinking that it is not a subject over which the Congress of the United States can properly take control.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 91) to refer the claim of Frederick Vincent, administrator of Le Caze & Mallet, to the Court of Claims, have instructed me to report it back with a recommendation that the resolution be rejected. I desire to state, in reference to this matter, that it seems that the parties to whom this resolution relates obtained a bill for their relief some years ago; and the condition of the bill was that a certain amount of money should be paid to them, which should be in full of all claims growing out of the transaction to which it referred. The parties received that money, gave a receipt for it according to the form prescribed by the bill, and now come in with an application to receive something more growing out of the same transaction. I am instructed by the committee to report the resolution back with a recommendation that it be rejected.

Mr. POLAND. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 268) to prevent and punish the manufacture and use of false, forged, or counterfeit brands, stamps, dies, or stencils, have had the same under consideration, and are of opinion that no such legislation as this bill proposes is needed, and therefore report adversely to it. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of the Milwaukee and Rock River Canal Company, praying that the remainder of a certain trust fund arising from the sale of canal lands be paid to them, have instructed me to report adversely to the prayer of the petition, and ask to be discharged from its further consideration. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] has an interest in this matter.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Before the vote is taken to discharge the committee, I wish that might lie over until to-morrow. I understand there was some attorney representing that company—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No action can be taken on the report to-day except by unanimous consent. If the Senator objects it lies over.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Let it lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it lies over under the rule.

Mr. HOWE subsequently said: I move that the memorial reported by the Senator from New York be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary. I would be glad to have it returned to the committee for further consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Austin Bingham, and others, late slaves belonging to the estate of G. W. P. Custis, praying that certain lands be set apart for them, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 308) confirming the title of Alexis Gardapier to a certain tract of land in the county of Brown, and State of Wisconsin, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution to print additional copies of the report of the Committee on Mines and Mining explaining certain amendments to Senate bill No. 257, have directed me to report it back without amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That five thousand copies of the report of the Committee on Mines and Mining explaining certain proposed amendments to Senate bill No. 257, together with a like number of copies of said bill with the proposed amendments recommended by the committee, be printed for the use of the Senate.

DISTRICT SUPREME COURT.

Mr. WADE. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the amendment made by the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 184) to define more clearly the jurisdiction and powers of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, have instructed me to report it back and ask that the Senate agree to the amendment made by the House of Representatives, and I wish to have it acted on now.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WADE. I will state in a moment what the amendment is. The House of Representatives strike out the first four sections of the bill. Those sections undertake more particularly to specify the subjects of the jurisdiction of the court, and the practice, in some respects, making very slight alterations, which were suggested principally by the clerk of that court. After it went to the House of Representatives, the judges of the court, on looking it over, I believe, persuaded the House that it was unnecessary to alter the practice as proposed. In the fifth section, a new subject was introduced, and that was a provision for attachments, which they thought very essential, and the House thought so, too, and retained that portion of the bill together with the section providing for an increase of the salary of the judges. The rest is stricken out. That is all of the bill that is left.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the honorable member if the sections retained are amended in any way.

Mr. WADE. No, sir; not at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the House of Representatives will be read.

Mr. WADE. I think it is not necessary to read it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not ask for the reading.

Mr. HENDRICKS. We ought to know what it is.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think the honorable member from Indiana will understand it in a moment. The bill came, originally, from the Judiciary Committee, and my impression at the time was that the first four sections gave the court no additional power. The House of Representatives have stricken out those sections, leaving the others.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the amendment can be dispensed with by the unanimous consent of the Senate if they prefer acting upon the amendment without hearing it read. The question is on concurring in the amendment made to the bill by the House of Representatives.

The amendment was concurred in.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Kansas, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. No. 344) donating public lands to the several States which may provide agricultural colleges for the education of persons of African descent be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 347) to change certain collection districts in Maryland and Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

FORT LEAVENWORTH RESERVE.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be instructed to inquire as to the expediency of granting the right of way to the Platte Country and Western and Fort Des Moines railroads through that portion of the Fort Leavenworth military reserve lying on the north side of the Missouri river, to report by bill or otherwise.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the first, fourth, and seventh amendments of the Senate, and disagreed to the second, third, fifth, and sixth amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 37) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867, asked a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. RUFUS P. SPALDING of Ohio, Mr. SHELBY M. CULLOM of Illinois, and Mr. WILLIAM RADFORD of New York managers at the same on its part.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 134) relative to appointments to the Military Academy of the United States, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ROBERT C. SCHENCK of Ohio, Mr. H. E. PAINE of Wisconsin, and Mr. L. H. ROUSSEAU of Kentucky managers at the same on its part.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 255) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repair of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending June 30, 1867, asked a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. HENRY J. RAYMOND of New York, Mr. SIDNEY PERHAM of Maine, and Mr. WILLIAM E. NIBLACK of Indiana managers at the same on its part.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bill, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 613) to continue in force and to amend an act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives

(H. R. No. 613) to continue in force and to amend an act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TRUMBULL subsequently said: A bill relating to the Freedmen's Bureau passed by the House of Representatives has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. There are now pending before the Committee on Military Affairs one or two bills on that subject. I think they had better be together, and I suggest, as that committee has those bills now pending, this had better go to the same committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs if there be no objection. The reference made to the Judiciary Committee will be corrected, and the bill is referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

KENTUCKY MILITIA.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution No. 94.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 94) providing for the payment of certain Kentucky militia forces was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to cause to be investigated the claims of the forces called out under the command of James S. Fisk, in May, 1862, and to pay them at the same rate for actual service rendered, while absent from their homes as was allowed by law to other volunteer forces in the military service at the date specified; and in estimating the amount due them, their officers are to be paid as of the grade to which the number of men would have been entitled under the mustering regulations of the Army in force at the date specified.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I ask for the reading of the report accompanying the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. SPRAGUE from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia on the 16th instant:

The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the petition of James S. Fisk, and others, of the home guard of Rock Castle and Lincoln counties, in Kentucky, praying compensation for services rendered during the threatened raid of the rebel John Morgan, in 1862, having had the subject under consideration, beg respectfully to report:

That in May, 1862, the State of Kentucky, at or near Cumberland Gap, was threatened by the rebel forces under the command of John Morgan; that the petitioner, James S. Fisk, was at the time commanding a battalion of home guard in the counties of Rock Castle and Lincoln, in said State, which organization was called into service by Brigadier General T. W. Morgan, United States volunteers, for the protection of telegraph lines and railroads and other lines of communication threatened by the enemy. This force was at no expense to the Government and has as yet received no pay. It was not mustered into or out of the service of the United States, hence the accounting officers of the Treasury do not consider existing legislation a sufficient warrant for the payment. General T. W. Morgan, United States volunteers, had no authority to call out militia forces. He did not seek authority from General Buell, his immediate commander, either before or after the issuing of the order, although he had ample time to do so. Had he performed his duty in this respect, the War Department would probably have sanctioned his act, and the forces would have been paid at the time the services were rendered.

The committee are of the opinion that the claimants, who actually performed service, should not be kept out of their pay by the neglect of General Morgan to obtain authority for his order; but they should be paid for the time they were actually in service, the officers of the grade established by regulation for the number of men performing service. The committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying resolution.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that the name "Fisk," as printed in the resolution, be changed to "Fish." It is a clerical error.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction will be made, as it is a clerical mistake.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I think the report states the facts clearly with reference to this case. These forces were actually called into the service of the United States, although they were not mustered into the service, and performed actual service. It is not clearly set forth in the report or in the orders the number of men that were actually employed, but the resolution is so drawn that the Secretary of War is to investigate and find out the number, and pay them the same amount as was allowed by law to other volunteer forces at that time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to inquire of the Committee on Military Affairs, as these men were never mustered into the service of the United States, what the view of the War Department is on the subject; whether they have had any information or communication with the Department to know the views of the Department on the subject, or whether they have undertaken to order the Secretary of War to pay these men without first understanding what position is assumed with regard to them in the War Department itself. I make this inquiry because I deem it altogether unsafe for a committee of Congress to act on questions of this kind without first communicating with the Department and getting the views of the Department on the subject.

Mr. SPRAGUE. The War Department have been consulted in reference to this matter, and as the troops were actually in the service of the Government and performed service, they are inclined to believe and feel that compensation should be allowed. These companies—there were five of them, I believe—actually performed service under the command of a United States officer who was regularly mustered in; and he testifies that they performed valuable service; but in the condition of affairs in the early years of the war the authority was not obtained which would have been obtained undoubtedly had the request been made of the Department. The Secretary of War informs us that if application had been made at the proper time through the proper channel he has no doubt these forces would have been employed.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I move to amend the bill by striking out after the word "rendered," in line seven, the words "while absent from their homes" and inserting in lieu of those words "and make them the same allowances for rations and clothing;" so as to make the resolution read, "and to pay the said forces at the same rate for actual service rendered, and make them the same allowances for rations and clothing as was allowed by law to other volunteer forces." When General Morgan was at Cumberland Gap, upon which the confederate forces were pressing, he called out this militia force under Colonel Fish.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understood from the statement in the report that they were called out by a militia officer, and not by an officer of the United States.

Mr. GUTHRIE. General Morgan was in the service of the United States, and in command of Cumberland Gap. These troops were called out to keep up his connections and maintain him in command of that position, and they went repeatedly from Lincoln and Rock Castle counties guarding provisions and supplies. They were the mountaineers in that section of country, and were enabled to communicate with General Morgan in the Gap. We know in Kentucky that they rendered valuable service.

I had a conversation with the Secretary of War upon this subject, and he thought the matter came properly within the scope of legislation by Congress, and referred to a case in Maryland where troops were called out under General Morris, I think. In that case the calling out of the troops had not the sanction of the general commanding, but they were called out in an emergency, and Congress passed a resolution authorizing them to be paid, and he said a resolution of this kind would be proper to authorize the Secretary of War to pay these troops. He saw no reason why they should not be paid, but he could not pay them, as their calling out had not been sanctioned by the Commander-in-Chief, and he recommended that the case be brought to the Legislature for action. The amendment which I offer is to explain to the accounting officers what their duty will be under the joint resolution, that these men are to have the same provision that other troops have. It is notorious in Kentucky that they were called out and did good service in keeping up communication with Cumberland Gap.

Mr. SPRAGUE. The words "while absent from their homes" were inserted because it was not clearly set forth whether these men were actually at all times in the service or whether they were at stated points ready to be called upon whenever an emergency seemed to demand. There is nothing of that kind set forth in the petition or in the papers accompanying the joint resolution. As regards rations and clothing, it is evident that if they were at home they would not require clothing or rations from the Government, as they did not come within the same scope as troops who were mustered into the service and were in camp. They might have been at their homes, ready at all times to be called upon as home guards. It was thought best by the committee to make this provision allowing them pay while they were absent from their homes. These men did perform military service under the order of the commanding general of the department at that point; but the amount of service and the manner of rendering it is not clearly set forth, and therefore the committee thought it well to put in a provision of this kind.

Mr. GUTHRIE. These men were called out for this service one hundred and fifty miles from where they lived, guarded the supplies to the Cumberland Gap, and returned. They were liable to be ordered away at any moment, and were ordered on service. I suppose the object is to deduct the time when they went home and staid all night, but they were in service during the whole time. I presume that these men having homes to go to, places to stay at, did probably, with permission of their officers, go home sometimes to assemble again, but they were subject to call at all times, and probably had an agreed rendezvous to meet at.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If they were not mustered into service they were not subject to the call of the commander.

Mr. GUTHRIE. They were actually as much subject to call as if they had been mustered into service. They knew nothing about the difference between being mustered into service and not being mustered. They were under this officer, and they went at his bidding and at his orders, guarded the supplies, scoured the country, and did everything that men in their situation living in that mountain country were fit to do. I suppose that really and in truth they were as much at the command and subject to the call of the commanding officer as if they had a regular camp; but I have no doubt some of them did go home, when they returned to the neighborhood, to their families. I think we had better leave the matter to be settled by the Secretary of War. If they were substantially and fairly and honestly in the service, they ought to be paid; if they were not, of course they ought not to be paid.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am somewhat familiar with the calling out of the troops in the different States at the time of the Morgan raid, and also at the time that General Morgan, who commanded at Cumberland Gap, left that post, and I think the committee have established the correct rule in allowing pay during the time these men were absent from home. I suppose there were thirty or forty thousand at the same time called out in the same way in Ohio who rendezvoused at Cincinnati and points above and below, and were engaged in the same service. It seems to me there ought to be no allowance made for rations or clothing, because the citizens generally fed them. I was in Cincinnati at the time, and I know a good deal of the manner in which these volunteer soldiers were treated. Very few of them were put to any expense. Either the communities from which they went or the cities or communities in which they were fed them, and they wore their ordinary clothes. It seems to me there is no necessity for any allowance of clothing or for rations. The committee have allowed them pay while they were absent from their homes, and that, I think, is enough.

Mr. GUTHRIE. This resolution relates especially to the men who were called out at Cumberland Gap.

Mr. SHERMAN. They ought to be paid for their services, but they marched no further than other troops marched in Ohio.

Mr. GUTHRIE. They did not go to Ohio at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know; but other troops came from Ohio down to Kentucky.

Mr. GUTHRIE. They have been paid.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, but they have not received anything for rations and clothing, and I think the same rule ought to be applied to all. The committee, it seems to me, have made a fair adjustment of this matter.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I withdraw the amendment. I think it is reasonable, but I do not want to have any skirmish about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was read the third time and passed.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 87) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867, which were disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives. The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How shall the committee be appointed?

Several SENATORS. By the Chair.

By unanimous consent the Chair was authorized to appoint the committee; and Messrs. FESSENDEN, CONNESS, and RIDDLE were appointed.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPOINTMENTS.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendment to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 134) relative to appointments to the Military Academy of the United States, which was disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the reading of the amendment which has been disagreed to.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Add as a new section:
And be it further resolved, That in all appointments of cadets to the Military Academy after the present year, the person authorized to nominate shall nominate not less than five candidates for each vacancy, all of whom shall be actual residents of the congressional district, Territory, or District of Columbia, entitled to the appointment; and the selection of one shall be made from the candidates, according to their respective merits and qualifications, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of War shall from time to time prescribe; but this shall not apply to the appointment of cadets authorized by the President of the United States.

Mr. WILSON. Is there any other amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. None.

Mr. WILSON. I think the Senate had better recede than have a controversy over this matter. A committee of conference on every little bill here seems to me unnecessary. I move that the Senate recede from its amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Rhode Island who offered it [Mr. ANTHONY] is not in.

Mr. JOHNSON. The provision stricken out by the House was offered by the Senator from Rhode Island. It would be better to wait, I think, until he is in his seat.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the bill be laid aside for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be done by common consent.

Mr. ANTHONY subsequently moved that the Senate insist on its amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to; and Messrs. WILSON, ANTHONY, and HENDRICKS were appointed conferees on the part of the Senate.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 255) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repair of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending June 30, 1867, which was disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate insist on its amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to; and Messrs. MORGAN, MORRILL, and SAULSBURY were appointed conferees on the part of the Senate.

WOMEN'S HOSPITAL.

Mr. MORRILL. There is a bill on the table which comes from the House of Representatives amended. I desire to call it up and concur in the amendments. It is Senate bill No. 167, to incorporate the Women's Hospital Association of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOWARD. It is very nearly one o'clock, and I hope the joint resolution to amend the Constitution will be taken up.

Mr. MORRILL. This is pending simply on a question of concurring in the amendments made by the House to a bill of the Senate, and will not occupy two minutes.

Mr. HOWARD. If it does not go beyond one o'clock I shall not object.

Mr. MORRILL. Let it come up. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 167) to incorporate the Women's Hospital Association of the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment of the House has already been concurred in.

The Secretary read the second amendment of the House of Representatives, which was in the first section, line three, after the name "Adelaide J. Brown," to strike out all the names to and including that of "Mary K. Lewis," in line seven, except that of "Mary W. Kelly," and to insert "Elmira W. Knap, Mary C. Havermer, Mary Ellen Norment, Jane Thompson, Maria L. Harkness, Isabella Margaret Washington, and Mary F. Smith."

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate concur in that amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "Columbia," at the end of section one, to add "by the name of the Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum."

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate concur in that amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section two, line two to strike out the word "twelve" and insert "twenty-four" as the number of directors.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section three, after the word "directors" at the end of line three to insert "to consist of the first twelve of the above-named incorporators."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section four, line one, after the word "the" to insert "first twelve."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section five, after the word "Women" in line three, to insert "and Lying-in Asylum."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section five, line four, after the word "with" to insert "board, lodging."

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments are completed.

DEATH OF GENERAL SCOTT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

With sincere regret I announce to Congress that Winfield Scott, late lieutenant general in the Army of the United States, departed this life at West Point, in the State of New York, on the 29th day of May instant, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon. I feel well assured that Congress will share in the grief of the nation which must result from its bereavement of a citizen whose high fame is identified with the military history of the Republic.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, May 30, 1866.

Mr. WILSON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia of the Senate and the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, be, and they are hereby, appointed a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress to take into consideration the message of the President of the United States announcing to Congress the death of Lieutenant General Winfield Scott, and to report what method should be adopted by Congress to manifest their appreciation of the high character, tried patriotism, and distinguished public services of Lieutenant General Winfield Scott, and their deep sensibility upon the announcement of his death.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution; and it was adopted unanimously.

Mr. WILSON. As this committee is to be a joint one, and the resolution will have to be acted on by the House of Representatives, I move, for the present, that the message of the President be laid upon the table, and printed. The motion was agreed to.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. HOWARD. I now move to take up House joint resolution No. 127.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 127) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendments proposed by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD.]

Mr. HOWARD. The first amendment is to section one, declaring that "all persons born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the States wherein they reside." I do not propose to say anything on that subject except that the question of citizenship has been so fully discussed in this body as not to need any further elucidation, in my opinion. This amendment which I have offered is simply declaratory of what I regard as the law of the land already, that every person born within the limits of the United States, and subject to their jurisdiction, is by virtue of natural law and national law a citizen of the United States. This will not, of course, include persons born in the United States who are foreigners, aliens, who belong to the families of ambassadors or foreign ministers accredited to the Government of the United States, but will include every other class of persons. It settles the great question of citizenship and removes all doubt as to what persons are or are not citizens of the United States. This has long been a great desideratum in the jurisprudence and legislation of this country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was in line nine, after the words "section one," to insert:

All persons born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the States wherein they reside.

So that the section will read:

SEC. 1. All persons born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the States wherein they reside.

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I presume the honorable Senator from Michigan does not intend by this amendment to include the Indians. I move, therefore, to amend the amendment—I presume he will have no objection to it—by inserting after the word "thereof" the words "excluding Indians not taxed." The amendment would then read:

All persons born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, excluding Indians not taxed, are citizens of the United States and of the States wherein they reside.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope that amendment to the amendment will not be adopted. Indians born within the limits of the United States, and who maintain their tribal relations, are not, in the sense of this amendment, born subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. They are regarded, and always have been in our legislation and jurisprudence, as being quasi foreign nations.

Mr. COWAN. The honorable Senator from Michigan has given this subject, I have no doubt, a good deal of his attention, and I am really desirous to have a legal definition of "citizenship of the United States." What does it mean? What is its length and breadth? I would be glad if the honorable Senator in good earnest would favor us with some such definition. Is the child of the Chinese immigrant in California a citizen? Is the child of a Gypsy born in Pennsylvania a citizen? If so, what rights have they? Have they any more rights than a sojourner in the United States? If a traveler comes here from Ethiopia, from Australia, or from Great Britain, he is entitled, to a certain extent, to the protection of the laws. You cannot murder him with impunity. It is murder to kill him, the same as it is to kill another man. You cannot commit an assault and battery on him, I apprehend. He has a right to the protection of the laws; but he is not a citizen in the ordinary acceptance of the word.

It is perfectly clear that the mere fact that a man is born in the country has not heretofore entitled him to the right to exercise political power. He is not entitled, by virtue of that, to be an elector. An elector is one who is chosen by the people to perform that function, just the same as an officer is one chosen by the people to exercise the franchises of an office. Now, I should like to know, because really I have been puzzled for a long while and have been unable to determine exactly, either from conversation with those who ought to know, or from the decisions of the Supreme Court, the lines and boundaries which circumscribe that phrase, "citizen of the United States." What is it?

So far as the courts and the administration of the laws are concerned, I have supposed that every human being within their jurisdiction was in one sense of the word a citizen, that is, a person entitled to protection; but in so far as the right to hold property, particularly the right to acquire title to real estate, was concerned, that was a subject entirely within the control of the States. It has been so considered in the State of Pennsylvania; and aliens and others who acknowledge no allegiance, either to the State or to the General Government, may be limited and circumscribed in that particular. I have supposed, further, that it was essential to the existence of society itself, and particularly essential to the existence of a free State, that it should have the power, not only of declaring who should exercise political power within its boundaries, but that if it were overrun by another and a different race, it would have the right to absolutely expel them. I do not know that there is any danger to many of the States in this Union; but it is proposed that the people of California are to remain quiescent while they are overrun by a flood of immigration of the Mongol race? Are they to be immigrated out of house and home by Chinese? I should think not. It is not supposed that the people of California, in a broad and general sense, have any higher rights than the people of China; but they are in possession of the country of California, and if another people of a different race, of different religion, of different manners, of different traditions, different tastes and sympathies are to come there and have the free right to locate there and settle among them, and if they have an opportunity of pouring in such an immigration as in a short time will double or treble the population of California, I ask, are the people of California powerless to protect themselves? I do not know that the contingency will ever happen, but it may be well to consider it while we are on this point.

As I understand the rights of the States under the Constitution at present, California has the right, if she deems it proper, to forbid the entrance into her territory of any person she chooses who is not a citizen of some one of the United States. She cannot forbid his entrance; but unquestionably, if she was likely to be invaded by a flood of Australians or people from Borneo, man-eaters or cannibals if you please, she would have the right to say that those people should not come there. It depends upon the inherent character of the men. Why, sir, there are nations of people with whom theft is a virtue and falsehood a merit. There are people to whom polygamy is as natural as monogamy is with us. It is utterly impossible that these people can meet together and enjoy their several rights and privileges which they suppose to be natural in the same society; and it is necessary, a part of the nature of things, that society shall be more or less exclusive. It is utterly and totally impossible to mingle all the various families of men, from the lowest form of the Hottentot up to the highest Caucasian, in the same society.

It must be evident to every man intrusted with the power and duty of legislation, and qualified to exercise it in a wise and temperate manner, that these things cannot be; and in my judgment there should be some limitation, some definition to this term "citizen of the United States." What is it? Is it simply to put a man in a condition that he may be an elector in one of the States? Is it to put him in a condition to have the right to enter the United States courts and sue? Or is it only that he is entitled as a sojourner to the protection of the laws while he is within and under the jurisdiction of the courts? Or is it to set him upon some pedestal, some position, to put him out of the reach of State legislation and State power?

Sir, I trust I am as liberal as anybody toward the rights of all people, but I am unwilling, on the part of my State, to give up the right that she claims, and that she may exercise, and exercise before very long, of expelling a certain number of people who invade her borders; who owe to her no allegiance; who pretend to owe none; who recognize no authority in her government; who have a distinct, independent government of their own—an imperium in imperio; who pay no taxes; who never perform military service; who do nothing, in fact, which becomes the citizen, and perform none of the duties which devolve upon him, but, on the other hand, have no homes, pretend to own no land, live nowhere, settle as trespassers where ever they go, and whose sole merit is a universal swindle; who delight in it, who boast of it, and whose adroitness and cunning is of such a transcendent character that no skill can serve to correct it or punish it; I mean the Gypsies. They wander in gangs in my State. They follow no ostensible pursuit for a livelihood. They trade horses, tell fortunes, and things disappear mysteriously. Where they came from nobody knows. Their very origin is lost in mystery. No man to-day can tell from whence the Zingara come or whither they go, but it is understood that they are a distinct people. They never intermingle with any other. They never intermarry with any other. I believe there is no instance on record where a Zingara woman has mated with a man of any other race, although it is true that sometimes the males of that race may mate with the females of others; but I think there is no case in history where it can be found that a woman of that race, so exclusive are they, and so strong are their sectional antipathies, has been known to mate with a man of another race. These people live in the country and are born in the country. They infest society. They impose upon the simple and the weak everywhere. Are those people, by a constitutional amendment, to be put out of the reach of the State in which they live? I mean as a class. If the mere fact of being born in the country confers that right, then they will have it; and I think it will be mischievous.

I think the honorable Senator from Michigan would not admit the right that the Indians of his neighborhood would have to come in upon Michigan and settle in the midst of that society and obtain the political power of the State, and wield it, perhaps, to his exclusion. I do not know that anybody would agree to that. It is true that our race are not subjected to dangers from that quarter, because we are the strongest, perhaps; but there is a race in contact with this country which, in all characteristics except that of simply making fierce war, is not only our equal, but perhaps our superior. I mean the yellow race; the Mongol race. They outnumber us largely. Of their industry, their skill, and their pertinacity in all worldly affairs, nobody can doubt. They are our neighbors. Recent improvement, the age of fire, has brought their coasts almost in immediate contact with our own. Distance is almost annihilated. They may pour in their millions upon our Pacific coast in a very short time. Are the States to lose control over this immigration? Is the United States to determine that they are to be citizens? I wish to be understood that I consider those people to have rights just the same as we have, but not rights in connection with our Government. If I desire the exercise of my rights I ought to go to my own people, the people of my own blood and lineage, people of the same religion, people of the same beliefs and traditions, and not thrust myself in upon a society of other men entirely different in all those respects from myself. I would not claim that right. Therefore I think, before we assert broadly that everybody who shall be born in the United States shall be taken to be a citizen of the United States, we ought to exclude others besides Indians not taxed, because I look upon Indians not taxed as being much less dangerous and much less pestiferous to society than I look upon Gypsies. I do not know how my honorable friend from California looks upon Chinese, but I do know how some of his fellow-citizens regard them. I have no doubt that now they are useful, and I have no doubt that within proper restraints, allowing that State and the other Pacific States to manage them as they may see fit, they may be useful; but I would not tie their hands by the Constitution of the United States so as to prevent them hereafter from dealing with them as in their wisdom they see fit.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I have failed to learn, from what the Senator has said, what relation what he has said has to the first section of the constitutional amendment before us; but that part of the question I propose leaving to the honorable gentleman who has charge of this resolution. As, however, the State of California has been so carefully guarded from time to time by the Senator from Pennsylvania and others, and the passage, not only of this amendment, but of the so-called civil rights bill, has been deprecated because of its pernicious influence upon society in California, owing to the contiguity of the Chinese and Mongolians to that favored land, I may be excused for saying a few words on the subject.

If my friend from Pennsylvania, who professes to know all about Gypsies and little about Chinese, knew as much of the Chinese and their habits as he professes to do of the Gypsies, (and which I concede to him, for I know nothing to the contrary,) he would not be alarmed in our behalf because of the operation of the proposition before the Senate, or even the proposition contained in the civil rights bill, so far as it involves the Chinese and us.

The proposition before us, I will say, Mr. President, relates simply in that respect to the children begotten of Chinese parents in California, and it is proposed to declare that they shall be citizens. We have declared that by law; now it is proposed to incorporate the same provision in the fundamental instrument of the nation. I am in favor of doing so. I voted for the proposition to declare that the children of all parentage whatever, born in California, should be regarded and treated as citizens of the United States, entitled to equal civil rights with other citizens of the United States.

Now, I will say, for the benefit of my friend, that he may know something about the Chinese in future, that this portion of our population, namely, the children of Mongolian parentage, born in California, is very small indeed, and never promises to be large, notwithstanding our near neighborhood to the Celestial land. The habits of those people, and their religion, appear to demand that they all return to their own country at some time or other; either alive or dead. There are, perhaps, in California today about forty thousand Chinese—from forty to forty-five thousand. Those persons return invariably, while others take their places, and, as I before observed, if they do not return alive their bones are carefully gathered up and sent back to the Flowery Land. It is not an unusual circumstance that the clipper ships trading between San Francisco and China carry at a time three or four hundred human remains of these Chinese. When interred in our State they are not interred deep in the earth, but laid very near the surface, and then mounds of earth are laid over them, so that the process of disinterment is very easy. That is their habit and custom; and as soon as they are fit for transmission to their own country they are taken up with great regularity and sent there. None of their bones are allowed to remain. They will return, then, either living or dead.

Another feature connected with them is, that they do not bring their females to our country but in very limited numbers, and rarely ever in connection with families; so that their progeny in California is very small indeed. From the description we have had from the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania of the Gypsies, the progeny of all Mongolians in California is not so formidable in numbers as that of the Gypsies in Pennsylvania. We are not troubled with them at all. Indeed, it is only in exceptional cases that they have children in our State; and therefore the alarming aspect of the application of this provision to California, or any other land to which the Chinese may come as immigrants, is simply a fiction in the brain of persons who deprecate it, and that alone.

I wish now to address a few words to what the Senator from Pennsylvania has said as to the rights that California may claim as against the incursion of objectionable population from other States and countries. The State of California at various times has passed laws restrictive of Chinese immigration. It will be remembered that the Chinese came to our State, as others did from all parts of the world, to gather gold in large quantities, it being found there. The interference with our own people in the mines by them was deprecated by and generally objectionable to the miners in California. The Chinese are regarded, also, not with favor as an addition to the population in a social point of view; not that there is any intercourse between the two classes of persons there, but they are not regarded as pleasant neighbors; their habits are not of a character that make them at all an inviting class to have near you, and the people so generally regard them. But in their habits otherwise, they are a docile, industrious people, and they are now passing from mining into other branches of industry and labor. They are found employed as servants in a great many families and in the kitchens of hotels; they are found as farm hands in the fields; and latterly they are employed by thousands—indeed, I suppose there are from six to seven thousand of them now employed in building the Pacific railroad. They are there found to be very valuable laborers, patient and effective; and, I suppose, before the present year closes, ten or fifteen thousand of them, at least, will be employed on that great work.

The State of California has undertaken, at different times, to pass restrictive statutes as to the Chinese. The State has imposed a tax on their right to work the mines, and collected it ever since the State has been organized—a tax of four dollars a month on each Chinaman; but the Chinese could afford to pay that and still work in the mines, and they have done so. Various acts have been passed imposing a poll tax or head tax, a capitation tax, upon their arrival at the port of San Francisco; but all such laws, when tested before the supreme court of the State of California, the supreme tribunal of that people, have been decided to be unconstitutional and void.

Mr. HOWARD. A very just and constitutional decision, undoubtedly.

Mr. CONNESS. Those laws have been tested in our own courts, and when passed under the influence of public feeling there they have been declared again and again by the supreme court of the State of California to be void, violative of our treaty obligations, an interference with the commerce of the nation. Now, then, I beg the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, though it may be very good capital in an electioneering campaign to declaim against the Chinese, not to give himself any trouble about the Chinese, but to confine himself entirely to the injurious effects of this provision upon the encouragement of a Gypsy invasion of Pennsylvania. I had never heard myself of the invasion of Pennsylvania by Gypsies. I do not know, and I do not know that the honorable Senator can tell us, how many Gypsies the census shows to be within the State of Pennsylvania. The only invasion of Pennsylvania within my recollection was an invasion very much worse and more disastrous to the State, and more to be feared and more feared, than that of Gypsies. It was an invasion of rebels, which this amendment, if I understand it aright, is intended to guard against and to prevent the recurrence of. On that occasion I am not aware, I do not remember that the State of Pennsylvania claimed the exclusive right of expelling the invaders, but on the contrary my recollection is that Pennsylvania called loudly for the assistance of her sister States to aid in the expulsion of those invaders—did not claim it as a State right to exclude them, did not think it was a violation of the sovereign rights of the State when the citizens of New York and New Jersey went to the field in Pennsylvania and expelled those invaders.

But why all this talk about Gypsies and Chinese? I have lived in the United States for now many a year, and really I have heard more about Gypsies within the last two or three months than I have heard before in my life. It cannot be because they have increased so much of late. It cannot be because they have been felt to be particularly oppressive in this or that locality. It must be that the Gypsy element is to be added to our political agitation, so that hereafter the negro alone shall not claim our entire attention. Here is a simple declaration that a score or a few score of human beings born in the United States shall be regarded as citizens of the United States, entitled to civil rights, to the right of equal defense, to the right of equal punishment for crime with other citizens; and that such a provision should be deprecated by any person having or claiming to have a high humanity passes all my understanding and comprehension.

Mr. President, let me give an instance here, in this connection, to illustrate the necessity of the civil rights bill in the State of California; and I am quite aware that what I shall say will go to California, and I wish it to do so. By the influence of our "southern brethren," who I will not say invaded California, but who went there in large numbers some years since, and who seized political power in that State and used it, who made our statutes and who expounded our statutes from the bench, negroes were forbidden to testify in the courts of law of that State, and Mongolians were forbidden to testify in the courts; and therefore for many years, indeed, until 1862, the State of California held officially that a man with a black skin could not tell the truth, could not be trusted to give a relation in a court of law of what he saw and what he knew. In 1862 the State Legislature repealed the law as to negroes, but not as to Chinese. Where white men were parties the statute yet remained, depriving the Mongolian of the right to testify in a court of law. What was the consequence of preserving that statute? I will tell you. During the four years of rebellion a good many of our "southern brethren" in California took upon themselves the occupation of what is there technically called "road agents." It is a term well known and well understood there. They turned out upon the public highways, and became robbers, highway robbers; they seized the treasure transmitted and conveyed by the express companies, by our stage lines, and in one instance made a very heavy seizure, and claimed that it was done in accordance with the authority of the so-called confederacy. But the authorities of California hunted them down, caught a few of them, and caused them to be hanged, not recognizing the commission of Jeff. Davis for those kinds of transactions within our bounds. The spirit of insubordination and violation of law, promoted and encouraged by rebellion here, affected us so largely that large numbers of—I will not say respectable southern people, and I will not say that it was confined to them alone—but large numbers of persons turned out upon the public highways, so that robbery was so common upon the highways, particularly in the interior and in the mountains of that State, that it was not wondered at, but the wonder was for anybody that traveled on the highways to escape robbery. The Chinese were robbed with impunity, for if a white man was not present no one could testify against the offender. They were robbed and plundered and murdered, and no matter how many of them were present and saw the perpetration of those acts, punishment could not follow, for they were not allowed to testify. Now, sir, I am very glad indeed that we have determined at length that every human being may relate what he heard and saw in a court of law when it is required of him, and that our jurors are regarded as of sufficient intelligence to put the right value and construction upon what is stated.

So much for what has been said in connection with the application of this provision to the State that I in part represent here. I beg my honorable friend from Pennsylvania to give himself no further trouble on account of the Chinese in California or on the Pacific coast. We are fully aware of the nature of that class of people and their influence among us, and feel entirely able to take care of them and to provide against any evils that may flow from their presence among us. We are entirely ready to accept the provision proposed in this constitutional amendment, that the children born here of Mongolian parents shall be declared by the Constitution of the United States to be entitled to civil rights and to equal protection before the law with others.

Mr. HOWARD. There is a typographical error in the amendment now under consideration. The word "State" in the eleventh line is printed "States." It should be in the singular instead of the plural number, so as to read "all persons born in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State" (not States) "wherein they reside." I move that that correction be made.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan that it stands just as well as it is.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to correct the error of the printer; it is printed "States" instead of "State."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The correction will be made.

Mr. JOHNSON. I doubt whether it is an error of the printer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to the resolution before the Senate.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I moved this amendment because it seems to me very clear that there is a large mass of the Indian population who are clearly subject to the jurisdiction of the United States who ought not to be included as citizens of the United States. All the Indians upon reservations within the several States are most clearly subject to our jurisdiction, both civil and military. We appoint civil agents who have a control over them in behalf of the Government. We have our military commanders in the neighborhood of the reservations, who have complete control. For instance, there are seven or eight thousand Navajoes at this moment under the control of General Carlton, in New Mexico, upon the Indian reservations, managed, controlled, fed at the expense of the United States, and fed by the War Department, managed by the War Department, and at a cost to this Government of almost a million and a half of dollars every year. Because it is managed by the War Department, paid out of the commissary fund and out of the appropriations for quartermasters' stores, the people do not realize the enormous expense which is upon their hands. Are these six or seven thousand Navajoes to be made citizens of the United States? Go into the State of Kansas, and you find there any number of reservations, Indians in all stages, from the wild Indian of the plains, who lives on nothing but the meat of the buffalo, to those Indians who are partially civilized and have partially adopted the habits of civilized life. So it is in other States. In my own State there are the Chippewas, the remnants of the Winnebagoes, and the Pottawatomes. There are tribes in the State of Minnesota and other States of the Union. Are these persons to be regarded as citizens of the United States, and by a constitutional amendment declared to be such, because they are born within the United States and subject to our jurisdiction?

Mr. President, the word "citizen," if applied to them, would bring in all the Digger Indians of California. Perhaps they have mostly disappeared; the people of California, perhaps, have put them out of the way; but there are the Indians of Oregon and the Indians of the Territories. Take Colorado; there are more Indian citizens of Colorado than there are white citizens this moment if you admit it as a State. And yet by a constitutional amendment you propose to declare the Utes, the Tabahuaches, and all those wild Indians to be citizens of the United States, the great Republic of the world, whose citizenship should be a title as proud as that of king, and whose danger is that you may degrade that citizenship.

Mr. President, citizenship, if conferred, carries with it, as a matter of course, the rights, the responsibilities, the duties, the immunities, the privileges of citizens, for that is the very object of this constitutional amendment to extend. I do not intend to address the Senate at length on this question now. I have simply raised the question. I think that it would be exceedingly unwise not to adopt this amendment and to put in the Constitution of the United States the broad language proposed. Our fathers certainly did not act in this way, for in the Constitution as they adopted it they excluded the Indians who are not taxed; did not enumerate them, indeed, as a part of the population upon which they based representation and taxation; much less did they make them citizens of the United States.

Mr. President, before the subject of the constitutional amendment passes entirely from the Senate, I may desire to avail myself of the opportunity to address the body more at length; but now I simply direct what I have to say to the precise point contained in the amendment which I have submitted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I rise not to make any remarks on this question, but to say that if there is any reason to doubt that this provision does not cover all the wild Indians, it is a serious doubt; and I should like to hear the opinion of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, who has investigated the civil rights bill so thoroughly, on the subject, or any other gentleman who has looked at it. I had the impression that it would not cover them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Of course my opinion is not any better than that of any other member of the Senate; but it is very clear to me that there is nothing whatever in the suggestions of the Senator from Wisconsin. The provision is, that "all persons born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens." That means "subject to the complete jurisdiction thereof." Now, does the Senator from Wisconsin pretend to say that the Navajoe Indians are subject to the complete jurisdiction of the United States? What do we mean by "subject to the jurisdiction of the United States?" Not owing allegiance to anybody else. That is what it means. Can you sue a Navajoe Indian in court? Are they in any sense subject to the complete jurisdiction of the United States? By no means. We make treaties with them, and therefore they are not subject to our jurisdiction. If they were, we would not make treaties with them. If we want to control the Navajoes, or any other Indians of which the Senator from Wisconsin has spoken, how do we do it? Do we pass a law to control them? Are they subject to our jurisdiction in that sense? Is it not understood that if we want to make arrangements with the Indians to whom he refers we do it by means of a treaty? The Senator himself has brought before us a great many treaties this session in order to get control of those people.

If you introduce the words "not taxed," that is a very indefinite expression. What does "excluding Indians not taxed" mean? You will have just as much difficulty in regard to those Indians that you say are in Colorado, where there are more Indians than there are whites. Suppose they have property there, and it is taxed; then they are citizens.

Mr. WADE. And ought to be.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Ohio says they ought to be. If they are there and within the jurisdiction of Colorado, and subject to the laws of Colorado, they ought to be citizens; and that is all that is proposed. It cannot be said of any Indian who owes allegiance, partial allegiance if you please, to some other Government that he is "subject to the jurisdiction of the United States." Would the Senator from Wisconsin think for a moment of bringing a bill into Congress to subject these wild Indians with whom we have no treaty to the laws and regulations of civilized life? Would he think of punishing them for instituting among themselves their own tribal regulations? Does the Government of the United States pretend to take jurisdiction of murders and robberies and other crimes committed by one Indian upon another? Are they subject to our jurisdiction in any just sense? They are not subject to our jurisdiction. We do not exercise jurisdiction over them. It is only those persons who come completely within our jurisdiction, who are subject to our laws, that we think of making citizens; and there can be no objection to the proposition that such persons should be citizens.

It seems to me, sir, that to introduce the words suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin would not make the proposition any clearer than it is, and that it by no means embraces, or by any fair construction—by any construction, I may say—could embrace the wild Indians of the plains or any with whom we have treaty relations, for the very fact that we have treaty relations with them shows that they are not subject to our jurisdiction. We cannot make a treaty with ourselves; it would be absurd. I think that the proposition is clear and safe as it is.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the particular question before the Senate is whether the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin shall be adopted. But while I am up, and before I proceed to consider the necessity for that amendment, I will say a word or two upon the proposition itself; I mean that part of section one which is recommended as an amendment to the old proposition as it originally stood.

The Senate are not to be informed that very serious questions have arisen, and some of them have given rise to embarrassments, as to who are citizens of the United States, and what are the rights which belong to them as such; and the object of this amendment is to settle that question. I think, therefore, with the committee to whom the matter was referred, and by whom the report has been made, that it is very advisable in some form or other to define what citizenship is; and I know no better way of accomplishing that than the way adopted by the committee. The Constitution as it now stands recognizes a citizenship of the United States. It provides that no person shall be eligible to the Presidency of the United States except a natural-born citizen of the United States or one who was in the United States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution; it provides that no person shall be eligible to the office of Senator who has not been a citizen of the United States for nine years; but there is no definition in the Constitution as it now stands as to citizenship. Who is a citizen of the United States is an open question. The decision of the courts and the doctrine of the commentators is, that every man who is a citizen of a State becomes ipso facto a citizen of the United States; but there is no definition as to how citizenship can exist in the United States except through the medium of a citizenship in a State.

Now, all that this amendment provides is, that all persons born in the United States and not subject to some foreign Power—for that, no doubt, is the meaning of the committee who have brought the matter before us—shall be considered as citizens of the United States. That would seem to be not only a wise but a necessary provision. If there are to be citizens of the United States entitled everywhere to the character of citizens of the United States there should be some certain definition of what citizenship is, what has created the character of citizen as between himself and the United States, and the amendment says that citizenship may depend upon birth, and I know of no better way to give rise to citizenship than the fact of birth within the territory of the United States, born of parents who at the time were subject to the authority of the United States. I am, however, by no means prepared to say, as I think I have intimated before, that being born within the United States, independent of any new constitutional provision on the subject, creates the relation of citizen to the United States.

The amendment proposed by my friend from Wisconsin I think, and I submit it to the Senate, should be adopted. The honorable member from Illinois seems to think it unnecessary, because, according to his interpretation of the amendment as it stands, it excludes those who are proposed to be excluded by the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, and he thinks that that is done by saying that those only who are born in the United States are to become citizens thereof, who at the time of birth are "subject to the jurisdiction thereof," and he supposes and states very positively that the Indians are not subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. With due deference to my friend from Illinois, I think he is in error. They are within the territorial limits of the United States. If they were not, the provision would be altogether inapplicable to them. In one sense, therefore, they are a part of the people of the United States, and independent of the manner in which we have been dealing with them it would seem to follow necessarily that they are subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, as is anybody else who may be born within the limits of the United States. But when the United States took possession—England for us in the beginning, and our limits have been extended since—of the territory which was originally peopled exclusively by the Indians, we found it necessary to recognize some kind of a national existence on the part of the aboriginal settlers of the United States; but we were under no obligation to do so, and we are under no constitutional obligation to do so now, for although we have been in the habit of making treaties with these several tribes, we have also, from time to time, legislated in relation to the Indian tribes. We punish murder committed within the territorial limits in which the tribes are to be found. I think we punish the crime of murder committed by one Indian upon another Indian. I think my friend from Illinois is wrong in supposing that that is not done.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not except where it is done under special provision—not with the wild Indians of the plains.

Mr. JOHNSON. By special provision of legislation. That I understand. I am referring to that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We propose to make citizens of those brought under our jurisdiction in that way. Nobody objects to that, I reckon.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, I do. I am not objecting at all to their being citizens now; what I mean to say, is that over all the Indian tribes within the limits of the United States, the United States may—that is the test—exercise jurisdiction. Whether they exercise it in point of fact is another question; whether they propose to govern them under the treaty-making power is quite another question; but the question as to the authority to legislate is one, I think, about which, if we were to exercise it, the courts would have no doubt; and when, therefore, the courts come to consider the meaning of this provision, that all persons born within the limits of the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens, and are called upon to decide whether Indians born within the United States, with whom we are now making treaties are citizens, I think they will decide that they have become citizens by virtue of this amendment. But at any rate, without expressing any decided opinion to that effect, as I would not do when the honorable member from Illinois is so decided in the opposite opinion, when the honorable member from Wisconsin, to say nothing of myself, entertains a reasonable doubt that Indians would be embraced within the provision, what possible harm can there be in guarding against it? It does not affect the constitutional amendment in any way. That is not my purpose, and I presume is not the purpose of my friend from Wisconsin.

The honorable member from Illinois says that the terms which the member from Wisconsin proposes to insert would leave it very uncertain. I suppose that my friend from Illinois agreed to the second section of this constitutional amendment, and these terms are used in that section. In apportioning the representation, as you propose to do by virtue of the second section, you exclude from the basis "Indians not taxed." What does that mean? The honorable member from Illinois says that that is very uncertain. What does it mean? It means, or would mean if inserted in the first section, nothing, according to the honorable member from Illinois. Well, if it means nothing inserted in the first section it means nothing where it is proposed to insert it in the second section. But I think my friend from Illinois will find that these words are clearly understood and have always been understood; they are now almost technical terms. They are found, I think, in nearly all the statutes upon the subject; and if I am not mistaken, the particular statute upon which my friend from Illinois so much relied as one necessary to the peace of the country, the civil rights bill, has the same provision in it, and that bill I believe was prepared altogether, or certainly principally, by my friend from Illinois. I read now from the civil rights bill as it passed:

"That all persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign Power, excluding Indians not taxed, are hereby declared to be citizens."

What did these words mean? They meant something; and their meaning as they are inserted in that act is the same meaning which will be given to them if they are inserted in the first section of this constitutional amendment. But I conclude by saying that when we are trying to settle this, among other questions, for all time, it is advisable—and if my friend will permit me to say so, our clear duty—to put every provision which we adopt in such plain language as not to be capable of two interpretations, if we can. When Senators upon the floor maintain the opinion that as it now stands it is capable of an interpretation different from that which the committee mean, and the amendment proposed gets clear of that interpretation which the committee do not mean, why should we not adopt it?

I hope, therefore, that the friends—and I am the friend of this provision as far as we have gone in it—that the friends of this constitutional amendment will accept the suggestion of the honorable member from Wisconsin.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Maryland certainly perceives a distinction between the use of the words "excluding Indians not taxed" in the second section and in the first. The second section is confined to the States; it does not embrace the Indians of the plains at all. That is a provision in regard to the apportionment of representation among the several States.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member did not understand me. I did not say it meant the same thing.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understood the Senator, I think. I know he did not say that the clause in the second section was extended all over the country, but he did say that the words "excluding Indians not taxed" were in the second section, and inasmuch as I had said that those words were of uncertain meaning, therefore, having gone for the words in the second section I was guilty of a great inconsistency. Now, I merely wish to show the Senator from Maryland that the words in the second section may have a very clear and definite meaning, when in the first section they would have a very uncertain meaning, because they are applied under very different circumstances. The second section refers to no persons except those in the States of the Union; but the first section refers to persons everywhere, whether in the States or in the Territories or in the District of Columbia. Therefore the criticism upon the language that I had used, it seems to me, is not a just one.

But the Senator wants to insert the words, "excluding Indians not taxed." I am not willing to make citizenship in this country depend on taxation. I am not willing, if the Senator from Wisconsin is, that the rich Indian residing in the State of New York shall be a citizen and the poor Indian residing in the State of New York shall not be a citizen. If you put in those words in regard to citizenship, what do you do? You make a distinction in that respect, if you put it on the ground of taxation. We had a discussion on the civil rights bill as to the meaning of these words, "excluding Indians not taxed." The Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] I think, on that occasion gave this definition to the phrase "excluding Indians not taxed," that it did not allude to the fact of taxation simply but it meant to describe a class of persons; that is, civilized Indians. I was inclined to fall into that view. I was inclined to adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland, that the words "excluding Indians not taxed" did not mean literally excluding those upon whom a tax was not assessed and collected, but rather meant to define a class of persons, meaning civilized Indians; and I think I gave that answer to the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] who was disposed to give it the technical meaning that "Indians not taxed" meant simply those upon whom no tax was laid. If it does mean that, then it would be very objectionable to insert those words here, because it would make of a wealthy Indian a citizen and would not make a citizen of one not possessed of wealth under the same circumstances. This is the uncertainty in regard to the meaning of those words. The Senator from Maryland and myself, perhaps, would understand them alike as embracing all Indians who were not civilized; and yet, if you insert that language, "Indians not taxed," other persons may not understand them that way; and I remember that the Senator from Indiana was disposed to understand them differently when we had the discussion upon the civil rights bill. Therefore I think it better to avoid these words and that the language proposed in this constitutional amendment is better than the language in the civil rights bill. The object to be arrived at is the same.

I have already replied to the suggestion as to the Indians being subject to our jurisdiction. They are not subject to our jurisdiction in the sense of owing allegiance solely to the United States; and the Senator from Maryland, if he will look into our statutes, will search in vain for any means of trying these wild Indians. A person can only be tried for a criminal offense in pursuance of laws, and he must be tried in a district which must have been fixed by law before the crime was committed. We have had in this country, and have to-day, a large region of country within the territorial limits of the United States, unorganized, over which we do not pretend to exercise any civil or criminal jurisdiction, where wild tribes of Indians roam at pleasure, subject to their own laws and regulations, and we do not pretend to interfere with them. They would not be embraced by this provision.

For these reasons I think this language is better than the language employed by the civil rights bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to ask him a question before he sits down?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to know if, in his opinion, it is not a matter of pleasure on the part of the Government of the United States, and especially of Congress, whether the laws of the United States be extended over the Indians or not; if it is not a matter to be decided by Congress alone whether we treat with the Indians by treaty or govern them by direct law; in other words, whether Congress has not the power at its pleasure to extend the laws of the United States over the Indians and to govern them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose it would have the same power that it has to extend the laws of the United States over Mexico and govern her if in our discretion we thought proper to extend the laws of the United States over the republic of Mexico, or the empire of Mexico, if you please so to call it, and had sufficient physical power to enforce it. I suppose you may say in this case we have the power to do it, but it would be a violation of our treaty obligations, a violation of the faith of this nation, to extend our laws over these Indian tribes with whom we have made treaties saying we would not do it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We could extend it over Mexico in the same way.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I say we could extend it over Mexico just as well; that is, if we have the power to do it. Congress might declare war, or, without declaring war, might extend its laws, or profess to extend them, over Mexico, and if we had the power we could enforce that declaration; but I think it would be a breach of good faith on our part to extend the laws of the United States over the Indian tribes with whom we have these treaty stipulations, and in which treaties we have agreed that we would not make them subject to the laws of the United States. There are numerous treaties of that kind.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to remind him of a citation from a decision of the Supreme Court that he himself made here, I think, when the veto of the civil rights bill was under discussion; and if I correctly understood it, as he read it, the Supreme Court decided that these untaxed Indians were subjects, and distinguished between subjects and citizens.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think there are decisions that treat them as subjects in some respects. In some sense they are regarded as within the territorial boundaries of the United States, but I do not think they are subject to the jurisdiction of the United States in any legitimate sense; certainly not in the sense that the language is used here. The language seems to me to be better chosen than it was in the other bill. There is a difficulty about the words, "Indians not taxed." Perhaps one of the reasons why I think so is because of the persistency with which the Senator from Indiana himself insisted that the phrase "excluding Indians not taxed," the very words which the Senator from Wisconsin wishes to insert here, would exclude everybody that did not pay a tax; that that was the meaning of it; we must take it literally. The Senator from Maryland did not agree to that, nor did I; but if the Senator from Indiana was right, it would receive a construction which I am sure the Senator from Wisconsin would not be for; for if these Indians come within our limits and within our jurisdiction and are civilized, he would just as soon make a citizen of a poor Indian as of the rich Indian.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I expected the Senator from Illinois, being a very able lawyer, at the head of the Judiciary Committee, to meet the question that I asked him and to answer it as a question of law, and not as a question of military power. I did not ask him the question whether the Government of the United States had the military power to go into the Indian territory and subjugate the Indians to the political power of the country; nor had he a right to understand the question in that sense. I asked him the question whether, under the Constitution, under the powers of this Government, we may extend our laws over the Indians and compel obedience, as a matter of legal right, from the Indians. If the Indian is bound to obey the law he is subject to the jurisdiction of the country; and that is the question I desired the Senator to meet as a legal question, whether the Indian would be bound to obey the law which Congress in express terms extended over him in regard to questions within the jurisdiction of Congress.

Now, sir, this question has once or twice been decided by the Attorney General, so far as he could decide it. In 1855 he was inquired of whether the laws of the United States regulating the intercourse with the Indian tribes, by the general legislation in regard to Oregon, had been extended to Oregon; and he gave it as his opinion that the laws had been extended to Oregon, and regulated the intercourse between the white people and the Indians there. Subsequently, the Attorney General was asked whether Indians were citizens of the United States in such sense as that they could become the owners of the public lands where the right to acquire them was limited to citizens; and in the course of that opinion he says that the Indian is not a citizen of the United States by virtue of his birth, but that he is a subject. He says:

"The simple truth is plain that the Indians are the subjects of the United States, and therefore are not, in mere right of home-birth, citizens of the United States. The two conditions are incompatible. The moment it comes to be seen that the Indians are domestic subjects of this Government, that moment it is clear to the perception that they are not the sovereign constituent ingredients of the Government. This distinction between citizens proper, that is, the constituent members of the political sovereignty, and subjects of that sovereignty, who are not therefore citizens, is recognized in the best authorities of public law."

He then cites some authorities. Again, he says:

"Not being citizens of the United States by mere birth, can they become so by naturalization? Undoubtedly."

"But they cannot become citizens by naturalization under existing general acts of Congress. (2 Kent's Commentaries, page 72.)"

"Those acts apply only to foreigners, subjects of another allegiance. The Indians are not foreigners, and they are in our allegiance without being citizens of the United States."

Mr. JOHNSON. Whose opinion is that?

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is the opinion of Mr. Cushing, given on the 5th of July, 1856. I did not intend to discuss this question, but I will make one further reply to the Senator from Illinois. When the civil rights bill was under consideration I was of the opinion that the term "not taxed" meant not taxed; and when words are plain in the law I take them in their natural sense. When there is no ambiguity the law says there shall be no construction; and when you say a man is not taxed I presume it means that he is not taxed. I do not know any words that express the meaning more clearly than the words themselves, and therefore I cannot express the meaning in any more apt words than the words used by the Senator from Wisconsin, "Indians not taxed." When I said that that was making citizenship to rest upon property I recollect, or I think I do, the indignant terms in which the Senator from Illinois then replied, conveying the idea that it was a demagogical argument, in this body to speak of a subject like that; and yet to-day he says to the Senator from Wisconsin that it is not a statesmanlike proposition. He makes the same point upon the Senator from Wisconsin which he undertook to make upon me on the civil rights bill.

If it is the pleasure of Congress to make the wild Indians of the desert citizens, and then if three fourths of the States agree to it, I presume we will get along the best way we can; and what shall then be the relations between these people and the United States will be for us and for our descendants to work out. They are not now citizens; they are subjects. For safety, as a matter of policy we regulate our intercourse with them to a large extent by treaties, so as that they shall assent to the regulations that govern them. That is a matter of policy, but we need not treat with an Indian. We can make him obey our laws, and being liable to such obedience he is subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. I did not intend to discuss this question, but I got into it by the inquiry I made of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope, sir, that this amendment will not be adopted. I regard the language of the section as sufficiently certain and definite. If amended according to the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin it will read as follows:

All persons born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, excluding Indians not taxed, are citizens of the United States, and of the State wherein they reside.

Suppose we adopt the amendment as suggested by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, in what condition will it leave us as to the Indian tribes wherever they are found? According to the ideas of the honorable Senator, as I understand them, this consequence would follow: all that would remain to be done on the part of any State would be to impose a tax upon the Indians, whether in their tribal condition or otherwise, in order to make them citizens of the United States. Does the honorable Senator from Wisconsin contemplate that? Does he propose to leave this amendment in such a condition that the State of Wisconsin, which he so ably represents here, will have the right to impose taxes upon the Indian tribes within her limits, and thus make of these Indians constituting the tribes, no matter how numerous, citizens of the United States and of the State of Wisconsin? That would be the direct effect of his amendment if it should be adopted. It would, in short, be a naturalization, whenever the States saw fit to impose a tax upon the Indians, of the whole Indian race within the limits of the States.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator will permit me to suggest a case. Suppose the State of Kansas, for instance, should tax her Indians for five years, they would be citizens.

Mr. HOWARD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CLARK. But if she refuse to tax them for the next ten years how would they be then? Would they be citizens or not?

Mr. HOWARD. I take it for granted that when a man becomes a citizen of the United States under the Constitution he cannot cease to be a citizen, except by expatriation or the commission of some crime by which his citizenship shall be forfeited.

Mr. CLARK. If it depends upon taxation.

Mr. HOWARD. The continuance of the quality of citizenship would not, I think, depend upon the continuance of taxation.

Mr. CLARK. But still he would be an "Indian not taxed."

Mr. HOWARD. He has been taxed once.

Mr. CLARK. The point I wish to bring the Senator to is this: would not the admission of a provision of that kind make a sort of shifting use of the Indians?

Mr. HOWARD. It might, depending upon the construction which would happen to be given by the courts to the language of the Constitution. The great objection, therefore, to the amendment is, that it is an actual naturalization, whenever the State sees fit to enact a naturalization law in reference to the Indians in the shape of the imposition of a tax, of the whole Indian population within their limits. There is no evading this consequence, but still I cannot impute to the honorable Senator from Wisconsin a purpose like that. I think he has misapprehended the effect of the language which he suggests. I think the language as it stands is sufficiently certain and exact. It is that "all persons born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside."

I concur entirely with the honorable Senator from Illinois, in holding that the word "jurisdiction," as here employed, ought to be construed so as to imply a full and complete jurisdiction on the part of the United States, coextensive in all respects with the constitutional power of the United States, whether exercised by Congress, by the executive, or by the judicial department; that is to say, the same jurisdiction in extent and quality as applies to every citizen of the United States now. Certainly, gentlemen cannot contend that an Indian belonging to a tribe, although born within the limits of a State, is subject to this full and complete jurisdiction. That question has long since been adjudicated, so far as the usage of the Government is concerned. The Government of the United States have always regarded and treated the Indian tribes within our limits as foreign Powers, so far as the treaty-making power is concerned, and so far especially as the commercial power is concerned, for in the very Constitution itself there is a provision that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce, not only with foreign nations and among the States, but also with the Indian tribes. That clause, in my judgment, presents a full and complete recognition of the national character of the Indian tribes, the same character in which they have been recognized ever since the discovery of the continent and its occupation by civilized men; the same light in which the Indians were viewed and treated by Great Britain from the earliest commencement of the settlement of the continent. They have always been regarded, even in our ante-revolutionary history, as being independent nations, with whom the other nations of the earth have held treaties, and in no case, I believe, has either the Government of Great Britain or of the United States recognized the right of an individual Indian to transfer or convey lands. Why? If he was a citizen, in other words, if he was not a subject of a foreign Power, if he did not belong to a tribe whose common law is that land as well as almost every other description of property shall be held in common among the members of the tribe, subject to a chief, why is it that the reservation has been imposed and always observed upon the act of conveyance on the part of the Indian?

A passage has been read from an opinion given by Mr. Attorney General Cushing on this subject, in which, it seems to me, he takes great liberties with the Constitution in speaking of the Indian as being a subject of the United States. Certainly I do not so hold; I cannot so hold, because it has been the habit of the Government from the beginning to treat with the Indian tribes as sovereign Powers. The Indians are our wards. Such is the language of the courts. They have a national independence. They have an absolute right to the occupancy of the soil upon which they reside; and the only ground of claim which the United States has ever put forth to the proprietorship of the soil of an Indian territory is simply the right of preemption; that is, the right of the United States to be the first purchaser from the Indian tribes. We have always recognized in an Indian tribe the same sovereignty over the soil which it occupied as we recognize in a foreign nation of a power in itself over its national domains. They sell the lands to us by treaty, and they sell the lands as the sovereign Power owning, holding, and occupying the lands.

But it is useless, it seems to me, Mr. President, to enlarge further upon the question of the real political power of Indians or of Indian tribes. Our legislation has always recognized them as sovereign Powers. The Indian who is still connected by his tribal relation with the government of his tribe is subject for crimes committed against the laws or usages of the tribe to the tribe itself, and not to any foreign or other tribunal. I believe that has been the uniform course of decision on that subject. The United States courts have no power to punish an Indian who is connected with a tribe for a crime committed by him upon another member of the same tribe.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Within the territory. Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir. Why? Because the jurisdiction of the nation intervenes and ousts what would otherwise be perhaps a right of jurisdiction of the United States. But the great objection to the amendment to the amendment is that it is an unconscious attempt on the part of my friend from Wisconsin to naturalize all the Indians within the limits of the United States. I do not agree to that. I am not quite so liberal in my views. I am not yet prepared to pass a sweeping act of naturalization by which all the Indian savages, wild or tame, belonging to a tribal relation, are to become my fellow-citizens and go to the polls and vote with me and hold lands and deal in every other way that a citizen of the United States has a right to do.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan declares his purpose to be not to include these Indians within this constitutional amendment. In purpose I agree with him. I do not intend to include them. My purpose is to exclude them; and the question between us is whether his language includes them and mine excludes them, or whether his language excludes them and mine includes them. The Senator says, in the first place, if the words which are suggested by me, "Indians not taxed," are to govern, any State has it in its power to naturalize the Indian tribes within its limits and bring them in as citizens. Can a State tax them unless they are subject to the State? Certainly not. My friend from Michigan will not contend that an Indian can be taxed if he is not subject to the State or to the United States; and yet, if they are subject to the jurisdiction of the United States they are declared by the very language of his amendment to be citizens.

Now, sir, the words which I have used are borrowed from the Constitution as it stands—the Constitution adopted by our fathers. We have lived under it for seventy years; and these words, "Indians not taxed," are the very words which were used by our fathers in forming the Constitution as descriptive of a certain class of Indians which should not be enumerated as a part of our population, as distinguished from another class which should be enumerated as a part of our population; and these are words of description used by them under which we have acted for seventy years and more. They have come to have a meaning that is understood as descriptive of a certain class of Indians that may be enumerated within our population as a part of the citizens of the United States, to constitute a part of the basis of the political power of the United States, and others not included within it are to be excluded from that basis. The courts of the United States have had occasion to speak on this subject, and from time to time they have declared that the Indians are subjects of the United States, not citizens; and that is the very word in your amendment where they are "subject to the jurisdiction" of the United States. Why, sir, what does it mean when you say that a people are subject to the jurisdiction of the United States? Subject, first, to its military power; second, subject to its political power; third, subject to its legislative power; and who doubts our legislative power over the reservations upon which these Indians are settled? Speaking upon that subject, I have to say that one of the most distinguished men who ever sat in this body, certainly that have sat in this body since I have been a member of it, the late Senator from Vermont, Judge Collamer, time and again urged upon me, as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, to bring forward a scheme of legislation by which we should pass laws and subject all the Indians in all the Territories of the United States to the legislation of Congress direct. The Senator from Ohio not now in his seat [Mr. SHERMAN] has contended for the same thing, and other members of Congress contend that the very best policy of dealing with the Indian tribes is to subject them at once to our legislative power and jurisdiction. "Subjects of the United States!" Why, sir, they are completely our subjects, completely in our power. We hold them as our wards. They are living upon our bounty.

Mr. President, there is one thing that I doubt not Senators must have forgotten. In all those vast territories which we acquired from Mexico, we took the sovereignty and the jurisdiction of the soil and the country from Mexico, just as Mexico herself had held it, just as Spain had held it before the Mexican republic was established; and what was the power that was held by Spain and by Mexico over the Indian tribes? They did not recognize even the possessory title of an Indian in one foot of the jurisdiction of those territories. In reference to the Indians of California, we have never admitted that they had sufficient jurisdiction over any part of its soil to make a treaty with them. The Senate of the United States expressly refused to make treaties with the Indians of California, on the ground that they had no title and no jurisdiction whatever in the soil; they were absolutely subject to the authority of the United States, which we derived from our treaty with Mexico.

The opinion of Attorney General Cushing, one of the ablest men who has ever occupied the position of Attorney General, has been read here, in which he states clearly that the Indians, though born upon our soil, owing us allegiance, are not citizens; they are our subjects; and that is the very word which is used in this amendment proposed to the Constitution of the United States, declaring that if they be "subject" to our jurisdiction, born on our soil, they are, ipso facto, citizens of the United States.

Mr. President, the celebrated civil rights bill which has been passed during the present Congress, which was the forerunner of this constitutional amendment, and to give validity to which this constitutional amendment is brought forward, and which without this constitutional amendment to enforce it has no validity so far as this question is concerned, uses the following language:

"That all persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign Power, excluding Indians not taxed, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States."

Why should this language be criticised any more now, when it is brought forward here in this constitutional amendment, than when it was in the civil rights bill? Why should the language be more criticised here than it is in the second section of this constitutional amendment, where the same words are used? The second section, in apportioning representation, proposes to count the whole number of persons in each State, "excluding Indians not taxed." Why not insert those words in the first section as well as in the second? Why not insert them in this constitutional amendment as well as in the civil rights bill? The civil rights bill undertook to do this same thing. It undertook to declare that "all persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign Power, excluding Indians not taxed, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States." But, sir, the committee of fifteen, fearing that this declaration by Congress was without validity unless a constitutional amendment should be brought forward to enforce it, have thought proper to report this amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I want to say to the honorable Senator, who has a great regard for truth, that he is drawing entirely upon his imagination. There is not one word of correctness in all that he is saying, not a particle, not a scintilla, not the beginning of truth.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I take a little issue with my friend from Maine on that point as a question of fact.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In the first place, this was not brought forward by the committee of fifteen at all.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This proposition was first introduced into the House by a gentleman from Ohio by the name of BINGHAM.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I thought the Senator was speaking of this first part of the section, the amendment, not the whole.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No, sir; that is proposed by the Senator from Michigan. As I understand, a member from Ohio, Mr. BINGHAM, who in a very able speech in the House maintained that the civil rights bill was without any authority in the Constitution, brought forward a proposition in the House of Representatives to amend the Constitution so as to enable Congress to declare the civil rights of all persons, and that constitutional amendment, Mr. BINGHAM being himself one of the committee of fifteen, was referred by the House to that committee, and from the committee it has been reported. I say I have a right to infer that it was because Mr. BINGHAM and others of the House of Representatives and other persons upon the committee had doubts, at least, as to the constitutionality of the civil rights bill that this proposition to amend the Constitution now appears to give it validity and force. It is not an imputation upon any one.

Mr. GRIMES. It is an imputation upon every member who voted for the bill, the inference being legitimate and logical that they violated their oaths and knew they did so when they voted for the civil rights bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator goes too far. What I say is that they had doubts.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will say to the Senator one thing: whatever may have been Mr. BINGHAM's motives in bringing it forward, he brought it forward some time before the civil rights bill was considered at all and had it referred to the committee, and it was discussed in the committee long before the civil rights bill was passed. Then I will say to him further, that during all the discussion in the committee that I heard nothing was ever said about the civil rights bill in connection with that. It was placed on entirely different grounds.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will ask the Senator from Maine this question: if Congress, under the Constitution now has the power to declare that "all persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign Power, excluding Indians not taxed, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States," what is the necessity of amending the Constitution at all on this subject?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not choose that the Senator shall get off from the issue he presented. I meet him right there on the first issue. If he wants my opinion upon other questions, he can ask it afterward. He was saying that the committee of fifteen brought this proposition forward for a specific object.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I said the committee of fifteen brought it forward because they had doubts as to the constitutional power of Congress to pass the civil rights bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Exactly; and I say, in reply, that if they had doubts, no such doubts were stated in the committee of fifteen, and the matter was not put on that ground at all. There was no question raised about the civil rights bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Then I put the question to the Senator: if there are no doubts, why amend the Constitution on that subject?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That question the Senator may answer to suit himself. It has no reference to the civil rights bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That does not meet the case at all. If my friend maintains that at this moment the Constitution of the United States, without amendment, gives all the power you ask, why do you put this new amendment into it on that subject?

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator from Wisconsin wishes an answer, I will give him one such as I am able to give.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I was asking the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HOWARD. I was a member of the same committee, and the Senator's observations apply to me equally with the Senator from Maine. We desired to put this question of citizenship and the rights of citizens and freedmen under the civil rights bill beyond the legislative power of such gentlemen as the Senator from Wisconsin, who would pull the whole system up by the roots and destroy it, and expose the freedmen again to the oppressions of their old masters.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator has made his answer, I suppose.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, when the Senator undertakes to say that I have any disposition to subject the freedmen to the despotism of their old masters, he says that which there is not a particle of foundation or excuse for saying. I say to that Senator—

Mr. HOWARD. I beg the Senator to allow me one word. I made no personal imputation against the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to finish my sentence before being interrupted.

Mr. HOWARD. I will not be forced by the Senator into a false position.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not desire to be interrupted until I finish one sentence. I say to that Senator that so far as the rights of the freedmen are concerned, I am willing to compare my course of action in this body or elsewhere with his. I say to that Senator that I labored as hard as he has labored to secure the rights and liberties of the freedmen, to emancipate the slaves of the South, and to put an end forever not only to slavery, but to the aristocracy that was founded upon it; and I have never, by word or deed, said or done anything, as a member of this body or elsewhere, tending to build up any oppression against the freedmen, tending to destroy any of their rights. I say to that honorable Senator, and I am ready at any time to meet him in argument upon it although it is drawing me now from the question in dispute, that I myself prepared and introduced here and urged a bill whose provisions defended every right of the freedmen just as much as the bill to which we have now made reference, and I am prepared to do so and to defend their rights with the whole power of the Government.

But, sir, the Senator has drawn me off from the immediate question before the Senate. The immediate question is, whether the language which he uses, "all persons subject to the jurisdiction of the United States," includes these Indians. I maintain that it does; and, therefore, for the purpose of relieving it from any doubt, for the purpose of excluding this class of persons, as they are, in my judgment, utterly unfit to be citizens of the United States, I have proposed this amendment, which I borrow from the Constitution as it stands, which our fathers adopted more than seventy years ago, which I find also in the civil rights bill which passed this present Congress, and which I find also in the second section of this constitutional amendment when applied to the enumeration of the inhabitants of the States. I insist that it is just, proper in every way, but reasonable, that we exclude the wild Indians from being regarded or held as citizens of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would not agree to this proposed constitutional amendment if I supposed it made Indians not taxed citizens of the United States. But I am satisfied that, giving to the amendment a fair and reasonable construction, it does not include Indians not taxed. The first and second sections of this proposed amendment are to be taken together, are to be construed together, and the meaning of the word "citizens," as employed in both sections, is to be determined from the manner in which that word is used in both of those sections. Section one provides that—

All persons born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

If there be any doubt about the meaning of that paragraph, I think that doubt is entirely removed by the second section, for by the second section of this constitutional amendment Indians not taxed are not counted at all in the basis of representation. The words in the second section are as follows:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within the Union, according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed.

They are not to be regarded as persons to be counted under any circumstances. Indians not taxed are not even entitled to be counted as persons in the basis of representation under any circumstances; and then the section provides—

But whenever, in any State, the elective franchise shall be denied to any portion of its male inhabitants, being citizens of the United States, &c.

Now, can any reasonable man conclude that the word "citizens" there applies to Indians not taxed, or includes Indians not taxed, when they are expressly excluded from the basis of representation and cannot even be taken into the enumeration of persons upon whom representation is to be based? I think it is perfectly clear, when you put the first and second sections together, that Indians not taxed are excluded from the term "citizens;" because it cannot be supposed for one moment that the term "citizens," as employed in these two sections, is intended to apply to Indians who are not even counted under any circumstances as a part of the basis of representation. I therefore think that the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin is clearly unnecessary. I do not believe that "Indians not taxed" are included, and I understand that to be a description of Indians who maintain their tribal relations and who are not in all respects subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

In one sense, all persons born within the geographical limits of the United States are subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, but they are not subject to the jurisdiction of the United States in every sense. Take the child of an ambassador. In one sense, that child born in the United States is subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, because if that child commits the crime of murder, or commits any other crime against the laws of the country, to a certain extent he is subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, but not in every respect; and so with these Indians. All persons living within a judicial district may be said, in one sense, to be subject to the jurisdiction of the court in that district, but they are not in every sense subject to the jurisdiction of the court until they are brought, by proper process, within the reach of the power of the court. I understand the words here, "subject to the jurisdiction of the United States," to mean fully and completely subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. If there was any doubt as to the meaning of those words, I think that doubt is entirely removed and explained by the words in the subsequent section; and believing that, in any court or by any intelligent person, these two sections would be construed not to include Indians not taxed, I do not think the amendment is necessary.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not presume that any one will pretend to disguise the fact that the object of this first section is simply to declare that negroes shall be citizens of the United States. There can be no other object in it, I presume, than a further extension of the legislative kindness and beneficence of Congress toward that class of people.

"The poor Indian, whose untutored mind, Sees God in clouds, or hears him in the wind," was not thought of. I say this not meaning it to be any reflection upon the honorable committee who reported the amendment, because for all the gentlemen composing it I have a high respect personally; but that is evidently the object. I have no doubt myself of the correctness of the position, as a question of law, taken by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin; but, sir, I feel disposed to vote against his amendment, because if these negroes are to be made citizens of the United States, I can see no reason in justice or in right why the Indians should not be made citizens. If our citizens are to be increased in this wholesale manner, I cannot turn my back upon that persecuted race, among whom are many intelligent, educated men, and embrace as fellow-citizens the negro race. I therefore, as at present advised, for the reasons I have given, shall vote against the proposition of my friend from Wisconsin, although I believe, as a matter of law, that his statements are correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I desire to have the amendment to the amendment read.

The Secretary read the amendment to the amendment, which was to insert after the word

"thereof" in the amendment the words "excluding Indians not taxed;" so that the amendment, if amended, would read:

All persons born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, excluding Indians not taxed, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 10, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Norton, and Riddle—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Dixon, Lane of Indiana, Nesmith, Saulsbury, Sprague, Wright, and Yates—9.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was in section two, line twenty-two, after the word "male," to strike out the word "citizens" and insert "inhabitants, being citizens of the United States;" so as to make the section read:

Sec. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within the Union, according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But whenever, in any State, the elective franchise shall be denied to any portion of its male inhabitants, being citizens of the United States, not less than twenty-one years of age, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation in such State shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it supposed that that amendment changes the section as it was before? It appears to me to be the same as it was before, because, although the word "inhabitants" is used, it is in connection with the other words that they are to be citizens of the United States. As it originally stood it read:

But whenever, in any State, the elective franchise shall be denied to any portion of its male citizens.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The object is the same as in the amendment already made, to prevent a State from saying that although a person is a citizen of the United States he is not a citizen of the State.

Mr. HOWARD. The object is to make section two conform to section one, to make them harmonize.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am satisfied.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Is it in order now to offer an amendment to the first section?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are several more amendments before the Senate, offered by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] not yet acted upon. The next amendment offered by him will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to add at the end of section two the words "in such State."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as section three the following:

Sec. 3. That no person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two thirds of each House, remove such disability.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "shall" in the thirty-seventh line the words "during the term of his office." I presume I understand the idea upon which this section rests. It is, I suppose, that men who held office, and upon assuming the office took the oath prescribed by the Constitution, became obligated by that oath to stand by the Constitution and the oath, and that going into the rebellion was not only a breach of their allegiance, but a breach of their oath. I presume that is the theory of it; and that persons who have violated the oath to support the Constitution of the United States ought not to be allowed to hold any office. If it does not rest upon that proposition, then I am not able to see why these men should be excluded more than others who have violated their allegiance. Now, sir, what is the obligation prescribed in the sixth article of the Constitution?

"The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution."

I presume that that oath means that in the discharge of the duties of the office the party will support the Constitution of the United States. I have not examined any authorities upon this subject, and have seen no opinion expressed upon it, but I presume that is the meaning and force of the oath. When a Senator of the United States takes the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, it means that, as a Senator, in the discharge of his official duty, he will obey the Constitution, and in no respect violate its provisions. If a member of a State Legislature takes that oath, I presume it means that as a legislator for the State he will respect and obey the Constitution, and when his term of office has expired I suppose the oath ceases to be obligatory upon him, or, rather, that the oath has done its work. If he has obeyed the oath while he held the office, I presume his obedience to it is no longer required by virtue of the oath itself. Everybody, by virtue of his allegiance, is bound to obey the Constitution of the United States, to stand by the Union. But this oath of itself is an oath of office binding upon him as an officer, else why is it that if a Senator taking this oath, serves six years and is reelected, he is sworn again? For the simple reason that he is entering upon another term of service, and for that term of service he must take this official oath to obey the Constitution of the United States. I presume this oath means as if it read, "Senators and Representatives and all other officers in the United States and in the States shall be bound by an oath or affirmation to support the Constitution of the United States in their offices." I know of no other purpose that there can be to require a special oath from an officer.

If this be the proper construction of the oath—and I do not express an opinion upon the subject with a great deal of confidence—then the amendment which I propose to this section ought to be adopted, because after the term of service has expired in any particular office the official oath is satisfied, and the party becomes one of the mass of the community, and if he went into the rebellion he went into it violating his allegiance, like any and all other citizens who with him went into the rebellion. It is for that reason that I propose the amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope this amendment will not be adopted. I do not regard the constitutional oath referred to by the Senator from Indiana precisely in the same light in which he presents it. If I understand him rightly, he holds that although a person may have taken that constitutional oath, if he has not committed insurrection during the continuance of his term of office, but commits that act after the expiration of that term, the previous taking of the oath by him adds to the act no additional moral guilt. I do not concur with him in that view. It seems to me that where a person has taken a solemn oath to support the Constitution of the United States there is a fair moral implication that he cannot afterward commit an act which in its effect would destroy the Constitution of the United States without incurring the guilt of at least moral perjury. I desire to see such a comment made upon this violation of the oath of office by insurgents as will stigmatize that act for all time to come, and I think the loyal people of the United States are of the same opinion.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I had supposed that the Senate would adopt this amendment without any discussion. The proposition of the Senator from Indiana, in my judgment, is so plain that I did not suppose it could have been questioned, that the oath a person takes when he enters upon the exercise of an office, or as preparatory to the discharge of the duties of an office, relates simply and solely to that office and does not extend beyond it. I never heard the interpretation of the oath of office as given by the Senator from Indiana questioned before. I shall therefore vote for his amendment.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. If I understand the language and effect of this amendment, it is intended to debar those who were under that oath of office at the time they went into rebellion from hereafter holding office either under the State or national Government. I certainly concur with the Senator from Indiana, that the binding force of an official oath only continues as long as the term of the office. If it is the intention to exclude from these privileges any one who has ever held an office under the national Government or the State governments, then the language of the section is correct as it is; but if it is intended to confine it to those who were at the moment of separating themselves from the Government and going over to the rebellion under the obligation of an oath to support the Constitution, then I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana should be adopted. We all admit that the obligation to support the Constitution is as binding on every citizen of the United States as an oath can make it, and that in fact oaths in most cases are of no effect except to have a most solemn acknowledgment of the duty that the oath seems to many to impose; but it does add something to the guilt of the party that at the time he engaged in rebellion he was actually under the obligation of an oath to support the Constitution. I shall favor the amendment if the object is to exclude those who were in the actual exercise of these offices, and therefore under the binding force of their official oaths, at the moment that they embarked in the rebellion. Whatever view the majority have of it of course should govern the language employed; but understanding that the word "oath" is here introduced to designate that class of persons, I shall vote with the Senator from Indiana for his amendment. It would have been sufficient, if the other view was to prevail, to have said that no one who had ever held office under the General or State government should have these privileges, and then there would be no necessity of course for introducing this amendment. I hope that it will prevail, because while it will exclude a very great many it will still leave some to hold office in the southern States, especially in those States where they will have very few qualified persons, and where many, we may infer, have a less degree of guilt at least than those whom this amendment will exclude.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am opposed to the amendment as proposed by the committee, and shall vote, therefore, for the amendment suggested by the member from Indiana, because the former excludes too many persons from eligibility to office. All history shows, as I think, that on the conclusion of a civil war, the more mild, consistently with the safety of the country, the measures are which are adopted the better for the restoration of entire peace and harmony.

The effect of the amendment of the committee will be to embrace nine tenths, perhaps, of the gentlemen of the South, to disfranchise them until Congress shall think proper by a majority of two thirds of each branch to remove the restriction. I have no idea that with a provision like this, the constitutional amendment will receive the sanction of any southern State, for if the suggestion of the member from Indiana is not adopted then all who have at any time held any office under the United States or who have been in any branch of the Legislature of a State, which they could not be without taking the oath required by the Constitution of the United States, are to be excluded from holding the office of Senator or Representative or that of an elector for President, or any office, civil or military, under the United States; and not satisfied with that, all who have held office under any State, military or civil, legislative or judicial, are to fall within the inhibition.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Those who have been members of a State Legislature.

Mr. JOHNSON. And all that have held judicial office. They are all obliged to take the oath.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will observe it is following the constitutional provision.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know it is. But all the members of the State Legislature, all the judicial officers of the State, are compelled to take the oath prescribed by the Constitution of the United States; and I suppose it is fair to estimate that persons will be excluded who held office twenty and thirty years ago, as well as those who held office at the time the rebellion broke out. Now, I put it to Senators to say whether they think that these southern States will, with such a restriction as that, accept this constitutional amendment. If the amendment was in separate articles, so that each article might be acted upon separately by the States, the rejection of some of the articles would not be so fatal, perhaps, as will be a rejection of the whole. Suppose the whole is rejected, and it must be if any part is, where are we? Just where we are now. Where are we now? As far as arms are concerned, peace has returned; as far as harmony is concerned, peace is apparently as far off as ever; and what is to be the effect upon the prosperity of the States which are to be kept in this condition of thralldom? Who will go as immigrants into the southern States? Who will invest their capital, who will engage in the cultivation of cotton and of rice and of sugar? And just in proportion as these products are lessened, just so in proportion is the prosperity of the whole country delayed.

I have had occasion to say more than once, and the idea is so fully impressed upon my mind that I hope the Senate will excuse me for reiterating it, that we ought to consider, it is due to justice to consider, it is due to generosity and magnanimity to consider, that many of the men who will be excluded by this constitutional amendment from sharing in the honors of the country believed that the Constitution as it stood gave them the right to secede. Illegal as the notion was in my judgment, yet some of the brightest intellects in the country, North as well as South, maintained the same doctrine; and the war, therefore, in which we have been engaged was not a war like the civil wars which have existed in other countries. It was a war growing out of a difference of constitutional opinion, to say nothing of anything else. The opinion entertained by the South was as honest as was the opinion entertained by the North—wrong, dangerous, unconstitutional, inconsistent as I think it is with the continuance of any Union to be formed out of the States of the United States, but still honestly entertained. Now they have become satisfied by the result of the conflict that their doctrine was one which could not be maintained and never will be suffered to exist as long as the people of the United States are true to the interest and the prosperity and renown of the country.

Why, then, should we exclude the numerous class that will be excluded by this provision? Do you not want to act upon the public opinion of the masses of the South? Do you not want to win them back to loyalty? And if you do, why strike at the men who, of all others, are most influential and can bring about the end which we all have at heart? That my friend from Indiana properly construes the obligation of that oath I have no doubt. I think every lawyer in the Senate would say, every statesman within the sound of my voice would say, that for no act done after the termination of the official term of the officer, inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, by him who had been the incumbent of the office, could he be indicted for perjury; and if he could not be indicted for perjury, it could only be because the legal obligation of the oath—I am not speaking now of the moral obligation—expired at the termination of the term of office to which the party had been elected or appointed.

Then as to the moral obligation, what does it add to the force of that moral obligation which allegiance as between the Government and the party owing the allegiance creates? Treason has been committed against the United States, according to the letter of the law and according to our understanding of the law; but it is neither more nor less treason, it is not a milder or more aggravated type of treason, because the parties who may have committed it may at some time or other have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. If any man was indicted who had not taken that oath, he could not be permitted to urge in his defense or in extenuation of his crime that he had never taken an oath to support the Constitution.

But this amendment does not go far enough. I suppose the framers of the amendment thought it was necessary to provide for such an exigency. I do not see but that any one of these gentlemen may be elected President or Vice President of the United States, and why did you omit to exclude them? I do not understand them to be excluded from the privilege of holding the two highest offices in the gift of the nation. No man is to be a Senator or Representative or an elector for President or Vice President—

Mr. MORRILL. Let me call the Senator's attention to the words "or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States."

Mr. JOHNSON. Perhaps I am wrong as to the exclusion from the Presidency; no doubt I am; but I was misled by noticing the specific exclusion in the case of Senators and Representatives. But I submit to the Senate whether it is advisable, whether it is politic, looking to the end which we all seek to accomplish, the true restoration of the Union, a union of hearts as well as a union of hands, that you should exclude the large mass of people from participating in the honors of the Government who will be excluded by this provision.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I am inclined to vote for this amendment without going into a criticism upon the legal effect of the oath. I am against the section altogether on account of its proscriptive nature. I will vote for the amendment, because if it be adopted it will reduce the number to whom the section will apply. I should be glad if now, after having been so many months in session, we had agreed among ourselves as to the conciliation of the South, because conciliation at last is our only true policy; for unless we come to agree with each other; unless we are able again to meet and unite in these Halls as citizens and representatives of a common country, to shape the destinies of that country in Congress, to direct it against embattled nations, if it shall become necessary, we are not a united people.

This third section is not an act of conciliation, it is an act of proscription. It is true it is not as extensive as the third section sent to us from the other House was. I think we have gained an advantage in that respect. That measure was intended to proscribe all the active population of the rebel States, because they all stood by the southern movement. This section as it now stands certainly proscribes the representative men of the South, the men who had influence, and who still have influence in their localities, and who can do more in the work of conciliation here and elsewhere than all the men that you leave out of it. They are the representative men of the South, they have the confidence of the people of that section of the country. I think they have given abundant evidence that they are satisfied that they have tried the game of secession and given it up honestly and entirely, and are willing to come back to join in the Government heart and hand, and carry forward its flag, looking to the bright destiny of this nation in the future. The amendment will make the section less proscriptive, diminish the number which fall victims under its rule, and for that reason I shall vote for it. Now is the hour for conciliation, now is the time to trust in the South.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is proper, perhaps, I should say that I do not expect to vote for the third section whether the amendment which I propose be adopted or not; but I suppose that I understood the purpose of the caucus, from which this amendment came, to be to exclude the men who violated their oath of office when they went into the rebellion, who added moral perjury to the crime of violating their allegiance. I thought the language went further than the caucus intended, and therefore I moved this amendment with a view of confining the section to the very case which I had a right to presume was intended to be met. If my amendment be adopted, it will leave the section to exclude all persons who at the time they went into the rebellion were under the obligation of an official oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would ask my friend, the Senator from Indiana, whether it excludes those who resigned an office in the United States Army, for instance, for the purpose of going into the rebellion. Does not his amendment exclude from the operation of the section those who held office under the United States, resigned it, and then went into the insurrection, as in the case of General Lee?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think not. If the Senator will observe the language he will see that it has not the effect which he fears. I use the words "during the term of his office." A man's term does not expire because he resigns his office. If a man holds an office the term of which the law fixes at four years, the term is four years. If he holds an office during good behavior, the term is thus fixed; the resignation of an officer does not put an end to the term; that is judicially settled. In some of the States, for political purposes, it is provided in the constitution that a man elected to a judicial office shall not, during the term of the office for which he was elected, be eligible to any other office. Judicial officers holding office under a constitution like that have resigned during the term and been elected to other offices, executive, perhaps, in their character, and the courts have always held that they could not take the office to which they were elected when the term of the previous office was fixed by law. That is clear law, I presume, so that I think the word "term" excludes all men who, at the time they went into the rebellion, were under the obligation of an official oath to support the United States Constitution.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I hope the Senator will make that point clear.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If these words will make it any more conclusive, I am willing to say, "during the term of office for which he was elected or appointed;" but I think the expression "during the term of the office" is equally comprehensive.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know that it is worth while to discuss the precise effect of the amendment, because I think the Senator from Indiana is satisfied that his amendment will not prevail; but the objection which occurred to me the moment it was offered was, that it would relieve from the operation of the third section the very men who ought to be excluded from ever hereafter holding office under the United States. Take the case of Senators holding seats as members of this body who resigned their seats here and went directly to the South and took up arms. The term of their office in some cases expired by limitation on the 4th of March after they retired from here, and before they actually took up arms; and yet, on leaving this Senate Chamber, they proceeded to the South and organized rebellion, and they would be relieved from the operation of this section by the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

So in the case of officers of the Army and Navy, all of whom had sufficient respect for the oath which they had taken to resign their offices and to see carefully that their resignations were accepted, so that the termination of their office was authenticated in the records of the War Department and the Navy Department. Then, having put an end to their offices under the United States, they proceeded to the South and organized rebellion against the Government of the United States. They would, in my judgment, be relieved from the operation of the third section.

But I take it all of us understand the meaning of the third section. It is that, for a time at least, all who have violated not only the letter but the spirit of the oath of office they took when they became officers of the United States, and took the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, shall not hold office until a state of affairs shall come when two thirds of both Houses may, by a general amnesty, wipe out all these disabilities; and it seems to me that this is a reasonable stipulation, one that the United States may exact. After the attempted revolution in England in 1745, the English Government was considered extremely liberal when, two years after the Pretender had been overthrown by force of arms, all the pains and penalties imposed by Great Britain on his adherents were removed, except the power to hold office; and I believe all who took part in that rebellion were forever disfranchised from holding an office of honor, trust, or profit in the kingdom of Great Britain. It was considered extremely liberal that all the other penalties of treason were removed.

The effect of this section is simply to remove all the penalties that rest on these men for treason except the power to hold office; and if a new generation of men should hold all the offices in the southern States; if the young men who are now growing up should hold all the offices of honor, trust, and profit there, I think no harm would result. If those men who have once taken an oath of office to support the Constitution of the United States and have violated that oath in spirit by taking up arms against the Government of the United States are to be deprived for a time at least of holding office, it is not a very severe stipulation.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 8, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Van Winkle—8.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Cowan, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—34.

ABSENT.—Messrs. Brown, Dixon, McDougall, Nesmith, Sprague, Wright, and Yates—7.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move now to amend the amendment by striking out all after "States" in line thirty-five down to the word "State" in line thirty-six. The words which I propose to strike out are "or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State." I ask for the yeas and nays on this.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COWAN. I am opposed to this section in toto. I am opposed to the infliction of punishment of any kind upon anybody unless by fair trial where the party himself is summoned and heard in due course of law. I am as much opposed to a bill of pains and penalties, or to the exercise of judicial power by Congress through the medium of an amendment to the Constitution, as I am opposed to it in an act of Congress where it is expressly forbidden, and in any vote which I give upon propositions to modify this section I do not wish to be understood as being willing to vote for that principle in any event.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 10, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, Norton, Riddle, and Saulsbury—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Dixon, McDougall, Nesmith, Sprague, Wright, and Yates—7.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON. I now move to amend the amendment by striking out in line thirty-three the words "having previously taken" and inserting "at any time within ten years preceding the 1st of January, 1861, had taken;" so as to make it read:

No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who at any time within ten years preceding the 1st of January, 1861, had taken an oath as a member of Congress, &c.

I ask for the yeas and nays on this proposition.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 10, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, Norton, Riddle, and Saulsbury—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Dixon, McDougall, Nesmith, Sprague, Wright, and Yates—7.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] to insert the words which have been read as the third section of the proposed article of amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I am induced, by a remark made by the Senator from Ohio, to make an inquiry. I understood him to say that the meaning of the last clause of this section, which clause tends to reconcile me to the whole section, is that there can only be a general removal of the disability by a general amnesty; and although he did not say distinctly that there could not be a removal of the disability in an individual case, I should like to know what is the understanding, at least of the mover of this proposition, in reference to that point. This is to go into our Constitution and to stand to govern future insurrection as well as the present; and I should like to have that point definitely understood. I would suggest, although I do not make the motion, that instead of "two thirds of each House" we should insert "a majority of all the members elected to each House." It strikes me that it is very difficult to get a two-thirds majority unless under very peculiar circumstances on anything, and that a majority of all the members elected to each House, which is being substituted for the two-thirds vote in many of our State Legislatures, would be sufficient in the present case.

Mr. HOWARD. If I understood the inquiry put by the honorable Senator from West Virginia, it was whether the latter clause in section three would not require a general act to be passed by Congress removing the disabilities in all cases. I do not so understand the clause. I understand that the clause gives to Congress full discretionary power to grant an amnesty in an individual case, when applied for, or a part of the whole. Any portion of persons here proscribed may be pardoned, or rather this disability may be removed as to any portion of them in detail or in gross. In short, I regard it as a discretionary authority given to Congress, to be exercised by Congress in individual instances, or in any other form that Congress may see fit to exercise the power. I entertain no doubt whatever that such will be the construction that will be put upon it.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I am entirely satisfied with the explanation; but I was induced to make the inquiry by a remark of the Senator from Ohio, who, I supposed, spoke with knowledge, that it only applied to a general amnesty. The language certainly would cover the removal of the disability in individual cases.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not hear the Senator from West Virginia, and I beg him to repeat his statement.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I say I am satisfied with the explanation made by the Senator from Michigan; but I had understood the Senator from Ohio while up a few moments ago to give the last clause of this amendment the interpretation that it would not be in the power of Congress to remove the disability in individual cases. I understood the Senator from Ohio to say that Congress would have the power by a general amnesty to remove this disability. The Senator spoke generally. He may not have intended to contradict the other power; and I made the inquiry to be certain on that point.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt that the larger power includes the other. The power to make a general amnesty would include the power to make an amnesty as to classes or particular individuals. I do not think there is any doubt about that.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "House" in the fortieth line, the words "and the President may by the exercising of the pardoning power;" so as to make the clause read:

Congress may by a vote of two thirds of each House, and the President may by the exercise of the pardoning power, remove such disability.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope that amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I call for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 10, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, Norton, Riddle, and Saulsbury—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Dixon, McDougall, Nesmith, Sprague, Wright, and Yates—7.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan to insert certain words as the third section.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will state briefly why I cannot vote for this amendment as a substitute for the third section of the resolution which has been stricken out. My first reason is that by a law of Congress now all persons mentioned in this section are excluded from holding any of these offices. The oath that is required by a law of Congress to be taken by every person holding an office under the United States—

Mr. TRUMBULL. Does that prevent their holding a State office?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No; it does not prevent the holding of a State office, but it prevents them from holding any office under the Government of the United States, and that is as far as I think we ought to go. No person can be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or an elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, under the law as it now stands, who does not take an oath that he has not participated in the rebellion. The oath which we require at their hands prevents any such persons from holding any such offices. That law is upon our statute-book. That law will remain upon the statute-book just as long as Congress in its judgment shall think best to retain it. And, sir, there is, in my judgment, no danger whatever, no apprehension, that that law will be taken from our statute-book so long as the public interests require that it should there remain. Therefore, in my judgment, it is not necessary to adopt any such constitutional amendment, because this amendment contains a clause putting it in the power of Congress to put an end to the effect of this provision. It is true that it requires two thirds of Congress in order to do it, whereas under the law as it now stands a majority of Congress could change the existing law on that subject. What I maintain is this: Congress is the representative of the American people; Congress speaks the will of the American people, and I do not think that it is in accordance with our system of government, which presumes that Congress speaks for the people, to suppose that a majority of Congress will repeal this oath until a majority of the people of the United States are in favor of doing so; and when a majority of the people are in favor of universal amnesty they have a right to express that opinion and to have universal amnesty.

I undertake to say that upon no principle of statesmanship or Christianity, whether you derive your conclusions from the experience of history, the teachings of Christianity, or the teachings of a wise statesmanship, can you desire to retain in this country any considerable portion of its people who shall be under the ban of eternal proscription. What, Mr. President, is the duty of the Government, having suppressed the rebellion? It is to punish the guilty leaders under the law of the land; it is to bring them to punishment; and the duty of Congress is, if there is anything which stands in the way and which Congress can remove, to pass such laws as may expedite the trials of the great offenders. The great offenders should be tried and punished, and those that you do not try and do not punish should not be held under proscription, the unrelenting, eternal enemies of the Republic.

Again, Mr. President, this provision, if it passes, will have the effect of putting a new punishment, not prescribed by the laws, upon all those persons who are embraced within its provisions. Nobody can doubt that. It is in the nature of a bill of pains and penalties, imposed by constitutional enactment it is true, but it is a punishment different from the punishment now prescribed by law. What is the effect of adopting it? What is the legal effect of adopting a new punishment for an offense which has already been committed? It repeals the old punishment, and that cannot be inflicted. If to-day the punishment for the crime of murder is death, and to-morrow you change your punishment to imprisonment for life, the old penalty is repealed; it cannot be inflicted upon a culprit who has been guilty previous to the passage of the law. Such has been decided by the courts many times to be the law; and if by a constitutional amendment you impose a new punishment upon a class of offenders who are guilty of crime already, you wipe out the old punishment as to them, not as to those who are not embraced within this. This only embraces a particular class of individuals who have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. Now, I do not propose to wipe out the penalties that these men have incurred by their treason against the Government; but I would punish a sufficient number of them to make treason odious. I would punish the leaders, those who were instrumental in bringing on this rebellion; but to the masses I would give amnesty.

Mr. NYE. How many would you like to hang?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator himself stated the other day that five or six would be enough to hang.

Mr. NYE. Do you acquiesce in that?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think I ought to be satisfied if the Senator from Nevada is satisfied with five or six.

But, Mr. President, I have another objection which weighs, perhaps, still more upon my mind than those I have stated. The insertion of this section into this constitutional amendment, if these provisions are not to be submitted separately, tends to prevent the adoption of the amendment by a sufficient number of States to ratify it. You say every day that you cannot get a jury under the laws of several of the States, Virginia and others; that to-day the state of public opinion is such that you cannot get a jury who would convict a person of crime, and yet you propose to submit this constitutional amendment to be passed upon by the people of those States to determine the question whether they will adopt a constitutional amendment upon a popular vote, which constitutional amendment on its face declares that all of those men who have ever taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States are forever to be excluded from holding office under the United States or within the State unless two thirds of Congress will consent to give them the privilege.

Sir, what States will adopt it? It is possible that some one, two, perhaps three, of those States to be affected by this amendment may adopt it.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Four will accept that part of it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. What four?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Virginia, Tennessee, Arkansas, and Louisiana. I saw some gentlemen on Monday from Tennessee, and talked with them about this particular clause, and they told me it would be the most popular thing that could be tendered. And the very men that you want to hang ought to accept it joyfully in lieu of their hanging. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from Kansas, perhaps, has information on this subject that other Senators do not possess.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I saw those gentlemen on Monday.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not know who those particular gentlemen were. Were they the gentlemen that deserved hanging or not? [Laughter.]

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. They were conservatives from Tennessee.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President—

Mr. SHERMAN. If it will not interrupt my friend from Wisconsin I should like to ask him a question, whether there is in history an example of an insurrection of the most ordinary character terminating with no punishment to any man, no deprivation of property, no deprivation of franchise, no deprivation of any right whatever except the right to hold office; whether ever more generous terms were held out to persons who had been engaged in insurrection than are here proposed?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand, then, my friend, the Senator from Ohio, to admit that adopting this section does away with all further punishment.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I do not think this will prevent your hanging four or five.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understood the Senator by his question to admit that adopting this repeals all other penalties as against the men included within the section.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all. If the Senator wants to take the blood of four or five I am perfectly willing.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I deem this entirely unnecessary, as I stated at the beginning. I deem it as the adoption of a new punishment as to the persons who are embraced within its provisions, and therefore the abolition of the existing punishment; and I deem it as tending to prevent the adoption of the amendment by a sufficient number of States to secure the ratification of the other part of the constitutional amendment. If this is to be inserted as a part of the amendment, to be submitted as a part and parcel of the whole, so that the whole must be taken together and the different sections shall not be acted upon separately, it will tend to prevent its adoption, and preventing its adoption has no other tendency or effect than to keep open this difficulty for years to come.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not suppose we shall get any vote on this matter to-night. If I thought so I should not take up any time; but I can hardly forbear saying a word or two in reply to the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE.] They seem to have peculiar notions in Wisconsin in regard to offices, and the Senator who has just taken his seat regards it as a punishment that a man cannot hold an office. Why, sir, how many suffering people there must be in this land! He says this is a bill of pains and penalties because certain persons cannot hold office; and he even seems to think it would be preferable in some instances to be hanged. He wants to know of the Senator from Ohio if such persons are to be excepted. This clause, I suppose, will not embrace those who are to be hanged. When hung they will cease to suffer the pains and penalties of being kept out of office. I recollect having seen in the newspapers—I do not know whether it is true or not; I very seldom allude to newspaper articles—but I saw in some of the newspapers that an officer of this Government, who was supposed to control some patronage in the minor offices of the country, spoke of the officers as "eating the bread and butter of the President." I recollect the Senator from Wisconsin himself, in a speech some days ago, spoke of the President's officers. The President has got no officers.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I never stated that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator spoke of their being responsible to the President.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. So I did, and that is a fact.

Mr. TRUMBULL. How so?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. They are responsible to the President.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They are responsible to the law of the land and not to the President.

Mr. DOOLITTLE rose.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let the Senator keep cool. I undertake to say that a person holding office, who does not acknowledge his responsibility to the law and his oath of office, but to a President, is not fit to be an officer. No officer is responsible to the President, but his responsibility is to the law under which he acts. The President is not omnipotent in this country. He does not create offices; he cannot appoint an individual to the humblest office in the land except in pursuance of the Constitution and the law. He himself is responsible to the Constitution and the law, and so is the most inferior postmaster in the land. This idea that the offices of this country belong to the President, that men eat his bread and butter, is very erroneous. Why, sir, the President feeds nobody. It is derogatory to the position of any man who holds an office to talk of his eating the bread and butter of the President and being responsible to the President and not to his oath of office, to the law and the Constitution.

Why, sir, who ever heard of such a proposition as that laid down by the Senator from Wisconsin, that a bill excluding men from office is a bill of pains and penalties and punishment? The Constitution of the United States declares that no one but a native-born citizen of the United States shall be President of the United States. Does, then, every person living in this land who does not happen to have been born within its jurisdiction undergo pains and penalties and punishment all his life, because by the Constitution he is ineligible to the Presidency? This is the Senator's position.

But he tells us that there is no necessity for this clause; and why? Oh, we have a law that excludes from office every one of these individuals. Have we? How long is it since the Senator from Wisconsin stood up in this body and with loud voice proclaimed to the Senate and the nation that each House should judge for itself whether members should be admitted into the body, and that Congress had no right to decide upon it? Now he tells us that we have a law which excludes all these persons from office, and he does not want it in the Constitution. How long is it since he argued and urged here that the Senate should decide for itself whether the rebellious States were fit to be represented or not? To-day he tells us we have a law which prevents each House from admitting disloyal persons. I am glad the Senator is disposed to obey the law; and I trust we shall hear no more of his saying that it is for the Senate exclusively to decide, irrespective of law, whether persons are to be admitted to seats.

I know that each House is the judge of the elections, the qualifications, and the returns of its own members under the Constitution; but each House is not made the judge of whether there is a constituency authorized to representation or not. That is a question proper to be decided by the joint action of both Houses. Each House may have the physical power to decide it, but Senators have no right to vote that the representatives of Maximilian in Mexico, of Napoleon in France, or of the people of Canada, shall be admitted to seats here; and they have just as little right to admit the representatives of any other people not recognized by law as entitled to representation, as they have to admit representatives from Mexico, or France, or Canada. But the Senator says that this provision excluding leading rebels from office will not be accepted in the South. Sir, has it come to this, that the leaders of the infamous rebellion who undertook to overthrow the Government, who marshaled armies and maintained a war against it for four or five years, when put down by force of arms cannot be deprived of the privilege of holding offices? The Senator says the South will not accept it; but, sir, they have gone further than this in Maryland, in Tennessee, in West Virginia, in Missouri. Everywhere in the South where loyal men have the control they not only exclude the leading traitors from office, but also from the right of suffrage.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. And so in Arkansas.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In Arkansas also, I am reminded by the Senator from Kansas. Sir, the object of this provision is to place these rebellious States in the hands of loyal men. Is the Senator from Wisconsin opposed to it? Does he want to put the control of these States in the hands of disloyal men? If he does not, then vote for this provision. That is all there is to it, and if the time ever comes, as I trust it will, when these leaders shall be cured of their malignity toward the Union, when they shall be willing to treat loyal men and Union men fairly and justly, it will be in the power of Congress to remove the disability; and if the people of these localities are then willing to trust the repentant rebels they can elect them to office. Sir, it is intended to put some sort of stigma, some sort of odium upon the leaders of this rebellion, and no other way is left to do it but by some provision of this kind. The Senator wants it in a law. Sir, what would it be good for in a law? So far as the members of this body and of the other House are concerned, the Constitution of the United States has provided the qualifications for a Senator and for a Representative, and it has been held more than once that it is incompetent to add to those qualifications by law. You may do it by a change of the Constitution, and hence the propriety of putting it here. The test oath is a different thing. The oath does not go to the qualification, but to the discharge of the duties subsequently, and the requirement of the oath may be constitutional when a direct disqualification imposed by law would not be constitutional.

That is a proposition, however, which I do not propose to argue at this time. I rose merely to repel the idea that it was imposing pains and penalties to deprive a man from holding office. I rose to repel the idea that the offices of this country belonged to the President, and that men who held them were living upon his bounty; to show that the oath was not a sufficient protection; and that to have the proper protection against leading rebels being elevated to office, not by Union men but by the rebels, it was necessary to insert a clause of this kind. We find that every southern State which is in the hands of loyal men, although it may have been formerly engaged in this rebellion, has not only excluded from office, but from the right of suffrage also, all the leading traitors; and, sir, I apprehend that this proposition will be a popular provision with loyal men, and how the disloyal regard it is not a matter of so much consequence.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President—

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator will yield I will move an adjournment.

Mr. GRIMES. Let us go into executive session.

Several SENATORS. It is too late.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If there is any business in executive session desirable to be done, I will give way.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. ["No, no; it is too late."]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Several SENATORS. Let us adjourn.

The question being put on Mr. GRIMES's motion, a division was called for.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is any controversy about it, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 30, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be the call of committees for reports, commencing with the select committee on war debts of loyal States.

WAR DEBTS OF LOYAL STATES.

Mr. BLAINE. I am instructed by the committee on war debts of loyal States to report a bill to reimburse the States which have furnished troops to the Union Army for advances made and expenses incurred in raising the same. On a conference with the members of the special committee and the friends of this bill generally in the House, I find an indisposition to consider and press it at this time. I have, therefore, yielded my own judgment in regard to it and make the following motion: that the bill be recommitted to the select committee on war debts of loyal States, and that the same be continued as now organized, with leave to report at the next session, by bill or otherwise.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

WAR DEBTS OF KANSAS.

Mr. BLAINE, from the same committee, reported back House bill No. 259, to reimburse the State of Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed House bill No. 11, to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communication among the several States; with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

AIR-LINE RAILROAD.

Mr. STEVENS. I am instructed by the select committee on a military and postal railroad from Washington to New York to report back House bill No. 91, to authorize the building of a military and postal railroad from Washington, District of Columbia, to the city of New York. I do not see the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. F. THOMAS] in the House, and such being the case, I move that the bill be recommitted, and now enter a motion to reconsider, giving notice that I shall call it up in about a week.

It was ordered accordingly.

RAILROAD LINE TO THE NORTHWEST.

Mr. STEVENS, from the same committee, reported back House bill No. 527, to promote the construction of a line of railroads between the city of Washington and the Northwest, for national purposes.

The bill, which was read, is as follows:

A bill to promote the construction of a line of railroads between the city of Washington and the Northwest, for national purposes.

Whereas there is now a complete line of railroad between the city of Washington and Cumberland, in Allegany county, in the State of Maryland, which is about being shortened nearly fifty miles by a line from said city of Washington to the Point of Rocks, on the Potomac river, in Frederick county, in said State; and whereas a company has been incorporated by the State of Maryland to construct a railroad from Cumberland aforesaid to the Pennsylvania line in the direction of Pittsburg, designed to connect with a railroad in Pennsylvania to the latter city; and whereas the Pittsburg and Connellsville Railroad Company, incorporated by the State of Pennsylvania, has completed a railroad from Pittsburg to Connellsville, on a line to connect with the Maryland road aforesaid; and whereas but a comparatively short distance between Cumberland and Pittsburg remains to be completed to furnish, with the railroad between Washington and Cumberland, a direct railroad communication, by a short and advantageous route, between Washington city and Pittsburg, and the connections with the Northwest from the latter city; and whereas the Legislature of Pennsylvania has attempted to create impediments in connecting the railroad so as aforesaid authorized to be built in Pennsylvania and Maryland, which prevent at this time the completion of a work of national importance, and has thereby attempted to impair the value of a franchise under which the citizens of Maryland and Pennsylvania have made large investments; and whereas it is proper for military and postal purposes, and especially to facilitate and regulate commercial intercourse among the States: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Pittsburg and Connellsville Railroad Company of Pennsylvania and the Pittsburg and Connellsville Railroad Company of Maryland be, and they are hereby, authorized to complete their respective works, and to unite the same so as to form one continuous line between Cumberland and Pittsburg, according to the powers given to the said companies in and by their respective charters as originally granted, and the supplements thereto, so far as they are not inconsistent with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall willfully do, or cause to be done, any act or acts whatever whereby any building, structure, or other work, or any engine, car, or machine, or other property appertaining to the railroad so to be constructed shall be injured, impaired, destroyed, or stopped, the person or persons so offending shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof by any court of competent jurisdiction, shall be punished by fine not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment not less than one year nor more than five years, or both, at the discretion of the court, and shall also forfeit and pay to the parties aforesaid, their associates, successors, or assigns, double the amount of damages sustained by means of such offenses, to be recovered by the parties aforesaid, with costs of suit, by action of debt or case.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the lines of railway carrying the mails of the United States which may be or are now constructed under the authority of either of the States through which the railroad hereby authorized shall pass, and all railroads in the United States, by their connections, shall have the right to connect for the purpose of transportation with the said railway company, as aforesaid, on fair and equal terms, as now customary upon main lines in the United States: Provided, That the said lines of railway so claiming the right to connect shall reciprocate in traffic with the line hereby authorized, upon the same terms and without any discrimination or prejudice against it. Such connecting lines shall have the right to sell through tickets, check through baggage, and transport freights in such manner and upon such terms as are customary between connecting lines of railway. And through tickets, through checks for baggage, and through receipts for freights shall be furnished by the line hereby authorized over such lines of railway as may connect with it, and as the traveler and shipper or consignor may select, and without discrimination or prejudice to any one or more of said connecting lines of railway.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any suit or proceeding, either in law or equity, or any criminal prosecution, shall be commenced in any State court against the said companies, their successors, or assigns, or any person authorized or employed by them, for any act done or omitted to be done in and about the construction and use of the railroad hereby authorized under and by virtue of this act, or to restrain, by injunction or otherwise, the construction, completion, or operation of the said railroad, or for any damages growing out of the use of the same, or construction thereof, and the defendant shall, at the time of entering his appearance or within thirty days thereafter, in such courts in said action or proceeding, file a petition, stating the facts and verified by affidavits, for the removal of the cause for the trial at the next circuit court of the United States to be holden in the district where such suit or prosecution is pending, and offer good and sufficient security for his filing in such circuit court, on the first day of its next session, copies of the process and other proceedings against him in such State court, and also for his appearing in such circuit court, and entering special bail in the cause of proceeding, (if special bail was originally required therein,) it then shall be the duty of the State court to accept the security, and proceed no further in the cause or prosecution; and the bail that shall have been originally taken in such State court shall be discharged. And upon such copies being filed as aforesaid, in such circuit court of the United States, the cause or prosecution shall proceed therein in the same manner as if it had been brought in such circuit court, whatever may be the amount in dispute or the damage claimed, or whatever may be the citizenship of the parties, any law to the contrary notwithstanding. And any attachment of the goods or the estate of the defendant by original process from such State court shall hold the goods and estate so attached to answer the final judgment, in the same manner as by the laws of such State they would have been holden to answer final judgment had it been rendered in the court in which the suit or prosecution was commenced; and from any final judgment rendered in any such suit or prosecution by such circuit courts, writ of error shall lie to the Supreme Court of the United States, whatever may be the amount of such judgment, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the said line of railroad, with the ferries, crossings, bridges, and roadway, hereby authorized to be constructed, and the parts of existing railways which may become a part of the said road, shall be deemed and considered a national public highway and post road, with which all the principal railway lines and mail routes in the United States, either now constructed or hereafter to be constructed, shall have the right to connect for transportation purposes on fair and equitable terms. And such connecting lines shall, at all times, have the right to sell through tickets and check through baggage, in such manner and upon such terms as are now or may hereafter be customary between the connecting lines of the country. And the corporation herein mentioned shall, so far as may be practicable, furnish through tickets to passengers and through checks for baggage over such connecting lines of railway as the traveler may select, and without discrimination or prejudice to any one or more of said connecting lines. And the company shall provide all their night passenger trains a sufficient number of first-class sleeping-cars with all modern improvements and all proper and necessary bedding to fully accommodate the public, and the tariff of prices in addition to the regular rate of fare shall not exceed three dollars for a stateroom, one dollar for a double and fifty cents for a single berth.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That said corporations shall make an annual report of their operations to the Secretary of the Interior in such form and containing such items of information as he may prescribe; said report to be verified by the certificates, under oath, of the president, treasurer, chief engineer, and general superintendent of such corporations or railways.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the said corporations shall, as soon as practicable, so commence and prosecute the work of constructing and equipping said railroad that it shall be fully completed and equipped in three years from and after the passage of this act.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be deemed and taken as a public act, and as such, notice shall be taken of it by the courts, without the necessity of pleading the same.

Mr. STEVENS. Unless some gentleman desires to oppose the bill, I shall call for the previous question.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know that I am opposed to the bill, but I should like to have some explanation of it. It strikes me as a most extraordinary bill on which to demand the previous question. I think it ought to have an amendment that the county commissioners throughout the United States shall be abolished and let Congress do their duties.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman will move to confine the operations to his own county in Maine, I will not object.

Mr. BLAINE. My own county is not one that invokes the special power of Congress for such a purpose.

Mr. STEVENS. I call the previous question.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope we shall have some little discussion.

The question being taken on seconding the demand for the previous question, no quorum voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. STEVENS and ANCONA were appointed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Is this a bill to open communication with the West?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir; by the Baltimore and Ohio railroad to Pittsburg.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 28.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for the reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. It is not here, and the bill goes to the Speaker's table.

Mr. STEVENS. What will be its condition?

The SPEAKER. After the morning hour the majority may make an order to go to the business on the Speaker's table, and then it will come up.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not consider that a fair way of opposing it.

Subsequently Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

CLEVELAND AND MAHONING RAILROAD.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the select committee on a military and postal railroad from Washington to New York, reported back House bill No. 537, to authorize the Cleveland and Mahoning Railroad Company, a corporation created and existing under the laws of the States of Ohio and Pennsylvania, to continue and construct the railroad of said company from the village of Youngstown, Mahoning county, in said State of Ohio, to and into the said State of Pennsylvania, and thence by the most advantageous and practicable route to the city of Pittsburg in said State of Pennsylvania, and to establish said road as a military, postal, and commercial railroad of the United States.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read in full.

Mr. LE BLOND. I wish to inquire in what stage this bill is before the House.

The SPEAKER. It was read a first and second time, referred to the committee, and reported back; and the question now is on ordering it to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. LE BLOND. I have not had an opportunity to examine the bill, but it seems to embrace features which, if I understand them aright, I can under no circumstances vote for. I therefore call for the reading of the engrossed bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman cannot do that until it has been ordered to be engrossed.

The SPEAKER. After the previous question is seconded and the main question ordered, if the bill is ordered to be engrossed the gentleman can then demand the reading of the engrossed bill.

Mr. LE BLOND. I shall reserve that right.

Mr. GARFIELD. The grounds on which this bill is based are almost identical with those which gave rise to the Pittsburg and Connellsville bill that has just passed to its third reading, and is now on the Speaker's table awaiting engrossment. I desire to explain, in a few words, the points involved in both these measures.

In 1851 the State of Ohio, before we had a general railroad law, chartered the Cleveland and Mahoning Railroad Company, and authorized it to construct a railroad from the city of Cleveland to Youngstown, and thence down the Mahoning valley to the Pennsylvania line, and in the year 1853 the State of Pennsylvania chartered a company made up of the same corporators and authorized them to construct a road from the State line, and connecting with the Cleveland and Mahoning road, to the city of Pittsburg. So that in 1853 the company was authorized by the Legislatures of the two States to build a road from the city of Cleveland to the city of Pittsburg on the most direct route possible, making a line of one hundred and thirty-four miles between the two cities, sixteen miles shorter than any existing road, and almost in a direct line with the Pittsburg and Connellsville line, through Cumberland, connecting thence to the Point of Rocks, and making, when the roads shall be completed, a continuous line between Cleveland and Washington, eighty-four miles shorter than any existing line, and the shortest possible route between those two cities. When sixty-seven miles of this road were completed and the remainder of the route surveyed and the money raised for its construction, the Legislature of Pennsylvania, in May of 1864, repealed the charter of the Pennsylvania portion of the road, and we are thus shut out from this direct avenue to Pittsburg, and the value of the investment has been very seriously diminished. Thus, if I am correctly informed, by the overwhelming influence of a railroad corporation in Pennsylvania, acting through the Legislature, the Pennsylvania end of the enterprise is overthrown, and the company, with all its expenses, with its paid-up stock, and everything ready to complete it, has had its charter knocked out from under it. Our people have applied to the Legislature of Pennsylvania to do them justice and allow the work to go on, and thus secure the opening of a direct communication between the West and the Atlantic sea-board, but they have never been able to get either sort of relief or justice. They have been referred to railroad committees, and railroad committees have referred them to railroad presidents and managers, but to no purpose.

After repeated efforts to secure their rights from the Legislature of Pennsylvania, they have now appealed to Congress and ask to be defended in their rights and privileges and allowed by authority of Congress to go forward and complete this line of roads, which is a work of great national importance. The road contemplated in this bill will open up one of the richest mineral valleys of the country to direct communication with the Atlantic sea-board. The Mahoning valley abounds in iron ore and coal, and is vitally and intimately connected with the Lake Superior iron interest. Vast quantities of Lake Superior iron are brought to that valley and mixed with our Ohio ore, and when melted by the use of our coal makes a quality of iron equal to the best Swedish iron, and according to the test of the Navy Department the finest iron produced in the United States. The great interests thus proposed to be opened are in some measure paralyzed by the action of the Legislature of Pennsylvania. That State sits between the Atlantic and the West forbidding transit across her territory except by the route already provided, which is in the hands of a gigantic monopoly. No member of Congress from the West can reach this city from the lakes unless he shall go eighty-four miles out of the way through Pittsburg and Harrisburg and Baltimore; and the people of the West, as well as those of New England, demand that there shall be free communication between these two sections of the Union, and that no State Legislature shall obstruct or hinder it.

Mr. STEVENS. The people of Pennsylvania demand it also.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no doubt of that. I believe it is for the best interest of Pennsylvania that this line should be opened.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would ask the gentleman whether this bill confers any other powers on the corporation than those derived from the charters originally granted by the States of Ohio and Pennsylvania.

Mr. GARFIELD. It does not, except in this: it provides that the same contingency which has happened in the case of the Connellsville road shall not happen in this case, namely, that when the charter of the Pennsylvania end of the road had been repealed and the parties applied to the circuit court of the United States, which decided that the repeal was unconstitutional, adverse parties then went to the State courts and undertook to obstruct its operations by vexatious suits of various kinds.

Mr. BLAINE. Do I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to say that the State courts have overruled the decisions of the United States courts?

Mr. GARFIELD. I say that suits were brought in the State courts for injunctions against passing over certain lands along the road. Now, I wish to say that it is provided in this bill that the company may go to the district or circuit court of the United States and obtain the right of way. That is the additional legislation in this bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would ask the gentleman if this bill recognizes and preserves the identical corporation created by the acts of the Legislatures of the States of Ohio and Pennsylvania.

Mr. GARFIELD. It does. This bill is not in the interest of any set of men to create them a corporation. It simply declares that the corporation created by the Legislatures of the States of Ohio and Pennsylvania may go forward in accordance with the terms of its charter and complete the work as its charter authorized it to do, notwithstanding the repeal of that charter.

Mr. O'NEILL. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: has the State of Pennsylvania violated any right which was given to this railroad company when it was incorporated by the Legislature of Pennsylvania?

Mr. GARFIELD. In no other way than by taking away all the rights which had vested in the corporation, and that, too, after it had expended large sums of money, and had a large portion of its road completed and in running order. If that is not taking away any rights, then it has not taken away any of them. And this, let me say, was done without a hearing, without any legal process in the courts, but by the mere force of votes in the Legislature.

Mr. O'NEILL. Just as this bill may be passed here, by the mere brute force of this House. I would now ask the gentleman another question. I have not seen the charter of this road in so far as it runs through the State of Pennsylvania; but I presume in that charter there was a limit of time in which this road was to be finished and completed. I desire to know whether that time had expired when this charter was repealed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania. That State is not in the habit of taking away or interfering with vested rights.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am glad to hear the last statement of the gentleman, for the most of us had the contrary opinion.

Mr. O'NEILL. I am glad to have been able to correct the gentleman.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to repeat that nothing but the mere force of votes in the Legislature took away this charter; not based upon any decision of the court or any violation of the charter, but simply upon the action of the Legislature of Pennsylvania.

Mr. O'NEILL. I venture to say before this House that the Legislature of Pennsylvania has not taken away from this corporation any vested right. And I will say further, that there is no evidence before this House that the people of Pennsylvania demand the passage of any such legislation as this here. The people of Pennsylvania believe that they have rights which their own Legislature can give them, and with which Congress has no right to interfere.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to resume the floor, as the morning hour has nearly expired.

Mr. HALE. I desire to ask the gentleman, if it be true that the Legislature of Pennsylvania has taken away vested rights, what has prevented the enforcement and vindication of those rights through the courts?

Mr. GARFIELD. After this Pittsburg and Connellsville Company had secured in the circuit court of the United States a decision declaring the repeal of the charter unconstitutional, still all along the line of the road suits were brought on minor questions, obstacles were thrown in the way, so that company cannot successfully go forward with the work, or secure subscriptions to their stock, unless they can have some higher assurance that they will be protected in their rights, and they therefore ask that Congress shall declare these roads postal and military roads and commercial highways, and thus give them the high sanction of the national legislature that they may go forward without fear of disturbance or interruption.

Mr. PAINE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to give us some further information upon the point embraced in the inquiry of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON:] that is, as to the corporation that is to exercise the rights conferred by this bill. I believe I am right when I say that this Cleveland and Mahoning Railroad Company, having finished their road to Youngstown, have leased that road for a long term, perhaps for ninety-nine years, to the Atlantic and Great Western Railway Company, in which Sir Morton Peto was interested. Now, I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio whether I am right in this, and also whether, if this bill be passed, the rights and franchises conveyed by it will pass to the Cleveland and Mahoning Railroad Company, or to the English company to which I have referred.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not to the English company. The Cleveland and Mahoning Railroad Company, although they have leased a part of their road, have preserved their organization intact.

Mr. BLAINE. For how long have they granted a lease?

Mr. GARFIELD. For ninety-nine years.

Mr. BLAINE. Is it not for nine hundred and ninety-nine years?

Mr. GARFIELD. No, sir. Although the company has leased a branch of its road the corporation still preserves its distinct character, and is going forward as a corporation to complete its road.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio. If this corporation has granted away its franchises, can it, by virtue of a new grant from us, resume its franchises and prevent its grantees from exercising those franchises?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know that I quite understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know the facts in this case; but I desire to submit this inquiry to the gentleman from Ohio: if it be true that this company has granted these rights to an English company—

Mr. GARFIELD. Let me interrupt the gentleman just here to say that the company has merely leased the use of a portion of its road to an English company. It has not sold its franchises.

Mr. BLAINE. For how long has the lease been granted?

Mr. GARFIELD. For ninety-nine years, as I have already stated.

Mr. BLAINE. With the privilege of renewal.

Mr. DAWES. Let me conclude the question I was putting—

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the bill goes over until to-morrow.

RIOT AT MEMPHIS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in response to a resolution of the House of the 28th instant, transmitting two reports of Major General Stoneman concerning the recent riot at Memphis.

The communication, with the accompanying documents, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CLARK, of Ohio, asked leave of absence for Mr. BUNDY.

Leave was granted.

DRAWBACKS UNDER INTERNAL REVENUE ACT.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to inquire whether the rules and regulations prescribed for obtaining evidence of exportation to entitle exporters to the benefit of drawback under the act to provide internal revenue are not unnecessarily expensive and burdensome, and whether existing rules upon that subject ought not to be revised and amended; and that the said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

CIRCUIT COURT.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to authorize judges to be allotted to hold circuit courts; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CRIMES AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill to repeal certain parts of the act approved April 30, 1790, entitled "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROCEEDINGS IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill to amend an act regulating proceedings in criminal cases, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1865; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The morning hour having expired, the House, agreeably to order, resumed the consideration of House bill No. 543, to restore to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights, on which Mr. BROMWELL was entitled to the floor.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, I deem myself fortunate in being permitted to take any part in the work of pacification and restoration of the Government upon which we have entered. I would even deem myself fortunate to be permitted to speak at this time if it were possible for me to vindicate the great principles embodied in these measures in so ample a manner as the occasion requires.

As when the war of the Revolution had ended it was the work of years to define the principles and settle the forms of this Government, so now, when this war of independence has terminated, the task remains to repair as far as possible the disasters of the nation, and provide for the restoration and reconstruction of our institutions upon such principles and by such means as will secure to all the inhabitants of this Union the blessings of free, orderly, and permanent Government.

I do not say that this must be the work of years. I do not wish to see any further delay in this matter than is absolutely necessary to secure the most complete and successful results; but I will say that no wise man can expect to accomplish these ends by hot haste in such a work as this. Wherefore I have been and still am for the most mature deliberation, and the closest scrutiny into the principles of our Government, and into every requirement of this emergency which the subject will admit. Could I have my way, I would exhaust every power of this Congress, and all the laws of nations, and the laws of war so far as they are in agreement with our Constitution; and if those were not sufficient I would amend our organic law until it should no longer be under the reproach of being insufficient in that point which is vital in all constitutions.

I cannot but regard the series of measures which have been in part adopted, and are in part still pending before this House, as among the most notable which the world has ever seen; for if we consider the vast extent of territory over which they will act, the millions of beings whose condition they will affect, and the grand destinies directly and indirectly involved in their operation, we may venture to assign to these measures an importance in the eyes of future historians and statesmen second to none the world has seen; not even the famous Magna Charta, the Declaration of American Independence, the Ukase of Freedom of the Czar of all the Russias, nor all these if combined.

It is to be expected measures like these which dedicate half a continent to equal rights, which strike down by a series of blows every form of despotism and unshackle a whole nation in a day, should meet with every form of opposition, and should call up against them every interest, passion, and prejudice which has warred against liberty until now.

For why, Mr. Speaker, is it that all men, everywhere, are not now and have not been at all times free? Is it because every man has not desired freedom for himself? Is it because society has not at all times desired freedom for all society? On the contrary, liberty, the same of which we now speak, has been the watchword of all nations. It has been the theme of the poet, orator, and statesman, from the rude chant of Skald and Trouvere to the polished sentences of Roman jurists or of the philosophers of the modern world, all have spoken and breathed for liberty, yet nations which loved liberty have lived in chains; democracies have organized oligarchies; oligarchies have crawled as slaves to despots; and despotism has generated anarchy; and thus the world has struggled on groaning through shifting scenes of turmoil and oppression until now, with scarcely a spot on the whole surface of the globe where organized freedom has been secured to the body of the people.

It is because liberty exists in its securities and not in its promulgation, and because nations have ignored the only security the case admits of, that liberty has been defeated first and last.

There is but one security, and that is justice. He who would enlarge the area of freedom must first enlarge the area of justice, for justice and liberty are twin sisters; they cannot be separated. Where justice reigns liberty takes up her abode and is without an enemy in the whole domain.

For this reason, as we have seen, the Revolution of 1776 fell short of accomplishing all which it might have accomplished, because entire justice had not been done in this country in laying the foundations of the Government. For this reason we have seen a bill guarantying civil rights in our day met with opposition, precisely such as the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, and precisely such opposition as has met every measure of freedom from the beginning until now.

Though the results achieved by the Revolution of 1776 fell far short of what might have been attained, yet we still boast with pride that during a period of twenty years, including the time of the Revolution itself, more was done for freedom than during twenty centuries before. Therefore we may well look back and take a lesson from the past.

Ninety years ago the people of this country were united in an effort to rid themselves from transatlantic tyranny. At this season of that memorable year, after the battles of Lexington and Bunker Hill had been fought, the multitudes of the cities and the scattered dwellers in the mountains and valleys were perplexed and oppressed with the weight of the great problems then forced upon them. The long agitation of years had brought a crisis, and war, terrible in its destruction and unmeasured in its burdens, or political servitude for themselves and their posterity, must then be chosen. Who cannot see that at such a crisis as that radical measures, and radical measures only, could suffice? Who will not see that any such tinkering as is called conservatism would have been a mockery at such an hour, when the destiny of the nation was to be settled by measures absolute and firm?

And now, sir, what do we see? A like crisis has come upon us; and now, when that element of wrong which was left in this Government has worked on until the terrible convulsion it has produced has destroyed the institutions of government in one third of the States; when the people are just returning from the terrible conflict which raged from border to border of the land, what do we hear? The self-same arguments, the same outcry, which rang in the ears of the radicals of the Revolution. Centralism, radicalism, ultraism, despotism—these are the cries. The reserved rights of the States are brought up. And in this outcry, as it now finds support in the dispensing power and patronage that is brought to its aid, not only those who have been long known and recognized as enemies of everything like progress and humanity, but others who loved to walk with liberty and with justice when they wore their silver slippers, now join in calling the men who stood by the civil rights bill tinklers of the Constitution. These men would walk upright with the great Union and Republican party, which achieved this victory for law and order, if it were not for some reason or other better to walk halt, limp, and cry out as they see an opportunity to bring thrift by so doing from those that are in power for the time being. They are like that minister in the kingdom of Assyria, who, having come up to the prophet of the Lord with loud professions of veneration for Jehovah in acknowledgment of the great favor conferred on him, finally said:

"In this thing, the Lord pardon thy servant, that when my master goeth into the house of Rimmon to worship there, and he leaneth on my hand, and I bow myself in the house of Rimmon; when I bow down myself in the house of Rimmon, the Lord pardon thy servant in this thing."

Every man whose master leans on his arm is in the house of Rimmon, while the rights of humanity are being invaded, and while everything for which the war has been fought through seas of blood is being trampled and defiled.

The civil rights bill, which stands prominent among those measures which have been before the House, has been met by opposition from this class of men. But that law will stand among the immortal things of the world when the men whose voices have been raised against it shall be forgotten, all at least but one of them, and his memory perpetuated in the continuous astonishment of successive generations that a man could be found who would consent to place the veto of official power upon that measure at such a time. I am not here to-day either to call for vengeance on the South or to hurl back epithets of disrespect which have been thrown upon both branches of this Congress, including some of the most noble minds that the country contains. But I am here to say that it would be well for some of those who fancy they stand high in the seat of power to reflect upon that which is to come when the pen of history shall record the fate of those who dared to cast themselves beneath the wheels of progress at such an hour as this.

Mr. Speaker, there is one thing further I will say, and I say it in pain, but I will say it because it springs not only from my own heart but from the hearts of this whole people who feel the warm blood of their fathers gushing about their hearts when they think that our martyred President lies in his bloody grave, and that assassination has changed the Administration. I speak of it in pain. I would not by this heap obloquy upon any official of the United States, but I will speak for my country. Have we ever known, since the Government came into existence, or did we ever dream that it should happen in the history of America, that this thing should be; that such a lesson should be taught the world as has been taught in olden lands and in Mexico and other disturbed and distracted countries; that the knife of the assassin could smite down the head of the nation and thereupon it should be lawful for a man to change the administration of affairs, thus holding forth a perpetual invitation to every party which will arise in the struggles of this country to imitate that example and reap the reward? We have had nothing in our history which we can contemplate with greater, more terrible foreboding than this most melancholy spectacle, and the people feel it. Ah! they feel it as they walk in the shadows of Oak Ridge, where sleeps the murdered champion of our liberties and rights. Who can contemplate without a shudder the spectacle we now present and the terrible consequences of such a precedent as this?

Now, sir, when all other arguments are exhausted, the opponents of these bills and amendments claim, as a last resort, that State rights are invaded. What are State rights, sir? Reserved rights. And what are the reserved rights of the States? Manifestly they are legal rights which were existing anterior to the Union and inherent in the States. Could a State reserve any other rights than these? The States clearly reserved the rights they had, and not the rights they had not. Now, was it ever known in the world that a State could reserve a right or have a right, either in this Union or out of it, to do manifest injustice? The rights reserved by the States must be inherent rights; and if we inquire what are inherent rights, we are referred to the compact of society. What is the compact of society? The legal fiction by which each man is supposed to have given up a portion of his rights that he might come in and enjoy the privileges and immunities which society bestows. To suppose that one man gives up more than another or gives up the same to receive less than another, or that one class of society gives up more than another or gives up the same to receive less than another, is to suppose a fraud upon that individual or class. It is to deny the compact of society by denying mutuality therein, for mutuality is the essence of every contract, even in one made in terms, the parties being present and consenting; and much more so as to a contract which never was in fact made, but is supposed in order to found a right in all to affect the rights of each.

The States never had the right, and therefore never reserved it, to fight against and oppose such measures as these. Why, sir, the very object of establishing this Government was to make it sure that no Government should ever exist upon this continent capable of denying or having the power to deny these rights. This is why we are to-day citizens of this Republic.

Again, I say that justice is what we must have as the security of freedom or we are destroyed. What says the ancient maxim concerning the duty and discretion of judges? Discretio est discernere per legem justitiam—that the judge shall discern justice by the law. This maxim, like any other of transcendent truth, affirms two truths at once. First, that the judge shall discern justice by the law, and not otherwise. Secondly, that by the law he shall discern justice, and not anything else. This, bear in mind, is the maxim concerning the discretion of the judge, a dispenser of justice according to laws already formed. But with how much more force does it apply to the legislator. When he comes to lay down the first principles of law and build a government, he must go by the law, and in that law discern justice and nothing else. Now, I maintain that the series of measures here proposed, and which have been partly passed, have embodied in them more of justice and more of freedom and more of magnanimity than the world has ever seen in any similar case, or than those engaged in this rebellion had any right to expect.

In regard to the constitutional amendment and the disfranchisement it provides, about which so much has been said, let it be borne in mind that the Constitution, of which our friends are so tenacious, makes these men traitors, the punishment of whom is death, as provided by their fathers and not by us. Therefore, since they come before us stripped of their rights by their own offenses, this, as I take it, is an enabling act to them which confers upon them rights that they had no ground to claim, and in a very limited time of probation restores them to the position in which they stood when they cast their rights, civil and political, into the furnace of this rebellion. Then there is a proposition for changing the basis of representation. For one, I cannot do otherwise than support that proposition, for I had the honor to write with my own hand and bring the same proposition last January to this House, and after so modifying it that it should not even say that a State might under any circumstances, disfranchise any of its inhabitants, offered it here. And having so done, I stand by it to-day as I stood by it then, and as I gave on that occasion all the reasons

I had to urge in favor of its adoption I will not repeat them now.

Upon those rational and reasonable propositions being ratified by the people, this bill comes in and says that these insurrectionary States shall again come back into the family of the Union with the rights which they forfeited when they attempted to strike down the Government of their country. But this bill is assailed at once; just as in a court of law there can be found attorneys ready to take the side of any criminal however vile, so in the field of politics, and in the forum of this nation, you find men who are ever ready to defend the last right, ay, and the last wrong of these traitors, from the chief arch-conspirator who is now luxuriating at Fortress Monroe, down to Semmes, who made the ocean red with the blood and fire he brought upon our shelterless commerce.

Mr. WRIGHT. Why do you not try that arch-traitor, as you call him?

Mr. BROMWELL. Because I am not a judge nor a prosecuting attorney, and have nothing to do with it. But I say these men do not lack defenders. There are apologists for these traitors; there are men who to-day are using every means to make "the worse appear the better cause," and gild over and varnish their most damnable crimes that posterity may gaze upon them as heroes in a "lost cause." That is the term they now use, "our lost cause." Doubtless there will be soon to hear from another "lost cause" in this country, and I trust in God there may.

I allude to the attempt to foist upon us in this country a third party, having neither object nor aim, unless it be to prop up and force the traitors into the power from which they were driven by the war. I think it will soon be upon the same ground as the "lost cause," for the American people have not stood at the guns for four years in vain, and borne the burdens and sorrows of war for naught; they are not now to gather the apples of Sodom when they come to pluck the fruits of victory. It may be partly successful for a time; but let me ask those who stand up for it to bear in mind that ancient maxim to which I have before now called their attention, that "the feet of the avenging gods are shod with wool." They move as noiselessly and as surely as the foot of time. The retribution may not be heralded in its coming, but its advance is inevitable as fate. The falsities and subterfuges of men will melt as snow before the anger of the American people, who are now bearded and mocked by the men who were lately defying our flag and laws as leaders of the rebel armies.

These bills, sir, present a most magnanimous picture of the minds of our people; and I am glad they do. I am not here to curse the South. I do not wish to punish the South. I only ask for justice and security; but these I will demand until the latest hour. But God do so to me if to-day I would vote on a solitary bill in this House from any motive of revenge, or with a desire to humiliate or make mean any people within the bounds of our broad Republic.

The grand cause of our troubles, slavery, has we know benefited the South more than the North. But I am not here prepared to charge the South alone with all the crime. If the ocean was paved with the bones of captives dying on their way to the southern markets, ships of the North were furnished to carry on the horrid traffic. If a southern taskmaster cracked his whip above the trembling victim in the rice swamp, the northern money-changer shut out the sound by the jingle of the gold which the barbarian produced for us. If the bloodhound tore the flesh from the victim, as he fled from brutal and savage punishment, the jails of the North yawned for his cowering form even when he appealed for protection at the altars of Christ the Lord.

It was in a land of civilization these things were done. It was in a land of Bibles these things were done. Who wonders, then, that the punishment fell upon us? Who wonders that our rivers ran with blood, and that the earth was honeycombed with graves? Who wonders that the angel of destruction spread his wings upon the smoke of a thousand battle-fields and rode on the flames of consuming cities through half our land? It was but one of the retributions which this nation brought upon itself.

Now, sir, I come to a principle of law which no man will deny. I say that if there is one obligation on earth which a man is bound to respect more than all others, it is the obligation of a trust. We are the trustees of that unfortunate race who have been our victims. We are not so created by any law; we are not so appointed by any court; but we are "trustees in our own wrong." We made ourselves such, and we cannot shirk off the duty. It is because our people feel the weight of this truth that they are ready to support such measures as the Freedmen's Bureau bill, which has been sneered at and scoffed at as paying out the hard-earned money of the people for "lazy niggers," not admitting the truth that it paid more for white refugees, the victims of this rebellion. Sir, if it paid ten times as much for the black man it would not discharge the debt of blood and sweat and groans which is heaped up against this people.

We are trustees of that unfortunate race. We brought them here. They are turned loose on our hands. Other nations have lands and homes and property, but these people have nothing we would allow them to call their own. And I cannot see how a man can find it in his heart to turn round at this hour, when thousands of them are turned penniless from the fields where they bore our flag, and with his soul squatting in its cavern meanly count the vile pennies that would serve to give himself the title patent of manhood if he would stand up and take the responsibilities which himself and his God have imposed on him.

When all else fails, we are reminded of Mr. Lincoln's policy; we are told that Mr. Lincoln's was identical with this policy which paves the way for the entrance of the rebels into power and scatters palms and flowers under their feet—this policy which shuts the door in the face of the black man and the loyal white man of the South.

Who was Abraham Lincoln? And why do these apologists for treason and slavery appeal to him? I, too, can speak of Abraham Lincoln, for I can do so without the consciousness that in his life-time, during the years of his patience and perplexity and pain, I had spoken of him otherwise. I will not tell you how much I was his friend, for that would be to signalize my own regard for virtue. I will not try to express to you my feelings on that doleful day, and since, for the interior feelings of the heart shrink from expression, and this the more so as they are more interior and worthy of a man. But I will speak of one thing, that he was great. It may not affect these measures that he was so, but we may well inquire why it was so. What was the quality in him which made him so? The people, the world, and we have said that he was great, that henceforth his name must stand with those of the most illustrious few; those chosen and separated in the minds of men, even from the multitude of world-wide renown; those whose moral forms rise from distance to distance along the river of centuries, as the pyramids, complete and eternal, tower above wrecks, and rubbish along the desert-bound, mysterious Nile.

Abraham Lincoln was great. The people say it in their cottages where he was a welcomed and an equal guest; the cities, from their palaces, at whose portals the great rose up to do him reverence; the traveler by the wayside; the soldiers from their tents; and we have assembled in the capital of the nation to confirm and write it down. Why was he great? It was not because of birth. It was not because of education. It was not because of eloquence; although he had uttered some of the most eloquent sentences in the language. It was not by military prowess, for he never commanded in the field. What was it? The truth is, the people saw in him something they never expected to see—a ruler of a great, powerful, and turbulent nation devoted to the truth above all things; to human rights as the foundation of all governmental institutions. They saw in him a man clad with power such as no scepter ever wielded, who walked humbly before his God, whose presence and authority he was not ashamed to recognize in every act of his official career. They heard words from him which touched the tenderest and subtlest chords of human feeling; words which pierced the coverings of interest and prejudice, and silenced the obdurate passions which those who possess them still wish to subdue; words filled with truth and wisdom and charity, as the choice and heavy grains of the harvest are filled with nutriment and life; words which appealed to the obscured nobleness of the human soul, winning and drawing by reciprocal influences of sympathy, until the affections of men's hearts everywhere stretched forth their eager and grasping tendrils to twine about his own, and Abraham Lincoln became the good St. John of the new dispensation now dawning on the world, and which I trust will soon be set up by the American people in the name of God and humanity.

Well may we come up here to celebrate by words and acts his life-long devotion to high principles, those distinguished deeds which have made his name familiar and will make it familiar to the eye and ear of men until the tablets of history shall crumble beneath the corrosions of the ages or the waters of oblivion whelm the choral bark of song. Deeds which have not only canonized but apotheosized him in the hearts of the American people, since his shed blood before our eyes has realized the mythic legend of the beloved Baldur slain by the enemy of light and truth. And here let me ask, why were we so shocked by his assassination? Why did we look on it, not as murder but as profanation, not as a crime of earth but as an assault of hell? Why is it that we feel to-day as though we could not be content unless we could express, by visible signs, our horror of the crime? Is it not for the same reason that the ancients cast dust in the air when they saw the divine truth profaned by acts of sacrilege; because that justice and liberty are stricken down by the blow which smote the beloved Chief Magistrate of this Republic; because it was but another of those strokes which have been aimed so often at the life of the nation, and which, as the life-long champion of the principles of the Declaration of American Independence, he received in his own body as the head and front of the American nation which that charter founded? Disguise it as we may, deny it as we can, the reason why the world and we have been so much moved, is not that a man was slain, but that a champion had fallen; not that a champion only, but that the champion of a cause was smitten; not that a cause was assaulted, but that the cause in which all men have an interest dearer than life was stricken by his death-blow.

There is but one way to honor Abraham Lincoln. It is not by crying out that his policy was this or that; it is not by going with tears and sighs to his grave; but it is by laying the foundations of this Government on the principles he professed; by carrying them out as he did in every sphere of life through which he passed, from the beginning when he worked as a tiller of western soil, up to that hour when on the steps of this Capitol he uttered his second inaugural address, so different from all the state papers of the world, which yet rings through our ears as the voice of one of the ancient prophets who spoke for Jehovah Sabaoth to the hosts of Israel. It is only by doing this that we can accomplish the end we have in view. Without this our sorrow for him is but grief dressed up for an occasion that sounding eulogies may invite applause. But when we lay the foundations of this Government in truth and justice and the protection of human rights, then we may welcome in that golden-age of which he spoke in words that I will borrow now that I may clothe my own with their transcendent beauty, when he said:

"The chords of memory stretching from every battle-field and patriot grave to every heart and hearth-stone in this broad land shall yet swell the chorus of the Union when they shall be touched, as they surely will be, by the better angels of our nature."

Welcome, such angels, welcome to this Hall, and at this hour. Come, Liberty, come, Union, come, Peace; clasp your hands, and rest once more your folding wings beside the altar of our common country.

Mr. HART obtained the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. With the consent of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HART,] who yields to me for that purpose, I desire to move that this subject be postponed until Monday next after the morning hour. I make the motion at the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] of the reconstruction committee, who, being upon the invalid list, has been compelled to retire to his lodgings.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

PAY OF THE ARMY.

The SPEAKER stated that the next special order was bill of the House No. 450, to reduce and establish the pay of the officers and to regulate the pay of the soldiers of the armies of the United States.

Mr. SCHENCK. In order to facilitate the consideration of this bill, and to enable amendments to be offered directly to it, I will ask that the substitute reported by the Committee on Military Affairs be considered as the original bill.

No objection was made, and the substitute reported by the Committee on Military Affairs was read in lieu of the original bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will inquire of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] if he proposes to make any provision for the pay of a general.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have an amendment to propose which will meet the point of the inquiry of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

Mr. Speaker, I believe the House will acquit me of any disposition, either in regard to its general business or when considering any matter which comes from my own committee, to protract discussion by making speeches for speaking sake. I prefer, so far as practicable, always to have business debate upon the subject which may be under consideration by the House. I propose, therefore, not to speak in general terms of our Army and its organization, but of that very important element connected with its prosperity and usefulness, the pay and compensation that shall be allowed to those who are engaged in the public service in that Army. And I will explain the particular object the committee had in view in the bill which they now present for the consideration and action of the House, and those circumstances and existing facts which seem to require that a change shall be made in the present mode of compensating those who serve, either as officers or men, in the armies of the United States.

This bill, it will be observed, is entitled "A bill to reduce and establish the pay of the officers and to regulate the pay of the soldiers of the armies of the United States." In one sense it increases the pay of the soldiers by retaining to them the pay allowed by law, that which was given them during the late war, and not permitting that pay to expire by limitation, and thus revert to the old pay of thirteen dollars per month. So far as the officers are concerned, this is a bill not so much to reduce their compensation in any great degree as it is to attempt by legislation to readjust the system of payment now in use in the Army so far as officers are concerned. The pay of the officers of the Army of the United States has always been rather a mystery to outsiders and the uninitiated; and well it may be. It seems to me that at no time heretofore, nor even now, have the officers of the Army been at all adequately recompensed for their service, when you consider their pay proper. Their pay proper has always been insufficient; and the pay being low, there has been ingrafted upon the system, as a traditionary mode of eking it out, various allowances. And those allowances have been changed and varied from time to time, with a general tendency to increase, until now what is given to an officer as his compensation is made up in some small proportion of pay proper, but in a very much more considerable proportion of allowances.

Now, the object of this bill is to simplify this whole matter, and to readjust the system of payment, so that Army officers shall hereafter be paid as naval officers are paid and as civil officers are paid, by yearly salaries, given to officers in their several grades according to the nature of their services and responsibilities, with as few allowances as may be possible. This bill increases the pay beyond what appears upon the statute-books as the recognized and established pay proper, but not the full compensation including pay proper and allowances. Now, you may take the pay of an officer of the Army of any grade; for instance, look at the pay of a major general as it now stands upon your statute-book. The pay proper of a major general is $220 per month, or a yearly aggregate of $2,640. Now, according to this bill, which makes his pay $6,000 or $7,000, it might be supposed that his pay is very largely increased; but the truth is that which is called "pay" is proportionately but a small part of the money which a major general actually receives. He is allowed commutation for four servants at sixteen dollars per month each, or $768 a year. The allowance for clothing for those four servants is $312 per year. He is allowed for subsistence for himself fifteen rations per day for three hundred and sixty-five days, or five thousand four hundred and seventy-five per year; and for his servants four rations per day, or fourteen hundred and sixty per year, making an aggregate of six thousand nine hundred and thirty-five rations, which, at thirty cents per ration, would make $2,080 50. This is allowed him for subsistence for himself and servants, without taking into account the possibility of his having charge of a military department, when his allowance for rations, for himself at least, is doubled. Then there is an allowance for forage for horses. A major general is allowed to draw forage for five horses, amounting, at the present appraised value of forage here in this city, to $208 50 for each horse, making an addition of $1,042 50. This, however, the officer draws in kind for the horses he actually keeps; he cannot, under the present law as changed some three years ago, have commutation in money for forage. If stationed at this city, or anywhere else at a post, a major general has an allowance for fuel; and at the price estimated for fuel in this city this allowance to a major general is, when commuted in cash, $509 62. Then there is commutation for the number of rooms which he is allowed, being, by the present regulations, eighteen dollars for each room in this city, twelve dollars in New York, and nine dollars elsewhere, making, in this city, $1,296 more. The total is $8,648 62, all of which is drawn in cash, with the exception of the forage for horses, amounting in value to $1,042 50.

About the same proportion prevails in regard to the other officers. For instance, a brigadier general here in Washington receives a brigadier general's pay, $1,488; but by reason of the allowances in cash, and $834, the value of the forage allowed in kind, his actual pay, without double rations, amounts to $6,269 75; thus illustrating what I have stated, that with respect to all these officers, the pay proper bears but a small proportion to the amount actually paid to them for their services to the Government. I might, with the paper which I have before me, exhibit and comment upon the difference between the pay proper of the various officers of subordinate grades, showing the same difference. But I will not do this now, being ready, however, to make any explanation upon these subjects to any gentleman who may wish to make any inquiry. There is, also, I may say, a class of allowances not included in this statement, one particularly, the longevity ration, which increases the pay by the addition of a ration for every five years' faithful service, that ration being thirty cents a day.

Now, sir, I am not to be understood as objecting particularly to these allowances, embodying the system which has prevailed, under the present law, for properly compensating those who are in the military employ of the Government. But this bill is introduced, as I have said, for the purpose of readjusting and simplifying the whole matter. While, by this bill, the pay of some officers will be considerably reduced, others will have their pay slightly increased; but it is proposed that the whole of them shall be put upon a footing of pay proper in the shape of salary or general compensation, so that the system will be radically and entirely changed, and it will not be hereafter, as it has been heretofore, a mystery to any one seeking to know how much an Army officer receives for his services to the Government.

There are several objections to this mode of compensation which has prevailed so long, and which so many ineffectual attempts have been made, as I admit, to change, because, like any other long-established, traditional system, whenever you touch it everybody interested in it bristles up, and some plausible reason is urged for not interfering with that which already exists. One of the reasons against this system, the first which occurs to me as I speak, is that the moral effect of the present mode of payment upon the officers themselves is bad. I will explain what I mean. When a man is made a second lieutenant in the Army of the United States, the moment he receives his commission, or at the end of his first month, when he comes to the paymaster in order to obtain compensation for that month's service, he is met by a temptation to misrepresent what he is entitled to. He knows what his pay proper is; he knows he has certain allowances, allowance for a servant, allowance for clothing for a servant, allowance for the pay of a servant; and he knows if he is stationed at a post that he is entitled to certain other allowances. If he is a mounted officer he has an allowance for a horse if he keeps one. What does he do? He desires, his pay being small, to obtain the largest amount the Government will afford to him. He therefore is induced by the temptation possibly to misrepresent a claim for a servant whom he never employs and for forage for a horse which was never foaled. I say the usage has grown up in the Army so that it is almost a matter of course for the paymaster or paymaster's clerk to make out rolls including all these allowances, and the officer is tempted to certify to them when the fact is not according to his certificate. He justifies himself by saying, "My pay is too small, and the only way in which I can be adequately compensated is to eke out this pay by putting in these allowances. Others do it and why should not I?"

I insist one of the first and prominent objections we meet at the threshold when we come to look at this system of payment is the bad effect on the mind of the officer himself. I do not say this in disparagement of officers, regular or volunteer, who have been in the Army and acted like others. I do not say members of Congress do not find the longest way round to be the shortest way to the capital when they feel their compensation as members is not sufficient and a little stretching of mileage may help to pay, perhaps, a board bill unreasonably high in this extravagant city of Washington. I would not say anything except to allude, for illustration, to allowances for newspapers, stationery, and other matters; and suppose members of Congress, no worse and no better than officers of the Army, were paid in whole or almost altogether by these allowances; the pay being small, and insufficient to buy everything, is it not to be expected the stretching would be more than the law allowed? I object, therefore, to this system of payment because of its immoral effect.

Again, there is an objection to the payment because it opens the door for legislation by the chief officers of the War Department instead of by Congress. There is allowed commutation for so many rooms, and for so much fuel for those rooms, varying according to the different months of the year. These may be changed from time to time by an order of the War Department. What is the consequence? Take this instance. Nine dollars for a time was the commutation for a room. An officer is allowed so many rooms, according to his grade, and receives three, four, or five times nine dollars to make out his monthly allowance for that purpose. It was found during the war prices ran up so high in Washington the Department increased the commutation from nine to eighteen dollars, doubling the allowance of those who got the benefit of it. A like change was made in New York city, while at all the other posts in the United States I believe it remains unchanged. The effect of this is, it leaves to the heads and chiefs of bureaus the power to fix the rates of pay. It may be said this is right because they understand the emergency of the occasion and the circumstances by which a man is surrounded in the locality where his duty may call him. But that may be said of every officer. It has been found that it works very well without it in the main. There are many good officers paid in a different way, and although there may be something in that argument, there is far more, it seems to me, in the arguments against this mode of compensation and in favor of giving a just, reasonable compensation altogether, with as few variations as possible, so that we may know what it is that each man receives.

Another thing which connects itself immediately with this objection is, that it tends to take away the independence of the officers. If an officer knows that according to his rank he receives so many hundred or so many thousand dollars per year for his services, and that it is secured to him by law of Congress, he will not seek or intrigue to get this or that post, or this or that particular kind of service which may tend to increase his pay or allowance. In so far, then, as these allowances are at the discretion of the executive department and not under the control of the law-making power, they tend to take away the independence of the officer, who ought to feel that he is paid so much for his services, and that as long as he is fit to be kept in that place nobody can vary the compensation to which he is entitled.

Another effect is upon legislation itself. We are continually passing laws the exact effect of which we do not quite understand. For instance, it is understood at the War Department if you want to add something to the pay of an officer, it is best not to come at it directly—so many dollars and cents—but to add a ration or double the rations, or make his allowances the same as those of some other officer who before that time has got his allowances increased by law, so that nothing appears upon the statute-book indicating an increase of pay specifically. I could point to a number of such cases like that where the pay is largely increased. We do not know how much we increase it if we legislate in the dark, as most of us do who do not make this subject a study.

I have in my mind at this moment a chief of a bureau whose pay was increased in that way. During the Mexican war it was thought that the chiefs of two of the bureaus in the War Department ought to be helped in some way, as those gentlemen are helped usually, and a law was passed which gave to them what was never before given to the heads of bureaus, namely, double rations. That added some twelve or fourteen hundred dollars to their pay. Since this war commenced we have made another bureau, and we do not put that other bureau upon the same footing as the rest.

Although it is by no means one of the highest bureaus, nor its head as high as some others in rank, or as high as some in the Army who had not got this double ration, yet when the bill came to be passed it was provided that the head of that bureau should have the same rank, pay, and emoluments, as were allowed to certain officers in 1846. There did not appear anything about money on the face of the bill, but he got about fourteen hundred dollars additional compensation. The gentleman who now occupies that position could not possibly have been a party to the transaction, though he consented to receive it. The present head of the bureau was not placed there until the change was made by the last Congress.

I do not make any particular complaint against that bureau or that particular officer, but I cite the fact only as an illustration of this principle. The system is objectionable, because we are led by blind legislation to increase the pay in this indirect manner. I have given this merely as an illustration of the general objection.

The great object of this bill is to introduce a system by which the country shall know what it pays to those whom it employs. This system has worked very well in the Navy. I believe that the officers of the Navy are very inadequately paid, and receive very much less than the officers of the Army receive. In the naval service, as you will see by referring to the Naval List, the officers have graduated pay. I do not mean pay eked out by allowances, but graduated pay according to their services. For instance, a captain on the active list receives $3,500 a year; when on shore duty, $2,800 a year; when on leave, $2,100 a year; and if he be put on the retired list he receives only $1,600 a year; that is, when upon hard, active duty he gets the most pay; when put upon what is considered lighter and easier duty, although it may involve additional expenses to him, his pay is reduced; and when upon his own application he is permitted to go off on leave of absence his pay is reduced still lower.

That seems to be a fair and just classification of compensation to the officers as they happen to be engaged. Now, in the Army it is just the reverse. An officer of any grade in the field gets considerably less pay, because he gets no allowance for fuel, quarters, &c. I think he gets about nine hundred and twenty-one dollars less than officers of a similar grade who are upon duty here in Washington or elsewhere out of the field. It is true that the officer in the field is relieved from certain expenses, but at the same time he does harder and more active work. There is a difference made between officers of the Army and Navy in this respect. An officer of the Army on leave of absence—I do not mean on furlough, when he may be on reduced pay—gets his full pay, not allowances of certain kinds which are not given except in cases of duty at posts or elsewhere, but the full pay that he would have had if in the field; so that the whole thing is between the Army and Navy. In the Navy the principle is that you shall pay a round sum. In the Army the principle is that you shall give too little for pay and help it out by allowances. In the Navy the man paid must be engaged in the hard and active duties appropriate to his profession. In the Army when a man is withdrawn from active service his pay goes up, and he gets additional allowances. What has been the consequence? I am coming now to the general question, and I know how sensitive the House has been made to be on this subject. We live here in Washington in the atmosphere of the Departments, the bureaus, and of the staff, excellent gentlemen who have done good service, but who, as I said a little while ago, like all officers and soldiers, are human.

The effect of our legislation in all times past has been rather to build up this bureau or departmental influence, and has been against the officers who have been active in the hard work in the field. It may be said that a great many who have been employed in the Departments during the war would rather have been at the front. I dare say there are instances where that would be the fact. I think I know some such cases; but, somehow or other, owing to some influence that is at work all the while, there is a tendency toward Washington, a centripetal instead of a centrifugal force at work, that makes men prefer work in the Departments rather than active professional duties.

Now what is the consequence? You go to the War Department and you find its different bureaus swarming with officers. Instead of having an officer of professional skill, as should be the case, at the head of each bureau, and under him officers of a subordinate grade, you find not only officers of rank for chiefs of bureaus and heads of divisions, but there are employed under them commissioned officers doing clerical duty, from major general down to second lieutenant; officers engaged in sitting at desks and looking after matters which might at least be just as well attended to by intelligent clerks employed for that purpose. It is not so in the Navy Department. I know that comparisons are invidious, but it serves as a good illustration. This is an old system. I do not give blame to the head of the one Department any more than praise to the head of the other for this system. It is a thing we are seeking to reform and correct. But it has been a long time growing up, and the difficulty of reform, as we all know, increases just in proportion to the length of time the abuse has existed.

What do we find in the Navy Department? In all the bureaus, outside of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, in which are employed some eight professional engineers of the Navy of different grades; in all the other seven or eight bureaus you will find but about sixteen commissioned officers employed; but there is not a bureau in the War Department in which there are not only sixteen commissioned officers employed, but in some of them many times sixteen officers. In most of the bureaus in the Navy Department the chiefs are the only commissioned officers employed. I could illustrate my argument more at length, for I have all the facts and even the names here on my desk.

Mr. NIBLACK. I did not have an opportunity of listening to the bill as it was read, and ascertaining what were its provisions. I would therefore inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. SCHENCK] whether the pay which he now proposes by this bill to give the officers of the Army is to be uniform, or whether it is to be varied according to location and the kind of services those officers may be called upon to perform.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is to be uniform pay, with certain changes in the bill, which I shall propose by way of amendment.

Mr. NIBLACK. It has occurred to me that an officer assigned to duty on the plains, where transportation is very high, ought to have more pay than under other circumstances.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is provided for in the bill; he gets transportation in kind or is allowed mileage.

I do not know but the House is getting impatient and wearied of an explanation so much more protracted than I intended to make when I arose. But having thought much of this subject, having looked into it very carefully, I am tolerably full of it. But I will not trouble the House with more figures or further comparisons at this time. I will only say that after having reported this bill back, believing it needs some further provisions in it, I have prepared and will submit for the consideration of members some two or three amendments. And although it may only be in order for me to offer them successively to the bill I will read them all now, so that the whole subject may be in possession of the House. For instance, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WRIGHT] inquires whether any provision has been made for the pay of a general. I propose, now that it may be assumed that that office will be established, to move to amend by striking out the line which now reads, "of a lieutenant general $12,000," and inserting in lieu thereof "of a general, $15,000; of a lieutenant general, $10,000."

I propose by that amendment to raise the pay of a general to $3,000 more than this bill proposes for a lieutenant general, and to make the pay of a lieutenant general somewhat less than is here proposed, because he then ceases to be the head of the Army.

Now, I know these sums sound large, and gentlemen may be dissatisfied with them. But they will not be so much dissatisfied, perhaps, when they learn to what the entire compensation of those officers would amount by the various commutations and allowances which are now made under existing law.

Mr. WRIGHT. My only object was to correct what I supposed to be an accidental omission in the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. So I understood. I propose, as a further amendment, to offer the following as an additional section to come in after section three:

That forage in kind may be allowed and drawn for horses of mounted officers actually kept by them when and at the place where they are on duty, in accordance with the provisions of sections one and two of the act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes, approved July 17, 1862.

Prior to 1862 there was commutation for forage. The officer did not draw it in kind, but drew money for it. In 1862, to prevent further abuse in that direction, the law was amended, so that the officer must show that he actually kept the horse or horses allowed him; and for the horse or horses actually kept by him an allowance of forage is made. He draws the forage in kind at the cost of the Government. I propose that this shall be continued. It would seem to be unfair to make no distinction between officers not required to be mounted and those who must be mounted, and who, in order to a proper position in the commands to which they may be assigned, are under the necessity of keeping a certain number of horses, the number being fixed by law. Hence I propose that forage shall be allowed in kind for the number of horses actually kept in accordance with the requirement of the law by a mounted officer.

I propose, also, to offer the following as an additional section:

That in lieu of the additional ration which was allowed to commissioned officers of the line and staff by the provisions of section fifteen of the act to increase the present military establishment of the United States, and for other purposes, there shall be allowed and paid to every commissioned officer of the Army of the United States ten per cent. per annum on his yearly pay for each full and complete term of five years of continuous and faithful service as such officer; and this increased graduated compensation shall be allowed in the case of any officer or soldier of volunteers who may be commissioned in the regular Army, to include the time during which he so served faithfully and honorably as a volunteer.

By the present law there is allowed in certain cases a longevity ration—a ration which is added to the number of rations regularly allowed by law for each successive term of five years, faithful service. During the first term of five years' service the officer gets no additional ration. In his second term of five years he has a ration added amounting annually to $109 85. During the third term of five years he is entitled to draw two longevity rations, amounting to $219 70 per year. During the fourth term of five years he receives three additional rations, amounting to $329 55 annually. So the increase proceeds during each successive term of five years. When an officer has served twenty-five years his longevity ration amounts during his sixth term of five years to $549 25 annually.

Now, under the system which I propose, a second lieutenant with pay amounting to $1,600 a year, will receive after his first five years' service $160 additional per annum. After ten years' faithful service he will have $320 added to his pay. So each of the other officers will receive for each successive term of five years' service an addition of ten per cent. to his regular pay. This appears to me a simpler and plainer system than the allowance of the longevity ration. As to the longevity ration, I have always thought it a good thing to give it to officers as a reward for faithful service. At the same time in this country it has another usefulness in keeping pace somewhat with that increase of family in which Americans are apt to indulge. [Laughter.]

There is a provision in this section which is not now in any law, but which at the close of the war I suggest it is proper to add, that those who have been in the volunteer service and afterwards come into the regular Army shall be allowed to count, in the time for which this longevity ration is given, the time they served as volunteers.

Leaving that portion, after referring for a few moments to the other parts of the bill, I will then detain the House no longer.

The fourth section as it stands in the printed bill provides for keeping up the pay of the soldier to sixteen dollars. Gentlemen may not all be aware that the increase of the pay of the soldiers of our Army, though seeming to be made necessary by the increased cost of subsistence, from thirteen dollars to sixteen dollars, will come down of itself, or will expire by limitation at the end of the war, whenever that doubtful time shall be found. They will return then to thirteen dollars unless by some positive legislation sixteen dollars is preserved. I have always believed in paying the private soldier well, as well as the officer. I would, therefore, in view of these facts, keep up to sixteen dollars per month; and I would, for the sake of getting good soldiers and continuing them in the Army as enlisted men, go one step further, as has been done in this bill, and provide for each successive year of faithful service there shall be added a dollar per month to the pay of any soldier, running on as he shall reenlist.

It may be objected to this, when the soldier has served three or four enlistments he will receive twenty dollars per month. Let it be so. Your old veteran soldiers fit for service at all who thus enlist and reenlist are worth that much more than raw recruits. I hold it to be a good principle in that view of compensation. Then it has another advantage: it will be one of the best means in the world to prevent soldiers deserting from the Army. I have always thought, instead of this system of bounty which we have been compelled to keep up, it would have been much better if this system had been adopted and the soldiers compensated for the time they remained in the service. It would have been a reward for continued faithful service.

There is a provision in regard to the pay of officers and enlisted men. It states they shall be paid regularly at the end of every month. If anything will prevent desertion and dissatisfaction among the soldiers it seems to me it is that provision. This was one of the greatest difficulties felt during the war, made necessary, perhaps, in some degree by financial burdens upon the country, but still more than it should have been. The soldier was paid sometimes every two months, sometimes every eight months, sometimes hardly at all, and sometimes the last three or four months of his service being left without pay he was taken back and paid up to some period dating antecedently several months.

We provide in the sixth section that the allowance now made by law to officers traveling under orders where transportation is not furnished in kind shall be increased to ten cents per mile.

We provide in the seventh section for restoring extra-duty pay to soldiers employed as artificers or laborers.

Both of these sections are in accordance with the wishes of every one connected with the War Department. They commend themselves, and I need not further comment upon them. With this explanation, a great deal fuller than anything I intended when I rose, I leave this bill for the present, desiring there shall be a reasonable opportunity for amendment and for debate, intending, however, when that debate seems to be less for business purpose and to put the bill in a good shape either to be adopted or rejected by the House, to call the previous question.

Mr. ROSS. I will ask the gentleman, before he takes his seat, if in his judgment the public service would suffer by the reduction of the compensation, say twenty or twenty-five per cent., in time of peace.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think it would. The bill is really in itself, in most of its parts, a reduction of the pay of officers, so that a further reduction would not be a full compensation to them. I have illustrated it by the Navy. And I will say, at the same time, that I do not think the officers of that arm of the service are sufficiently paid; and I had hoped that a bill would have been brought in by the Committee on Naval Affairs providing for some readjustment of their pay. And while the gentleman calls my attention to the subject, I will say that while there has been such delay in paying officers of the Navy, and while the chief of a bureau in the Navy Department gets only one half the compensation of the chief of a bureau in the Army, there has been slipped through Congress a piece of legislation not known perhaps to all the members of the House by which a law was repealed which provided certain allowances; and there has just been published an order of the Navy Department adding thirty-three and a third per cent. as allowances to the pay of the officers of the Navy.

Mr. ROSS. Cannot these officers live on the same compensation as members of Congress in time of peace? I do not see why their pay should be higher than ours.

Mr. SCHENCK. Nor I. I do not know how it is with the gentleman from Illinois, but I do not get near enough to subsist myself and family, and I am by no means an extravagant man. I will send the amendments that I have indicated to the desk.

The SPEAKER. Unless there is a separate vote demanded, the question will be upon the adoption of the amendments in gross.

The Clerk read the amendments, as follows:

In section one strike out line eight and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Of a general $15,000; of a lieutenant general $10,000.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That in lieu of the additional ration which was allowed to commissioned officers of the line and staff by the provisions of section fifteen of the act to increase the present military establishment of the United States, and for other purposes, there shall be allowed and paid to every commissioned officer of the Army of the United States ten per cent. per annum on his yearly pay for each full and complete term of five years of continuous and faithful service as such officer; and this increased graduated compensation shall be allowed in the case of any officer or soldier of volunteers who may be commissioned in the regular Army, to include the time during which he so served faithfully and honorably as a volunteer.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That forage in kind may be allowed and drawn for by horses of mounted officers actually kept by them when and at the place where they are on duty, in accordance with the provisions of sections one and two of the act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes, approved July 17, 1862.

No objection being made, the amendments were adopted.

Mr. PAINE. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I quite agree with what he said when he informed the House that the difference between the pay of an officer on hard service in the field and on light duty in cities is quite essential. I have by my own experience been able to test that to my satisfaction. The gentleman seeks to introduce into this bill a correct principle when he proposes to give to those officers who are performing the more laborious field service a higher rate of pay. But I wish to ask him if in the first section he is not incorporating provisions which are in violation of that just principle. The bill proposes to pay to a brigadier general when commanding a military department or a division in the field $5,500, and when commanding a brigade in the field only $5,000. It allows to a colonel commanding a brigade or military post $3,500, and when commanding a regiment in the field only $3,000. And it allows a lieutenant colonel when commanding a regiment or military post $2,800, and when on other duty, which may be more laborious and perilous, only $2,600. It is possible, I think, so to conform these provisions to the other parts of the bill as to obviate these objections; but I would ask if these are not obnoxious to the objections that the gentleman has himself urged to the whole pay system of the Army.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will answer the gentleman with pleasure. I have not pretended to take the ground that there was to be a sort of bed of Procrustes by which every man should be measured and cut off a certain length, which should be invariable. I have proposed to adopt a general system of compensation by salaries, fixing them with reference to the office and duty to be performed; just as they have done in the Navy, where it has been found to work well, as I explained. The officer who is at sea gets a certain compensation, on shore duty a less compensation, and on leave of absence less. Thus there is a gradation, and yet the general fact is that he is paid by a salary, but it is a salary for each class of duties fixed by law.

Now, instead of saying that every major general shall receive so much, and every brigadier general so much, there is a difference of this kind made, just as there is a difference as to the allowance made to certain officers of the Navy, according to the rate of the vessel which they command or serve on board of, or whether they command a single vessel or a fleet. This very line to which the gentleman refers is an illustration. A brigadier general when commanding a division of the Army or a division in the field is allowed $5,000 a year, because he is then in fact acting as a major general. Though we do not give him a major general's pay, yet we give him something between the highest pay apportioned to his rank and the lowest pay of the rank next above him. So also in regard to colonels. We make a distinction between a colonel commanding a regiment and one commanding a military post. A good deal has been said—and I admit that there is some equity in that view—of the expenses to which a man may be put by his assignment to particular duty. For instance, you put a man in command of a post on the plains, where everybody is passing to and fro. He must necessarily need a little higher pay than others might do, because of the entertainment he must afford to such persons. That is one reason for the difference of pay.

But, sir, I do not desire to detain the House. I only wish the gentleman would understand that we propose merely to graduate these salaries, not merely as between different officers, but between officers of the same rank when engaged on different duties.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, I was not present in the Committee on Military Affairs when they agreed to report this bill, and I am compelled to disagree from its general provisions. I wish to state as briefly as may be the reasons why I am not able to concur with my friend, the honorable chairman of the committee, [Mr. SCHENCK,] who has just addressed the House.

The argument of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, whether so intended or not, gets a little advantage, I think, in contrasting the pay of bureau officers with the pay of officers in the field. That is not the question before us. The question is whether by this bill you will create a gross inequality in the pay of officers who are in the field at different points of the widely extended area of the United States.

Let me state a case. I will suppose there are ten general officers in this city to-day to be ordered by General Grant to as many different points. Let us suppose the system of commutation of forage, rations, fuel, servants' clothing, quarters, &c., entirely abolished. You send one officer to a post in the Northeast, another to San Francisco, another to Fort Bridger, another to New Orleans, another to New Mexico, and so on, and then give them all the same arbitrary amount of pay as proposed in the pending bill, and I submit that you have imposed the grossest inequality of burden and responsibility upon them.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does not the bill allow mileage?

Mr. BLAINE. I am not talking about mileage. I am talking about the expenses of living after the various posts of service shall have been reached. I was talking only yesterday with an officer who has served in the Rocky mountains and at Fort Bridger. The Government has had to contract there for wood at nearly one hundred dollars per cord and corn at twelve dollars a bushel and flour at seventy-five dollars a barrel. I submit that if you send a brigadier general out there under the pay provided in this bill and compel him to forego all the privileges of commutation he cannot feed two horses and keep two servants on his entire pay.

The gentleman from Ohio says he does not draw his rations in kind but takes commutation. I know that is the case, but he draws it in commutation of value at the point where he is stationed. If a cord of wood costs $100 where he is stationed, he is entitled to commutation for that. If it costs only eight dollars he is entitled only to that. But this bill abolishes this whole resource of the officer and leaves him the same arbitrary amount of pay, no matter where he may be stationed, and utterly regardless of the extraordinary expenses to which he may be subjected.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the principle of commutation, with which the gentleman finds so much fault, has been in vogue ever since the organization of our Army, and is in practice in every other army on the globe, I believe. One would suppose that a system so extended and uniform must have something of justice and reason and necessity and common sense to rest upon. Let us pursue this question a little further. Take two officers of the same rank, station one of them in the city of Washington and the other at the base of the Rocky mountains, and give them the same salary; the one at Washington will be able to live comfortably upon his pay, while the one at the base of the Rocky mountains will starve on his pay. Now, why should you, under the plea of equalizing the pay of the Army, subject an officer at a distant post to this additional hardship and this unendurable expense?

Let me say in this connection that in my judgment the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs yielded the whole question when he put an amendment on this bill allowing forage to be drawn in kind. Why allow forage to be drawn in kind more than fuel? Why should there be commutation on that more than on anything else which hitherto has been commuted? The necessities are the same in the one case as in the other; the hardships are the same; the circumstances and facts are precisely the same. And I can see no logical reason why in the one case there should be commutation, and in the other there should be none.

The gentleman says the mounted officer should have it because he has horses to provide for. Why make a distinction between mounted officers and officers on foot, and not make any between officers in different localities? The difference of necessary expense of living between a cavalry officer and infantry officer at the same post is not half so great as the possible difference between two infantry officers located at different posts.

In reply to the question of economy I beg to say a single word. It does not seem entirely clear that any money would be saved to the Treasury even if this bill should be adopted just as the committee has reported it. Under its provisions some officers would get decidedly more than they do to-day, even with all these commutations.

Mr. SCHENCK. Most of them would get less.

Mr. BLAINE. I admit that many of them would get less, but those would get less who can least afford to take less. I beg the House not to be carried off into a support of this arbitrary principle because there may be some abuses in the case of bureau officers. I know there have been abuses. I will refer to one which made some little noise at the time. When General Halleck was here in Washington as General-in-Chief of the Army, with the rank of major general, by a certain construction of commutation and allowances he drew some twenty-two hundred dollars more pay than either General Grant or General Sherman, commanding armies in the field, with the same rank. That was a great abuse. But I do not see why you should correct the abuse in this way, by creating a new abuse in making injurious discriminations between officers in the field.

You may question any officer in the Army, and he will tell you this is unjust. Apply this bill as drafted to an expedition like the one sent to Utah by President Buchanan. Suppose you had said to the officers of that expedition that they should have no commutation for rations, no commutation for fuel or forage. The second lieutenant, on his pay of $1,600 a year, being obliged to buy his own rations and fuel and forage, the clothing and rations for his servant, could not have lived through that winter on double the amount of his entire pay.

I trust the House will bear in mind that the great amount of services to be performed by our Army hereafter will be at just such exposed points as those to which I have referred. If you choose to send a lot of men out into the wilderness to fight the Indians, to guard the overland mail route, or to protect the Pacific railroad, do not send them out there to starve, as they would do under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I will ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] if the difficulty might not be obviated by allowing officers to draw their rations in kind at the posts where the prices were so high.

Mr. BLAINE. That would be a very great improvement, and would make a very great difference.

Mr. FARQUHAR. The gentleman speaks of the Utah expedition. That was an expedition in the field, where they do not have commutation, but draw in kind.

Mr. BLAINE. I know they draw in kind in the field, as the gentleman says; and he speaks from experience in these matters. But under the bill of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] they would not be allowed to do that. The gentleman from Indiana will observe that this will cut them off from that privilege, and that the officer would be required to buy out of his private purse all of his rations and fuel, no matter how exorbitant and enormous the cost might be.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that if it be necessary to correct any excess of pay or allowances in any particular—in a bureau here or a bureau there—we shall confine ourselves to that task, and not legislate in this wholesale manner in regard to officers in the field and at distant posts.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. COOPER, his Private Secretary.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. R. No. 94) providing for the payment of certain Kentucky militia forces, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the following named Senate bills:

An act (S. No. 167) to incorporate the Women's Hospital Association of the District of Columbia; and

An act (S. No. 184) to define more clearly the jurisdiction and powers of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

PAY OF THE ARMY—AGAIN.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, the proposition which is now before the House to alter the system of payment of officers of the Army is by no means a new or original proposition; and I am not vain enough to suppose that I shall be able to shed much additional light on the subject. It is my purpose, however, to place upon the record my opposition to this bill, and to detain the House a few moments while I give my reasons for that opposition. The system which has always obtained for the payment of officers of the Army is one which is founded upon equity and the necessity of the case. Propositions have frequently been made for a change of that system and for the substitution of a rigid, uniform, and invariable rule of pay for all officers in all situations. Those propositions, whether made in this House or elsewhere, have, after undergoing careful scrutiny, uniformly failed to receive the approval of those whose judgment is entitled to the highest consideration, and those who have hitherto constituted the law-making power of the country.

Sir, it must be manifest that in a country including so large a space as that which is covered by the United States, embracing so many degrees of latitude and longitude, the expenses of living must differ vastly in different parts of the country. The price of subsistence is one thing at St. Louis; it is a totally different thing at Eastport. It is one thing at New Orleans; it is a different thing at Philadelphia. It is one thing at Carlisle, an interior town in my own State; it is quite another thing in Washington.

Now, sir, the present system, that which has always been adopted by this Government, and the one which, as I am informed, prevails in every service, is founded upon the idea of remedying all this inequality by making the Government the purchaser of the necessities of life for the officer, furnishing them to him as a part of his pay.

Sir, an officer who is obliged to pay but a small price for his board in a town where the price of living is cheap, is, as any man must see, on an entirely different footing from an officer who is placed in another position where the expense of living is extremely high. The Government remedies this inequality by purchasing the subsistence and furnishing it in kind to both the officers.

The Government can go into all the markets of the United States and purchase its provisions for the Army. It can purchase them at rates vastly below the prices which an individual officer would be obliged to pay for his individual subsistence. The Government, therefore, has hitherto thought it wise to purchase by contract the subsistence for the officer, and to deal out to him, whether he be situated in Arizona or in Boston, those provisions which it has purchased for the common benefit of the Army. So with regard to forage and fuel. The Government can purchase those articles at rates vastly below the prices at which an individual officer would be obliged to provide his individual forage and fuel. Why, sir, an officer who has to pay eight dollars per cord for wood in the place where he is stationed cannot be said to be on a footing of equality as regards pay with an officer who is obliged to pay fifty or even one hundred dollars per cord for wood, as it has been stated was the case at Fort Bridger, where the Government, as is alleged, was obliged to pay the latter sum.

Now, sir, take an officer and place him in a cheap locality and compel him to pay for his own subsistence, allow him to draw no rations, allow him no forage and no fuel, and he may pay his way out of his own salary. Take a captain for instance, with $2,000 a year. He may, if he be assigned to a cheap locality, by rigid economy live upon the sum you propose to assign him for his living by this bill. If you place that officer in any other position where subsistence and forage and fuel command inordinate prices, you do not support that officer, you compel him to resign. That is the only effect of your bill. No man will remain in the service when the compensation you propose to give him will not supply the ordinary necessities of human existence.

Nor will he remain if he sees he is made the subject of invidious discrimination and inequality. Officers have no selection at the posts at which they will serve. They are in the hands of the War Department and the President. Where they are ordered there they must go. They cannot make their own beds. They must lie wherever the Government chooses to place them. It is a rule, as we well know, that the most desirable positions in assignment of duty shall be assigned to officers who have seniority in the service. Officers, then, sir, who have arrived at such a time of life, who have been for a sufficient period in service to command the most economical positions to which officers are assigned, may be relieved to some extent of the hardships of the proposed bill. But take the general run of officers, the most of them are not entitled by seniority to any preference of that kind. They must go where they are ordered, and when they go you propose to deprive them of subsistence, of forage, of transportation, and everything, I believe, that they have had before, no matter whether they are at a cheap position or a dear position; no matter whether they are at a position where they can save fifty dollars a year or be left $1,500 or $2,000 in debt at the end of the year. You say they shall have the same salary without regard to circumstances, and without regard to the expense they incur. Common sense and common justice are against it, and that is my reason for opposing the bill.

An officer is entitled to quarters. You propose not to give him quarters. There are many posts where there are quarters built for the use of officers. You do not intend, I suppose, to prohibit him from occupying these quarters. You do not intend to say when you send a man to the West that he shall not inhabit our forts. I do not see that you propose to charge him rent for quarters furnished to him. If you do not propose to make him pay for the use of quarters, I ask upon what ground you make a discrimination against other officers, upon what ground you say officers where there are Government quarters shall have the use of them free and where there are none the officers shall pay for them out of their own pockets. Is there any justice in that?

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body insisted on its amendments to House joint resolution No. 154, relative to appointments to the Military Academy of the United States, disagreed to by the House, agreed to the conference asked for, and had appointed Mr. WILSON, Mr. ANTHONY, and Mr. HENDRICKS managers of such conference on its part.

Also, that it insisted on its amendments to House bill No. 37, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy during the year ending the 30th of June, 1867, disagreed to by the House, agreed to the conference asked for, and had appointed Mr. FESSENDEN, Mr. CONNESS, and Mr. RIDDLE managers of such conference on its part.

Also, that it insisted on its amendment to House bill No. 255, making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repair of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867, disagreed to by the House, agreed to the conference asked for, and had appointed Mr. MORGAN, Mr. MORRILL, and Mr. SAULSBURY managers of such conference on its part.

PAY OF THE ARMY—AGAIN.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, an analogy has been attempted to be drawn between the compensation of an officer in the Army and that of an officer in the Navy. Now, I do not think it requires much discrimination to perceive that there is a total failure in the attempted analogy. An officer of the Navy, if he is at sea, of course lives on board of his ship. He has no quarters to pay for. If he is on shore, on leave, he can select the place of his residence. In point of fact, we know that all our Navy officers do that. They locate their homes wherever they please; if poor, with a view to economy as well as comfort; if rich, they may choose their homes in more expensive localities; and while they are on leave they can go to those homes and occupy them. It is a matter which is entirely under their own control and at their own option. They may select whatever part of the country they please. When they are at sea their quarters are of course furnished. They live without rent. They receive their supplies from the purser, or rather from the paymaster of the ship, as he is now called. So that, so far as any argument is to be deduced from an analogy between the situation of the two kinds of officers, it strikes me there is a total failure in it. There is no analogy between the circumstances of the officers in the two branches of the service.

How can you fix any rigid system of pay which will do equal justice to all the officers of the Army whatever their situation or command may be? That is a question which has been attempted to be solved by very many gentlemen before the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] attempted it, and no man has ever yet succeeded in doing it. You cannot by the force of ingenuity make any scale of pay which will do equal justice between the officers of the Army, wherever they may be situated and whatever their circumstances in the service may be. It is an impossibility, simply and purely. That is the reason why, from the foundation of the Government, the system which now prevails has existed. It is simple, it is just. A man who is in one place gets no more than the man who is in another place. It adjusts all the inequalities of living everywhere. Whether the officer is in one extremity of the country or another the Government does him equal justice by the system which now obtains. It buys for him his subsistence, his forage, his fuel, his quarters, and gives them to him at what they cost the Government, and if he does not choose to use the subsistence, forage, fuel, &c., it allows him as an equivalent the price which the Government has had to pay at the point where the officer is stationed.

Now, one would think that a system so plain, so apparently just and equal as that, ought not to be disturbed, especially when the manifest and obvious result of a disturbance such as is here contemplated would be to introduce the grossest inequality. You would drive many officers, in my judgment, from the service of the United States if you put them upon salaries such as are contemplated by this bill, and place them at certain posts which might be designated.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up further the time of the House in the consideration of this bill. It is a subject which, though one of great consequence, is really embraced within a very narrow compass. It is one for which it seems to me common sense furnishes the safest solution, and equal justice the true rule.

Much has been said by my friend from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] in regard to the bureaus of the War Department in this city. For what purpose, or what legitimate connection the bureaus have with this bill, I cannot conceive. I may say, however, that during the consideration of a former bill in the House it was attempted to arouse some prejudices by an appeal against the bureaus of the War Department in this city and those who have the fortune or the misfortune, whichever you may choose to call it, of belonging to them. I would like to know what that has to do with this subject. If any man votes for this bill upon the idea that he is going to inflict an injury upon the bureaus of the War Department, I tell him he will commit a very grave mistake. I tell him that the injury he will inflict will be upon the officers in the distant, destitute posts of this country where all the necessities of life are scarce and high. Why, sir, even a bureau officer here may creep into some dirty hole and live in rags, perhaps, upon the pay proposed in the gentleman's bill without subsistence quarters, fuel, forage, or anything. But there are places where officers, and many of them, who have shed their blood in defense of your cause, in the far and remote West where subsistence and all these things are so high, cannot live upon the salary which you propose to give them while you strip them of the support which you have hitherto given them by furnishing these things in kind.

Sir, this legislation is not in its effect, whether the intention be so or not, against the bureaus here. It is vastly more against the officers situated in the manner to which I have referred than it is against the gentlemen whose positions have been made the subject of such frequent remark by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had adopted a concurrent resolution in reference to the death of Lieutenant General Scott.

DEATH OF GENERAL SCOTT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

With sincere regret I announce to Congress that Winfield Scott, late lieutenant general in the Army of the United States, departed this life at West Point, in the State of New York, on the 29th day of May instant, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon. I feel well assured that Congress will share in the grief of the nation which must result from its bereavement of a citizen whose high fame is identified with the military history of the Republic.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, May 30, 1866.

The message was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the Senate of the United States:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
May 30, 1866.

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia of the Senate and the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, appointed a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress to take into consideration the message of the President of the United States announcing to Congress the death of Lieutenant General Winfield Scott, and to report what method shall be adopted by Congress to manifest their appreciation of the high character, tried patriotism, and distinguished public services of Lieutenant General Scott, and their deep sensibility upon the announcement of his death.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the House concur in that resolution.

The resolution was concurred in.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope there will be no more business done to-day; and I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That from respect to the memory of the deceased this House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at ten minutes before four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees: By the SPEAKER: The petition of Allen J. Denten, chairman, and Mark E. Foster, secretary, on behalf of colored people of Goldsboro', North Carolina, asking that the protecting influence of the Freedmen's Bureau may be continued.

By Mr. BEAMAN: The petition of Charles D. Stevens, and others, citizens of Michigan, touching inter-State insurance.

By Mr. DELANO: The petition of 55 citizens of Licking county, Ohio, praying for an increased duty on foreign wools.

By Mr. ELLIOT: The petition of John Sherlock, for American register for British brig Resolute.

By Mr. LAFLIN: The petition of citizens of Little Falls, Herkimer county, New York, in favor of the modification of the law taxing State bank circulation ten per cent. after July 1, 1866.

By Mr. PERHAM: The petition of Alexander M. Pecs, for pension.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 31, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present the memorial of John R. Bartlett, who was secretary of state of Rhode Island, offering to the Government of the United States a collection of books, pamphlets, and a large number of volumes of newspaper cuttings relating to the rebellion. These cuttings are taken from the northern papers, the southern papers, and English and French papers, and include, also, the poetry of the rebellion, the ballads, caricatures, biographies, eulogies, and a vast variety of subjects, all relating to the rebellion. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on the Library.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I also present from the same person a memorial submitting to Congress a work entitled, "The Literature of the Rebellion," containing a catalogue of books and pamphlets relating to the rebellion, and to subjects growing out of that event or connected therewith. This collection embraces, I believe, more than three thousand articles, books, pamphlets, reports, eulogies, and everything relating to the rebellion. I move its reference to the same committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I present the petition of a number of citizens of the State of Florida, who represent that they were forced to enter the rebel army, and to give their notes for horses in the cavalry, and that their officers retained the amount of those notes out of their pay; that they lost their horses, and now they are sued upon the notes. They want Congress to pass some law which will enable them to defend themselves. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. NYE presented the memorial of Paul S. Forbes, praying for relief under his contract for the building of the engine of the steamer Algonquin; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, it was Ordered, That the petition of William Crosswell, praying for a pension, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DOOLITTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 348) to supply deficiencies and relieve destitute Indians in the southern superintendency; which was read, and passed to a second reading. He presented a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, submitting estimates for deficiencies for the support of destitute Indians in the southern superintendency, to accompany the bill; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 269) to define the number and regulate the appointment of officers in the Navy, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 341) amendatory of the preemption laws, and for other purposes, have instructed me to report it back, in order that it may be printed and recommitment to that committee.

The bill was ordered to be printed and recommitment to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred the petition and other papers of Paul S. Forbes, praying for relief under his contract with the Navy Department for building the sloop-of-war Idaho, submitted a report, accompanied by a joint resolution (S. R. No. 99) for the relief of Paul S. Forbes, under his contract with the Navy Department for the building and furnishing of the sloop-of-war Idaho. The joint resolution was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 466) erecting the Territory of Montana into a surveying district, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 508) to amend the organic acts of the Territories of Nebraska, Colorado, Dakota, Montana, Washington, Idaho, Arizona, Utah, and New Mexico, reported it with amendments.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 325) to give certain powers to the levy court of the county of Washington in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for a modification of the postal laws so as to permit the postage on books and documents transmitted to historical societies and libraries to be paid for on delivery, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

LETTER CARRIERS IN SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 142) authorizing the Postmaster General to pay additional salary to letter carriers in San Francisco, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage; and as the resolution is a very brief one and may be easily comprehended, I hope that by common consent it will be considered at the present time.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which authorizes the Postmaster General to pay such additional salary to letter carriers in San Francisco, above that provided by law, as may be necessary to secure competent persons for such service.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MINERAL-WATER BOTTLES.

Mr. JOHNSON. Some eight or ten days ago I moved to reconsider the vote on the passage of Senate bill No. 265, in relation to the sale of mineral-water bottles in this District. I move now that that motion be taken up with a view of offering one or two amendments to get clear of the objections to which the bill was obnoxious.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 265) to protect the manufacturers of mineral waters in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the vote by which this bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading be now reconsidered.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to amend the bill by striking out the word "allowable" in the fourth line of the first section, and inserting "allowed to be sold."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I also move to amend the bill by inserting after the word "marked" in the fifth line of the second section the words "for sale."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I now move to amend the bill by striking out in line five of the second section the words "or to sell, dispose of, or to buy;" so as to make the section read:

It is hereby declared to be unlawful for any person or persons hereafter, without the permission of the owner or owners thereof, to fill with mineral waters or other beverages any such bottles so marked for sale, or to traffic in any such bottles so marked, &c.

Mr. MORRILL. I should like to have an explanation as to the object of this amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. The objection to which the bill as it passed the Senate was liable, as I thought—and in that I had the concurrence of several members of the Senate—was, that it would subject to the penalty which the bill imposes all who might buy mineral water in bottles, or get possession of bottles containing mineral water, and might afterward dispose of them in any way. The object of the bill is to protect the maker of the bottles, who is to place his name on the bottles under the authority of the first section, from having his bottles traded in by others. If the amendment which I suggest shall be adopted, then the penalty which the law will impose in order to protect the manufacturer of the bottles will be as against those who traffic in the bottles.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

PROPERTY OF RELIGIOUS CORPORATIONS.

Mr. WILLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 564.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 564) to annul the thirty-fourth section of the declaration of rights of the State of Maryland, so far as it applies to the District of Columbia. It proposes to repeal and annul the thirty-fourth section of the declaration of rights of the State of Maryland, adopted 1776, so far as it has been recognized and adopted in the District of Columbia; and all sales, gifts, and devises prohibited by that section, or any law passed in accordance therewith, are to be, when hereafter made, valid and effectual.

Mr. JOHNSON. The clause in the declaration of rights of Maryland, which it is proposed to repeal so far as the District of Columbia is concerned, limits the amount of real estate that any religious congregation may hold. If it is repealed absolutely, there will be no limit here within the District, and they may hold any amount of real property. I ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] if it came from his committee.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I know nothing about it. I want to hear what you have to say about it.

Mr. JOHNSON. If this bill passes there will be no limit in the District, and they can receive any amount of real or personal estate.

Mr. HENDERSON. What is the limit in your declaration of rights?

Mr. JOHNSON. I forget the amount of the limit. I ask that the bill lie upon the table for a moment until I can see the extent of the limitation in Maryland. I forget what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that this bill be laid on the table temporarily. Is there any objection?

Mr. WILLEY. I have no objection, if the Senator from Maryland insists upon it.

Mr. JOHNSON. We can take it up in a moment. I only want to see what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid on the table temporarily.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (H. R. No. 513) to reduce internal taxation and to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had non-concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 459) granting a pension to Anna E. Ward, the former announcement of concurrence in the amendment having been a mistake.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 11) to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communication among the several States.

ANNA E. WARD.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 459) granting a pension to Anna E. Ward, which was disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move that the Senate insist on its amendment to the bill, ask for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The motion was agreed to; and Messrs. LANE of Indiana, EDMUNDS, and GUTHRIE were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 349) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, and the amendment thereto; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to ask leave of absence for my colleague [Mr. NESMITH] for two weeks from Monday next. He has business that requires him to be absent from the Senate.

Leave was granted.

PENSION LAWS.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I desire to make a report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 363) supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions. I will state that the House have concurred mainly in the amendments of the Senate, and that the amendments proposed by the House, which we have agreed to, are simply verbal and immaterial. I move that the Senate concur in the report of the committee of conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the committee of conference will now be read and considered, if there be no objection. The Secretary read it, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 363) supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to Senate amendments numbered one, two, three, four, and five.

That the House recede from their disagreement to Senate amendment numbered six, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: after the word "to" strike out the words "materially interfere with the performance of manual labor without wholly incapacitating them therefor" and insert "render their inability to perform manual labor equivalent to the loss of a hand or a foot."

That the House recede from their disagreement to Senate amendment numbered seven, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out all of the new section proposed to the word "effect," and retain the remainder as an addition to section three of the House bill.

That the House recede from their disagreement to Senate amendment numbered eight, and agree to the same with the following amendments: in the third line strike out "fifty" and insert "twenty-five;" in line six strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifteen;" and in line seven, after the word "pensioner," insert "or his attorney in fact."

That the House recede from their disagreement to Senate amendment numbered nine, and agree to the same with the following amendment: after the word "age" in line six insert "and the father as well as the mother."

That the House recede from their disagreement to Senate amendment numbered ten, and that the following be inserted after the word "time" in line six: "and in every case in which a claim for pension shall not have been filed within three years after the discharge or decease of the party on whose account the claim is made, the pension, if allowed, shall commence from the date of filing the last paper in said case by the party prosecuting the same."

That the House refuse to recede from their disagreement to Senate amendment numbered eleven, and that the Senate recede from said amendment.

That the House recede from their disagreement to Senate amendment numbered twelve, and agree to the same with the following amendment: in lines fifteen, sixteen, and seventeen, strike out the words "for a period of two years next preceding the enlistment of the man."

H. S. LANE.

P. G. VAN WINKLE.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

SIDNEY PERHAM,

G. V. LAWRENCE,

NELSON TAYLOR,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The bill (H. R. No. 513) to reduce internal taxation and to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is suggested to me that it may be well to print a few extra copies of this bill, as they will be needed for use to a considerable extent. I propose that we order the printing of five hundred extra copies, and I suppose it can be done by common consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rules a motion to print extra copies goes to the Committee on Printing; but the Chair can entertain the motion by the unanimous consent of the Senate. The Senator from Maine moves that five hundred extra copies of this bill be printed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from New Hampshire suggests to me that the law requiring such a motion to be referred to the Committee on Printing can hardly be dispensed with by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLARK. The law requires that a motion to print extra copies should go to the Committee on Printing. They can report it back in a few moments.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ANTHONY subsequently, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the motion submitted by Mr. FESSENDEN to print five hundred extra copies of House bill No. 513, reported in favor of the motion; and it was agreed to.

DEATH OF GENERAL SCOTT.

Mr. WILSON, from the joint Military Committees of the two Houses, authorized to report what measures should be taken in relation to the death of General Scott, reported the following concurrent resolutions:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the two Houses of Congress have received with profound sensibility the intelligence of the death of Brevet Lieutenant General Winfield Scott.

Resolved, That the exalted virtues, both public and private, and the wisdom, patriotism, and valor of this illustrious man in defense of his country and the maintenance of her honor and glory for more than half a century against foreign and domestic enemies, in war and in peace, claim the liveliest gratitude and the deepest veneration of the American people.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, when the two Houses of Congress adjourn to-day, they shall adjourn to meet on Monday next, and that a joint committee, to consist of seven members of the Senate and nine members of the House of Representatives, be appointed, who, together with the Presiding Officers of both Houses, shall proceed to West Point to represent Congress at the funeral ceremonies which are to take place to-morrow, and that said committee be attended by the Sergeants-at-Arms of both Houses.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the present consideration of the resolutions.

The resolutions were considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to nem. con.

Mr. WILSON subsequently said: I move that the committee ordered to be appointed to attend the funeral of General Scott to-morrow be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to.

A message was afterward received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announcing its concurrence in the resolutions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. WILSON, Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. LANE of Indiana, Mr. DAVIS, Mr. GRIMES, Mr. ANTHONY, and Mr. NESMITH as the committee on the part of the Senate.

KANSAS AND NEOSHO VALLEY RAILROAD.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 285.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 285) granting lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Kansas and Neosho Valley railroad and its extension to Red river.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment reported by the committee was in section one, line ten, after the word "Kansas" to insert "with a view of its extension."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line twelve, to strike out the word "Parston" and insert "Preston."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That modification will be made without a vote, if there be no objection.

The next amendment was in the same section, line fifteen, after the word "land" to insert "or parts thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the same section, line forty-five, to strike out after the word "road" the words "from the even-numbered sections of said lands reserved to the United States;" so that the proviso will read:

And provided further, That said lands hereby granted shall not be selected beyond twenty miles from the line of said road, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section two, line fifteen, after the word "who" to insert "make their settlement after the passage of this act, and;" so that the clause will read:

That settlers under the provisions of the homestead act who make their settlement after the passage of this act, and comply with the terms and requirements of said act, shall be entitled, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the same section, lines eighteen and nineteen, to strike out the words "anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section three, line four, after the word "at" to insert "all;" so that the clause will read:

Said company, after the construction of its road, shall keep it in repair and use, and at all times be in readiness to transport troops, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section three, line seventeen, to strike out "one hundred" and insert "so many," and in line eighteen to strike out "and" and insert "as are;" so that the clause will read:

Then the said Secretary of the Interior shall issue to the said company patents for so many sections of the land within the limits above named as are contiguous with said completed section hereinbefore granted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twenty-four of the same section to strike out "one hundred sections of said" and insert "the."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the same section, lines twenty-six, twenty-seven, twenty-eight, twenty-nine, thirty, and thirty-one, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That if said railroad company or its assigns shall fail to complete at least one section of said road each year from the date of its acceptance of the grant provided for in this act, then its right to the lands for said section so failing of completion shall revert to the Government of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirty-two of the same section to strike out "further" in the clause "and provided further."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is a verbal amendment, and will be made without a vote unless there be objection.

The next amendment was in section eight, line ten, after the word "assigns" to strike out "and to its branches;" so that the clause will read:

And the right of way through said Indian Territory is hereby granted to said Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, to the extent of one hundred feet on each side of said road or roads, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section nine, line six, after "public" to strike out "domain" and insert "lands of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section ten, line seven, after the word "approval" to insert "of the President."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section eleven, line three, after the word "State" to strike out "may connect with the Kansas and Neosho Valley railroad at any point on the line of said road," and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

Which may have been heretofore or shall hereafter be recognized and subsidized by any act of the Congress of the United States, may connect, unite, and consolidate with this railroad company, after the same shall be located to the valley of the Neosho river, upon just, fair, and equitable terms, to be agreed upon between the parties, and shall not be against the public interest or the interest of the United States; nor shall any road authorized to connect as aforesaid charge the road so connecting a greater tariff per mile for freight or passengers than is charged for the same per mile by its own road: And provided further, That should the Leavenworth, Lawrence, and Fort Gibson Railroad Company, or the Union Pacific Railroad Company, southern branch, construct and complete its road to that point on the southern boundary of the State of Kansas where the line of said Kansas and Neosho Valley railroad shall cross the same, before the said Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad Company shall have constructed and completed its said road to said point, then and in that event the company so first reaching in completion the said point on the southern boundary of the State of Kansas shall be authorized, upon obtaining the written approval of the President of the United States, to construct and operate its line of railroad from said point to a point at or near Preston, in the State of Texas, with grants of land according to the provisions of this bill, but upon the further special condition, nevertheless, that said railroad company shall have commenced in good faith the construction thereof before the said Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad Company shall have completed its said railroad to said point: And provided further, That said other railroad company, so having commenced said work in good faith, shall continue to prosecute the same with sufficient energy to insure the completion of the same within a reasonable time, subject to the approval of the President of the United States: And provided further, That the right of way, when not otherwise granted in this bill, shall be obtained by said Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad Company, or either of the other companies named in this act, in accordance with the provisions of section three of an act to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I presume that amendment will, to some extent, involve the general merits of the bill, on which I desire to address the Senate very briefly. But if it is the intention of the Senator from Michigan to call up his resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution this morning, of course I will waive the examination of this bill at present.

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly I intended to call it up this morning at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired; and the unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate, upon which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] is entitled to the floor.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announcing that the House had passed the following bill and resolution of the Senate, without amendment:

A bill (S. No. 208) to protect American citizens engaged in lumbering on the St. Croix river, in the State of Maine; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 92) authorizing the appointment of examiners to examine a site for a fresh-water basin for iron-clad vessels of the United States Navy.

The message also announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 459) granting a pension to Anna E. Ward, and agreed to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses; and that Messrs. NELSON TAYLOR of New York, P. SAWYER of Wisconsin, and AARON HARDING of Kentucky, were conferees on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 527) to promote the construction of a line of railroads between the city of Washington and the Northwest for national purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 537) to promote the construction of a line of railroad from Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, to Cleveland, Ohio.

These two bills were read twice by their titles, and on motion of Mr. GRIMES referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 184) to define more clearly the jurisdiction and powers of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 167) to incorporate the Women's Hospital Association of the District of Columbia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 11) to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communication among the several States.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 127) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. HOWARD to insert as section three of the proposed article of constitutional amendment the following:

That no person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two thirds of each House, remove such disability.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I thank the Senate for its kindness in postponing the consideration of this resolution last evening until the present moment. The hour was late and I was somewhat weary; and more, at the moment, from the manner and tone of my friend from Illinois, perhaps, than anything else, I confess that I felt some little degree of resentment, but that has passed. I know my friend from Illinois so well, and have known him so long, that it is but just to him and myself to say that I know very well that under that tone which he sometimes assumes in debate, apparently of anger, so provoking to a stranger, nothing of the kind is, in fact, intended. Sir, the moment has passed, and with it all feeling of resentment. I shall address myself to the ideas to which he gave utterance in reply to some points which I had briefly stated in objection to this amendment.

He began by saying that there were some peculiar ideas in Wisconsin, he thought. Now, I assure my friend that no ideas are prevalent there, that I am aware of, which do not prevail also in Illinois and the adjoining States. Among others, he referred to what has been referred to before, a certain statement alleged to have been made by the First Assistant Postmaster General, formerly Governor of the State of Wisconsin. It so happens that since last evening's discussion I met Governor Randall, and he authorized me to say to my friend from Wisconsin [Illinois] that the remark to which he refers is not correct, that the statement is false, and therefore those who repeat it are giving currency to a falsehood unjust to him.

Mr. HOWE. Was that remark addressed to me—your "friend from Wisconsin?"

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I meant to say "my friend from Illinois." It was my friend from Illinois who made the remark yesterday.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I believe I stated that I had seen some statement in the papers in regard to it, and I think I said I did not know whether it was true or not.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I did not understand the Senator from Illinois to vouch for the truth of it. What I state is, that the First Assistant Postmaster General authorizes me to say that the statement to which the Senator referred as circulating is false.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I know nothing about the statement, any further than that I saw it in the papers.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Of course I do not intend to say that what the Senator stated, that he saw it in a newspaper, is false—not at all, but that the statement circulating in reference to Governor Randall was a false statement. My friend from Illinois also made a remark in relation to what I said on a former occasion which I think was not warranted by what I said. I stated that executive officers were responsible to the President as the chief executive officer of the Government. My friend from Illinois seems to think that because I made this statement that they are responsible to the President, because he under the Constitution has placed upon him the responsibility of seeing that the laws are faithfully executed, I intended to say that these men were subject merely to the will of the Executive and not to the laws of the land. Not at all, sir. The responsibility of the Executive is to see that those men who are exercising executive functions under him faithfully execute the laws of the land.

And, sir, is that an idea peculiar to Wisconsin? I think that is a fundamental idea well understood, and has been from the beginning of the Government, that the President being the chief Executive and sworn under the Constitution to see that the laws are faithfully executed, executive officers who are under him are responsible to him in that sense that he must see that they faithfully discharge their duties.

Now, Mr. President, enough on this question which has no bearing whatever on the subject before the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. My colleague will indulge me—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If my colleague will allow me to conclude, I desire to leave all these personal matters and go on simply with the consideration of the question before the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. I simply want to know precisely what the contradiction is which is made here in behalf of the First Assistant Postmaster General. I understand him to deny the truth of a statement made yesterday by the Senator from Illinois. The statement made by the Senator from Illinois, I think, has some reference to a declaration of mine made here some time previous. I should like to know what the precise issue is. Here is one remark made by the Senator from Illinois yesterday, as printed in the Globe:

"I recollect having seen in the newspapers—I do not know whether it is true or not; I very seldom allude to newspaper articles—but I saw in some of the newspapers that an officer of this Government, who was supposed to control some patronage in the minor offices of the country, spoke of the officers as 'eating the bread and butter of the President.' I recollect the Senator from Wisconsin himself in a speech some days ago, spoke of the 'President's officers.'"

Is it denied by the First Assistant Postmaster General that he has spoken of officers as "eating the bread and butter of the President?" Is that the statement which is denied?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The statement that I made was that I had seen the First Assistant Postmaster General, and that in conversation, alluding to that subject, he had authorized me to state that that rumor or statement which was circulating in the newspapers is not true, that it is false.

Mr. HOWE. The language substantially as used by the Senator from Illinois yesterday, I believe, was first introduced here by myself. I stated here that I had been told that the First Assistant Postmaster General had declared that no man should eat the bread and butter of the President unless he sustained his policy. That is as near as I remember the language. I made that statement upon the authority of a member of the House of Representatives. I met the First Assistant Postmaster General in the evening after I had made that remark. He did not call its correctness in question; but when I returned to my boarding-house, I found a note from him asking me upon what authority I made that statement. I replied to him, saying I made it upon the authority of the Representative of the fifth district of the State of Wisconsin, since which I have heard nothing from him or any one else questioning the accuracy of that statement until this remark was made here by my colleague.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have stated what he authorized me to state on that subject. Of course I personally do not undertake to state the fact one way or another.

But enough, sir, on that subject of personalities. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the question involved in the amendment. I stated in the course of my remarks yesterday that the oath which Congress required all officers under the Government of the United States to take, so long as that oath remained unrepealed by law, effected all that is effected by this amendment. It excludes those who cannot take it from entering upon any office under the Government of the United States. Of course the oath does not refer to State officers. As to State officers, this proposed amendment goes further than that oath; but as to all Federal officers, the oath required to be taken by them, that they have not engaged in this rebellion against the Government of the United States, is as effectual, so long as that law stands unrepealed, as this amendment would be.

The Senator from Illinois, in reply to this, says that it is a new doctrine in me to maintain that members of Congress should obey the laws of the land and take the oaths which are prescribed by law before they are entitled to admission; that I have contended that each House was to judge for itself of the qualifications, elections, and returns of its members; and that in that judgment each House was independent of the other. Mr. President, I have contended that each House is the judge, and the sole judge, the judge without appeal, the judge over whom neither the President nor the Supreme Court nor the other House has any rightful control whatever. But does the Senator from Illinois suppose that I ever maintained that the House of Representatives or the Senate, in making up its judgment, should violate the laws of the land? Such an idea never entered into my brain, I can assure the Senator from Illinois. I supposed that the Senate of the United States would judge according to law. Has it come to this, that because I insist that the Senate of the United States shall judge upon the elections, qualifications, and returns of its members, I have any idea that the Senate will undertake to violate the laws of the land or repeal the laws of the land? I never heard such an idea suggested by any human being. I never thought that it could enter into the mind of any human being. I have confidence in the judgment of the Senate, that the Senate will judge right, that the Senate will judge as a tribunal authorized by the Constitution to judge, and to which is given the sole judgment on that question. I think, therefore, that the remark of the Senator from Illinois, that he was glad that I was now disposed to obey the laws, was a remark which was not called for by anything I have ever uttered on this floor or elsewhere. I am just as much in favor of maintaining the laws and the Constitution as the Senator from Illinois possibly can be, and I have always maintained the validity of this oath, under the Constitution, which was required. As to the President of the United States, his oath is specified in the Constitution; and as the Vice President, in the event of the resignation or death of the President, is to exercise the same office, the only doubt I have ever had was whether the Vice President ought not to take the same oath as the President; whether we can prescribe to the Vice President a different oath from what the Constitution requires us to prescribe to the President. That is the only doubt I have ever had, and that is a question upon which I have doubts, for the reason I have stated, because the Vice President, in a certain contingency, is to take the place of the President, and to act in his stead. But, sir, that is not a question arising here.

I maintained, further, that this proposed amendment prescribes a new punishment for an offense which has already been committed. My honorable friend says that this is not punishment; that that idea must be peculiar to Wisconsin; that to pass a law or the sentence of a court or the decree of any tribunal which shall deprive a person of an office, or which shall disqualify him forever to hold an office is not a punishment. Sir, this idea is by no means peculiar to Wisconsin. There is not a State in this Union where, in some of the criminal statutes, is not to be found, as a part of the penalty attached to the crime which has been committed, a disqualification in certain cases to hold an office; and in cases of impeachment before this body, the highest tribunal known to the laws of the land, when the judgment of this body is pronounced, it is confined by the Constitution to that very thing, removal from office and disqualification from ever holding office, after the judgment of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment. The Constitution says:

"Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than removal from office and a disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States."

In the State of Illinois, in the State of Wisconsin, and other States, there are criminal statutes, in which, on the commission of certain offenses, a part of the punishment which is imposed by express statute is made the deprivation of this right to hold an office, disqualification forever to hold an office. It is part and parcel of the judgment in a criminal case. It carries that effect with it. Many of the States provide that when a person has been convicted of an offense amounting to a felony he shall not only be deprived of the right to hold office, but the right to vote as a citizen; his citizenship is forfeited. Sir, this is a penalty, a new penalty, an additional penalty imposed after the fact has transpired, after the crime has been committed. Where a new punishment is provided by law for an offense which has already been committed, unless the law which provides for it expressly saves it, the old penalty is gone. Such is the decision of all criminal courts in all States and countries. You cannot change the punishment of the offense without wiping out the old penalty, and here, sir, if you insert by way of a constitutional amendment this ex post facto provision, a bill of attainder, for it is nothing more nor less, it wipes out the old penalty, and all the penalties which attach will be the penalties which attach under this provision, unless the provision itself provides for saving the old penalty.

But, Mr. President, there is another objection to this proposed amendment as it stands. This amendment applies equally to those who were forced into the rebel service as to those who went in voluntarily. I call the attention of Senators to the fact that the men who were conscripted into the rebel service, men who were carried into it at the point of the bayonet, men who were hunted all over the States of the South by the myrmidons of this rebellion to compel them to enter the service, are just as much subjected to penalties under this amendment as those who went into it of their own free will. Mr. President, has it come to this, that in this high place and in this body, we can make no distinction between the innocent and the guilty; no distinction in favor of those men who have been hunted like wild beasts from valley to valley all over the States of the South, and forced, conscripted, compelled to go into the service against their will, but that they are to stand upon precisely the same ground with the men who were guilty of this offense from the beginning? Sir, public judgment revolts against the proposition, and the conscience and the humanity of the American people will stamp this proposition as being in violation of every principle of justice and against the humanity of the age. It is beyond belief that the Senate of the United States proposes to treat these men who have been hunted, conscripted, and forced at the point of the bayonet to go into the rebellion, as if they were equally guilty with the leaders of the rebellion.

Mr. President, I speak of the injustice of the proposition in this respect. What hope is there that a proposition like that will receive the sanction of the American people? None whatever. It ought not to receive their sanction, for it is founded in injustice, that injustice which annihilates the distinctions between innocence and guilt, between the men who have suffered, and suffered more than the men of the North have suffered; who have been conscripted, forced into the rebellion, and compelled at the point of the bayonet to do its bidding, and the men who went into it of their own free will. Sir, it is perhaps predestined that this resolution must pass in this form. It has perhaps passed through one of those consultations where results are arrived at that no considerations can change. Nothing can modify it. It must be, like the decrees of fate, accomplished. But, sir, it does seem to me that this Senate ought to pause before they abolish all distinction in the southern States between those who were forced into the rebel army and those who went in of their own free will.

But, sir, there is another objection to this amendment as it stands. It proposes to annul in some cases the pardons and amnesties which have already been granted under the laws of Congress, and the proclamations of the President issued in pursuance thereof. Are we prepared to do that? Can this Congress stand before this country and the civilized world and say, "We authorized the President of the United States by proclamations to declare full amnesty and pardon upon certain terms and conditions; that amnesty and pardon has been extended; the oaths of allegiance have been taken; these men have in good faith accepted the conditions of the pardon and amnesty; and yet Congress proposes by a constitutional amendment to annul those pardons and wipe out that amnesty?" On what kind of principle can we stand before the civilized world and do that? That I may make no mistake I desire to read the section of the statute which authorized both President Lincoln and President Johnson to grant pardon and amnesty to those who had taken part in the rebellion. On the 17th of July, 1862, Congress enacted in these words:

"That the President is hereby authorized, at any time hereafter—

No limitation as to time—

"by proclamation, to extend to persons who may have participated in the existing rebellion in any State or part thereof, pardon and amnesty, with such exceptions and at such time and on such conditions as he may deem expedient for the public welfare."

Now, Mr. President, independent of that authority which the Constitution confers upon the President as the chief Executive to issue pardons to persons who are guilty of offenses against the laws of the United States, here is an express provision enacted by Congress, authorizing the President, as he should deem expedient for the public welfare, to grant amnesty and pardon to those who had been engaged in this rebellion. In pursuance of this statute, Mr. Lincoln, President of the United States, in December following the passage of this law did issue a proclamation granting pardon and amnesty to persons who had been engaged in this rebellion, upon the terms and conditions therein specified. I read from that proclamation:

"Whereas in and by the Constitution of the United States it is provided that the President 'shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment;' and whereas a rebellion now exists whereby the loyal State governments of several States have for a long time been subverted, and many persons have committed, and are now guilty of, treason against the United States; and whereas, with reference to said rebellion and treason, laws have been enacted by Congress, declaring forfeitures and confiscation of property and liberation of slaves, all upon terms and conditions therein stated, and also declaring that the President was thereby authorized at any time thereafter, by proclamation, to extend to persons who may have participated in the existing rebellion, in any State or part thereof, pardon and amnesty, with such exceptions and at such times and on such conditions as he may deem expedient for the public welfare; and whereas the congressional declaration for limited and conditional pardon accords with well-established judicial exposition of the pardoning power; and whereas, with reference to said rebellion, the President of the United States has issued several proclamations, with provisions in regard to the liberation of slaves; and whereas it is now desired by some persons heretofore engaged in said rebellion to resume their allegiance to the United States, and to reinaugurate loyal State governments within and for their respective States: Therefore,

"I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do proclaim, declare, and make known to all persons who have, directly or by implication, participated in the existing rebellion, except as hereinafter excepted, that a full pardon is hereby granted to them and each of them, with restoration of all rights of property, except as to slaves."

The conditions were the taking of a certain oath which is herein mentioned, and which it is not necessary that I should read. Now, the persons who were excepted from the benefits of this pardon and amnesty granted by President Lincoln, were as follows:

"The persons excepted from the benefits of the foregoing provisions are all who are, or shall have been, civil or diplomatic officers or agents of the so-called confederate government; all who have left judicial stations under the United States to aid the rebellion; all who are, or shall have been, military or naval officers of said so-called confederate government above the rank of colonel in the army or of lieutenant in the navy; all who left seats in the United States Congress to aid the rebellion; all who resigned commissions in the Army or Navy of the United States and afterwards aided the rebellion; and all who have engaged in any way in treating colored persons, or white persons in charge of such, otherwise than lawfully as prisoners of war, and which persons may have been found in the United States service as soldiers, seamen, or in any other capacity."

All these classes of persons were excepted from this pardon and amnesty; but the constitutional amendment now proposed to be inserted includes very many of those persons to whom pardon and amnesty were extended under the Constitution and laws of the United States by President Lincoln. Now, I ask, by what right do you undertake to annul that amnesty and take away that pardon? Is it upon the ground that might gives right, and that if by any proceeding the Constitution of the United States can be amended so as in effect to work an ex post facto attainder of men to whom pardon and amnesty have been extended, you will do it?

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If it is right on this point.

Mr. MORRILL. Are we to understand the Senator to maintain that amnesty and pardon necessarily relieve from all civil disabilities, and grant restoration of all civil rights?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think so, undoubtedly. I think undoubtedly that where an offense is committed by any person against the laws of the United States, and the President, in pursuance of the Constitution and laws, grants full pardon and amnesty to the offender, he is restored to his position as a citizen to all intents and purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member perhaps might state it in this way: one of the acts we have passed during the rebellion provides that for the offenses stated in that act a person may be indicted and tried and punished, and it provided, as a part of the punishment, for his exclusion from the right to hold office. Now, I submit to my friend from Maine whether if one has been convicted under that act, and has been adjudged to suffer that punishment, and the President then should pardon him, the pardon would not remove the disability consequent upon that judgment.

The question in relation to the general effect of the pardoning power of the President has been discussed in the Supreme Court, so far as the exercise of that power concerns the obligation to take the oath which we have prescribed for permission to practice in the courts of the United States. The Senate will remember that the same oath which we take here every lawyer is required to take before he can practice in the courts of the United States. The validity of that act, as far as counsel is concerned, was one of the questions which were argued and reargued by direction of the court at the last term; and as the two gentlemen who applied to practice without taking the oath had been pardoned by the President, another question was argued, whether the effect of the pardon was not to exempt them from the obligation to take the oath, and upon that question, I have reason to believe, the Supreme Court was divided. Certainly, from all accounts, four of the judges thought that the pardon did operate as an exemption, and one doubted; and the question is now held under advisement, to be settled the one way or the other when the Supreme Court meets; but the authorities cited—have not them in my memory exactly—went very far, as I thought, to prove that the operation of the pardon was to clear the party pardoned from the obligation to take that oath; and that upon the ground that the oath itself excluding a party from the privilege of practicing in the courts of the United States was in the nature of a penalty.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President—

Mr. GRIMES. Let me say one word.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. All this is in my speech.

Mr. HOWE. I wish the Senator from Maryland, as he was giving us the state of the authorities on this question, would tell us whether he knows of any authority which has gone to the extent of declaring that either an amnesty or a pardon can impose any limitation upon the power of the people of the United States through an amendment of their Constitution to fix the qualifications of officers.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is not the question to which I spoke; it is quite another inquiry. I was speaking of the operation of a statute.

Mr. HOWE. But it is the question which the Senator from Maine was suggesting.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] has hit at the very suggestion which I was about to make. It may be, and probably is, that in the case put by the Senator from Maryland, where the disability to hold future office was attached to the commission of a crime which had been proved against the party, that would be regarded as a part of the penalty; but the fallacy of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] is, that he assumes that this disability embodied in the third section is as a penalty for an offense committed. It is intended as a prevention against the future commission of offenses, the presumption being fair and legitimate that the man who has once violated his oath will be more liable to violate his fealty to the Government in the future.

Mr. MORRILL. Before the honorable Senator from Wisconsin proceeds, I trust he will allow me a moment as I seem to have been misunderstood. I did not intend to interrupt the line of his remarks; but I did intend to bring to his mind the question whether he recognized what I regard as an obvious distinction between the penalty which the State affixes to a crime and that disability which the State imposes and has the right to impose against persons whom it does not choose to intrust with official station. That was the distinction, and I wished to see if the honorable Senator recognized it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The question of the effect of the pardon upon men who have been convicted of offenses is pretty well understood by all who are familiar with judicial proceedings. We all know that if a man is convicted of felony a full pardon restores him to his civil rights. He may be pardoned on condition that he shall not be restored to his civil rights; and if the pardon expresses that condition it is good. He may be pardoned out of the State prison on the condition that he shall leave the State. He may be pardoned out on the condition that he shall not be restored to his civil rights as a citizen, his right to vote and hold office. But when an unlimited, unconditional pardon is given it covers the whole ground. The question in regard to lawyers is altogether a different case from the case of a man who has committed an offense, because to practice law is the lawyer's business, his profession, he lives by it, and to take it from him is to deprive him of a valuable thing. The other is a question which goes to disability as to civil rights growing out of the commission of a crime.

I have said, Mr. President, that Mr. Lincoln's proclamation specified certain persons that were excepted from the operation of the amnesty which he granted. Mr. Johnson after he became President, on the 29th of May, 1865, in pursuance of the statute which I have read, and which gave him full authority to act in the case and to specify the terms and conditions upon which amnesty and pardon should be given, issued a proclamation in which he used the following language:

"Whereas the President of the United States, on the 8th day of December, A. D. 1863, and on the 25th day of March, A. D. 1864, did, with the object to suppress the existing rebellion, to induce all persons to return to their loyalty, and to restore the authority of the United States, issue proclamations offering amnesty and pardon to certain persons who had directly or by implication participated in the said rebellion; and whereas many persons who had so engaged in said rebellion have, since the issuance of said proclamations, failed or neglected to take the benefits offered thereby; and whereas many persons who have been justly deprived of all claim to amnesty and pardon thereunder, by reason of their participation directly or by implication in said rebellion, and continued hostility to the Government of the United States since the date of said proclamation, now desire to apply for and obtain amnesty and pardon:

To the end, therefore, that the authority of the Government of the United States may be restored, and that peace, order, and freedom may be established, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do proclaim and declare that I hereby grant to all persons who have, directly or indirectly, participated in the existing rebellion, except as hereinafter excepted, amnesty and pardon, with restoration of all rights of property, except as to slaves, and except in cases where legal proceedings, under the laws of the United States providing for the confiscation of property of persons engaged in rebellion, have been instituted; but upon the condition, nevertheless, that every such person shall take and subscribe the following oath, (or affirmation,) and thenceforward keep and maintain said oath inviolate; and which oath shall be registered for permanent preservation, and shall be of the tenor and effect following, to wit:

"I, _____, do solemnly swear, (or affirm,) in presence of Almighty God, that I will henceforth faithfully support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States, and the Union of the States thereunder; and that I will in like manner abide by and faithfully support all laws and proclamations which have been made during the existing rebellion with reference to the emancipation of slaves. So help me God."

Mr. President, the question is sometimes asked, where did Mr. Johnson, as President, get the power to prescribe any such condition as this? Here is the statute, in the twelfth volume of the Statutes-at-Large, page 592, in which Congress in express terms declared that he should have power to grant pardon and amnesty "with such exceptions, and at such time, and on such conditions as he may deem expedient for the public welfare." He deemed it expedient for the public welfare, in granting this pardon and amnesty, to require of those who accepted it that they should take that oath. He had authority, under the statute, to prescribe it as one of the conditions of the amnesty granted; and the oath is, that henceforth they will faithfully support and defend the Constitution of the United States and the Union of the States thereunder, and that they will in like manner abide by and faithfully support all laws and proclamations which have been made during the existing rebellion with reference to the emancipation of slaves. There is where he got the power. At all events, if there were any doubt about his having the power under the language of the Constitution itself, there is an authority given by Congress to him to say that if the men who had been engaged in the rebellion would take an oath to support the Constitution henceforth, and to support the proclamations emancipating slaves, they should have pardon. Sir, in addition to that oath he went further and put into the very pardons themselves which were granted to the individuals, terms and conditions there expressed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I hope the Senator from Delaware will not interrupt me. I have been very much interrupted, and have had three or four speeches interjected into my speech now. It costs too much to print a speech with the speeches of others in it. Mr. Johnson, in his proclamation from which I have read, specified the exceptions, namely:

"The following classes of persons are excepted from the benefits of this proclamation: first, all who are or shall have been pretended civil or diplomatic officers or otherwise domestic or foreign agents of the pretended government; second, all who left judicial stations under the United States to aid the rebellion; third, all who shall have been military or naval officers of said pretended confederate government above the rank of colonel in the army or lieutenant in the navy; fourth, all who left seats in the Congress of the United States to aid the rebellion; fifth, all who resigned or tendered resignations of their commissions in the Army or Navy of the United States to evade duty in resisting the rebellion; sixth, all who have engaged in any way in treating otherwise than lawfully as prisoners of war persons found in the United States service as officers, soldiers, seamen, or in other capacities; seventh, all persons who have been or are absentees from the United States for the purpose of aiding the rebellion; eighth, all military and naval officers in the rebel service who were educated by the Government in the Military Academy at West Point or the United States Naval Academy; ninth, all persons who held the pretended offices of Governors of States in insurrection against the United States; tenth, all persons who left their homes within the jurisdiction and protection of the United States, and passed beyond the Federal military lines into the pretended confederate States for the purpose of aiding the rebellion; eleventh, all persons who have been engaged in the destruction of the commerce of the United States upon the high seas, and all persons who have made raids into the United States from Canada, or been engaged in destroying the commerce of the United States upon the lakes and rivers that separate the British Provinces from the United States; twelfth, all persons who, at the time when they seek to obtain the benefits hereof by taking the oath herein prescribed, are in military, naval, or civil confinement or custody, or under bonds of the civil, military, or naval authorities or agents of the United States as prisoners of war, or persons detained for offenses of any kind, either before or after conviction; thirteenth, all persons who have voluntarily participated in said rebellion, and the estimated value of whose taxable property is over twenty thousand dollars; fourteenth, all persons who have taken the oath of amnesty as prescribed in the President's proclamation of December 8, A. D. 1863, or an oath of allegiance to the Government of the United States since the date of said proclamation, and who have not thenceforward kept and maintained the same inviolate; Provided, That special application may be made to the President for pardon by any person belonging to the excepted classes; and such clemency will be liberally extended as may be consistent with the facts of the case and the peace and dignity of the United States."

These were the terms of amnesty and pardon which were proclaimed by the President, in pursuance of the express statute passed by the Congress of the United States. Now, sir, this amendment proposed to the Constitution embraces large numbers of persons to whom pardon and amnesty have already been given. I know it may be said that by an amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which is the supreme law of the land, you can annul all existing rights. You could, perhaps, by an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, enact a provision which would deprive individual citizens of their property, and vest the whole of it in the government of a State or in the Government of the United States; you might, perhaps, by a constitutional amendment, pass a bill of attainder by which certain men should be sentenced to death and to corruption of blood; but, sir, would it be right? That is the question.

Where men in good faith have taken this oath and accepted the terms of this amnesty and pardon, is it right to undertake, by a constitutional amendment, to rob them of this vested right? Sir, I have never been taught to believe that might was right, or that such a provision would be right because we had the power to pass it. I maintain that good faith, the good faith of this Government which was pledged by the Congress of the United States, and the President acting under the authority of Congress, requires us not to undertake to destroy or take away the rights which we ourselves have vested. Our honor is involved in it, and we cannot, as honorable men, it seems to me, undertake to annul what we ourselves have given and they have accepted in good faith.

While upon this subject of pardons, as so much has been said from time to time of the numbers of pardons that have been granted, I beg leave to state from a paper which I hold in my hand, furnished to me, and which I believe to be correct, that there still remain unpardoned, liable to trial and to conviction and punishment among the chief leaders of the rebellion, one hundred and thirty major and brigadier generals, eighty-eight members of the confederate congress, so called, one hundred and fifty-eight ex-United States Army officers, and one hundred and twenty-two ex-United States Navy officers, who left our service to join the rebellion, and of the prominent rebel officials, like cabinet officers and governors of States, thirty-seven. In all five hundred and thirty-five of these principal officers remain unpardoned. They are in the hands of the law, liable to be tried, certainly all the civilians at least. As to major generals and brigadier generals who surrendered, the terms of the surrender may control the good faith of the United States on the question of their trial, conviction, and punishment.

Mr. President, to this amendment I object also because it assumes on the part of the Constitution of the United States to fix the qualifications of those officers who hold offices under the State governments. If it were confined to officers under the United States, to Senators and Representatives in Congress, and to all persons holding office under the Government of the United States, I could well see the propriety of the United States prescribing the qualifications of their own officers. But when you go beyond that and undertake by the Constitution of the United States to prescribe the qualifications of officers under the laws and constitutions of the States, it seems to me you are interfering with a question which belongs to the people of the States. In the States of Tennessee, Missouri, Maryland, and West Virginia the people have assumed to pass upon the question for themselves. They prescribe the qualifications of those who shall hold offices under their State governments. I think that is a matter which belongs to the people of the States.

I stated yesterday that in my judgment one of the great dangers to be apprehended from inserting this proposition as a part of the constitutional amendment to be submitted would be to prevent the adoption of the residue of the amendment, for I understand this proposition to be to submit all these sections together as one amendment, although there are five or six sections, the subjects-matter of which are entirely distinct. The proposition seems to be to submit them all together, so that if there is one section which three fourths of the States refuse to sanction, all will be lost. I think that certainly if this amendment is to be pressed in its present form each section should be submitted in so many distinct and independent articles so that if any article were adopted by three fourths of the States, that article could become a part of the Constitution. For instance, that article which forbids the assumption of the rebel debt and that article on the subject of the basis of representation might be adopted, when this, from the form in which it stands, would not be able to command the assent or ratification of three fourths of the States, and therefore all might be lost.

Now, Mr. President, I confess for one that if constitutional amendments are to be submitted I desire that they should be submitted in such a form that they will be adopted. I want this thing closed up, not kept open forever. If these amendments are submitted in such form as not to receive the sanction of three fourths of the States, where are we? Still in a state of quasi war. I think that this clause which is now proposed to be inserted in the amendment, instead of tending to reconstruction or restoration, has a tendency to obstruct the very thing at which all aim or should aim.

I am just as liable to be mistaken as any other person; but it is my deliberate opinion that if on the first day of this session we had admitted into both Houses of Congress those gentlemen who came here and who were prepared in good faith to take the oath which we require to be taken, we should this day be in a much better condition than we are now. I believe that if these men who could take the oath had been admitted, and those who could not take it had been sent home, the people of those States would have found men who would take the oath, there would have been Representatives from many, if not all, of the States, by this time, and we should have presented the spectacle of a united people, the United States, not the disunited States, not a condition of quasi war, a moral warfare, a condition in which we hear from one end of the session almost to the other continual denunciation and vituperation, and which does not tend to peace, does not tend to restoration or the harmony of the States.

I believe, sir, that these men would have been able in all these States to have built up a powerful party to support them if we had taken them by the hand, countenanced them, and given them the moral support of Congress and of the Government. But by our treating them as if they were like rebels themselves we discourage them and discourage the men who stood with them. I have no doubt of another thing, that if this day the Representatives from all these States who could take the oath of allegiance were in Congress, speaking the voice of a united people to the civilized world, our bonds would stand at ten per cent. higher than they do to-day. I have no doubt of another thing, that had all these States been represented by loyal men taking the oath of allegiance, joining with us heart and hand to speak the united voice of the American people, Maximilian would have left Mexico before now.

Sir, did you not read the speech of Roebuck in the British Parliament the other day, the man who from the beginning hoped for the dissolution of the Union, labored for it, denounced the English Government for not interfering to aid the South to dissolve the Union?

Mr. CONNESS. I believe, if the Senator will permit me to say it, that he uses the term, applied to our country, of "disunited States." I think he does.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I say that is the position in which you place us and have endeavored to place us from the beginning and from before the beginning of this Congress, while I have struggled to place us in the position of the United States, speaking one voice, rallying under the same flag; and I repeat it here, without twenty-five stars on it, either. Our national salute is thirty-six guns, not twenty-five; our flag bears thirty-six stars, the representatives of thirty-six States of the Union, not twenty-five. And, sir, placed in that position, how much better should we stand before the nations of the earth. Roebuck would not rise in Parliament to say, "Wait a little longer; the war is not yet over; the States are still separated; they are denouncing each other; there is danger of a new civil war breaking out."

Mr. President, I say, as I said before, that I claim no more weight for my opinion than belongs to any other person; but this is the light in which I look upon the situation. This is the danger which is impending over us now, that we are endeavoring to put into this constitutional amendment that which, instead of tending to peace, tends to obstruction, tends not to restore but to keep separated.

I had no intention of detaining the Senate at so much length; but I wish to move an amendment to this proposition. After the words "shall have" and before the words "engaged in insurrection or rebellion," in line thirty-seven, I move to insert the word "voluntarily." I shall also propose in the same section, after the word "thereof" and before the word "but," in line thirty-nine, to insert "excepting those who have duly received pardon and amnesty under the Constitution and laws, and will take such oath as shall be required by law." My first amendment is to insert the word "voluntarily," and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I do not propose to debate at this time the subject of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States; but I will make a single remark in support of the view taken by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin in relation to his proposition to exempt from the effect of the amendment now pending all the persons who were forced involuntarily into the confederate service. I am somewhat surprised that a proposition so just, so humane, and so politic as that should not receive the unanimous sanction of the Senate. We all know that coercion and a power of compulsion to do a criminal act, which cannot be resisted by the party who is guilty of the act, exempts from culpability and punishment. If that be a true principle in relation to crimes that strike at the peace and welfare of society, and which crimes are supposed, and in fact do generally, import a high degree of moral turpitude, how much more forcibly ought such a principle to be applicable to this proposed amendment to the Constitution. We know, as a matter of public history, that in some of the confederate States there was a universal conscription of every man who could carry a gun. In one of those States, at least, it swept through all classes, from boys of sixteen to men of sixty years of age. These men were not allowed to choose whether or not they would enter into the camp and into the army of the rebellion. The whole country was hunted over to find every man who was capable of bearing arms, and, without regard to his own judgment or his own disposition to enter into the rebellion or to keep out of it, he was forced by a resistless power to become a conscript in the rebel army. There were feeble old men and immature boys who were in great numbers thus forced into the army of the confederate States. Is there anything of justice, much less of policy and statesmanship, that requires that all those soldiers of the rebel army should be inexorably punished? Notwithstanding the position assumed by the Senator from Illinois, that a disqualification for office is no punishment, I maintain that it is a punishment, and a grievous punishment, and such as a great and generous nation, or the representatives of a great and magnanimous people ought not to impose upon such a number of persons. I suppose that if the honorable Senator from Illinois himself was to come in a class, in the form of an amendment to the Constitution, that would exclude him during his life-time from office, he would regard it as some punishment. It is punishment, and punishment of the most grievous and dishonoring character, for a man to be excluded from taking part in the Government of his country by filling such an office as those authorized to fill them might call him to the discharge of the duties of.

But, Mr. President, there is another idea connected with this subject that has been forced on my mind. We know from the public prints and the history of the rebellion that late in the war about one third of the armies of the rebels deserted and abandoned their camps and their banner. That was an enormous desertion, and it could only have resulted from the fact that the greater proportion of them were forced into the service and were required to fight for a cause against which they were opposed in principle and sentiment and if left to their own free will would never have entered. This proscriptive amendment is to operate inexorably upon those who will go into the confederate service as well as those who were involuntarily, and by a force which was resistless by them, compelled to go into it. It embraces and proscribes during their lifetime those who were involuntarily forced into the service and who abandoned it and deserted it on the first opportunity, as well as those who went into it with a free and deliberate will, and continued in it to the end. In the language of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, what will a civilized world think of the justice and humanity, much less of the policy, of such a proscription as this? If the object of its friends was to prevent perpetual reunion and a return by the rebel States to loyalty and to true fealty to this Government, it seems to me this would be one of the most effective measures that they could devise to produce such a state of things.

I rose, Mr. President, not to enter into this debate, which I expect to do at a later period of it, but simply to urge this single consideration in support of the humane and just and statesmanlike proposition that the honorable Senator from Wisconsin has offered as an amendment to this section of the proposed amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. President, it is a matter of indifference to me whether the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin be adopted or not. My impression is that if it should be incorporated into the proposed constitutional amendment it will emasculate it pretty effectually, and that the practical result will be that you will find in the end very few individuals who ever entered into the rebellion voluntarily. A few of the more prominent, of course, could not escape; but it would be almost impossible to prove in the southern States, where there would be a general disposition to evade the fact, that any person who has not been very prominently engaged in the rebellion had ever entered into it voluntarily. Indeed, if I understand the argument or affidavit of Mr. Stephens, made before the committee of fifteen, I take it that his plea is that he never entered into the rebellion voluntarily.

But, sir, I did not rise so much to say anything upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin as to reply to the argument of the Senator from Kentucky, which is but a reiteration of the argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] the other day, and of the repeated arguments of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] that this amendment is vindictive in its character; that it is ex post facto in its nature; that it is designed as a punishment for the crime of treason. I utterly deny that such is the philosophy of the amendment, or that such can be said properly to be the intention of the amendment. It may, in its results, operate as a punishment, as an odium, as a disgrace upon the parties to whom it shall apply; but, sir, what is the purpose of this amendment? I will state what I understand to be its purpose. It is not to punish the men who engaged in the rebellion for the crime which they have committed; the law in that respect is ample now; but, not being penal in its character, it is precautionary. It looks not to the past, but it has reference, as I understand it, wholly to the future. It is a measure of self-defense. It is designed to prevent a repetition of treason by these men, and being a permanent provision of the Constitution, it is intended to operate as a preventive of treason hereafter by holding out to the people of the United States that such will be the penalty of the offense if they dare to commit it. It is therefore not a measure of punishment, but a measure of self-defense; and the honorable Senator from Wisconsin was, in point of fact, driven to that conclusion at last by the interrogatory propounded to him by his colleague; and then he asked, in consideration of the amnesty proclaimed by Mr. Johnson and of the legislation of Congress on that subject, would it be just, would it be right to incorporate such a provision as this in the Constitution of the United States, excluding these men hereafter forever from holding office?

Now, sir, is it right? The duty of the Government and the citizen is reciprocal; the obligation is mutual. The Government owes to its citizen protection; the citizen owes to the Government obedience and support; and I demand to know of the Senator from Wisconsin, or any other Senator, whether there is in the annals of history the case of a Government so benign as has been that of the United States, and where the obligation on the part of the Government has been so perfectly performed and so adequately extended? Do Senators pretend to say that the men disqualified by the proposed amendment rebelled because they had any just cause to rebel, any just cause of complaint on the part of the Government; that it had failed to afford them the protection that was due from the Government to them? Do Senators pretend to say that there was the shadow of a pretext to justify these men in going into the rebellion?

Then, sir, if they cannot answer these interrogatories in the affirmative, as I know they cannot, and will not dare to do so, how does the case stand? Here was the Federal Government extending to these men ample protection. What did they do? Yield to the Government the support that was due from them to the Government? No, sir; not only did they withhold support from the Government, but they drew the sword to destroy it. And now, sir, the proposition is, shall these men, who have thus forfeited their allegiance and shown how unfaithful they could be to the most benign Government in the world, be allowed again to become the depositaries of the political power of the United States, the custodians and executors of our laws and liberties? Would there be any justice or any propriety in allowing men to be again introduced into the Government who have, under such circumstances as these, shown themselves to be so faithless to their trust? That is the question; and looking to the future peace and security of this country, I ask whether it would be just or right to allow men who have thus proven themselves faithless to be again intrusted with the political power of the State. I think not; and upon that ground I think this exclusion is wise, is just, is charitable, and is Christian, and that we would be faithless to our trust if we allowed the interests of the country and its future peace and welfare to be again disturbed by men who have shown themselves thus faithless in the past. And, sir, it does seem to me that there is a degree of presumption in men who have hardly yet washed their hands of the blood of our fellow-citizens that they have shed in their insane efforts to destroy this Government, coming here and clamoring at the door of Congress again for the very political power which they have hitherto used for the destruction of this Government.

You may say they will do us no harm by being again allowed to hold office. How was it in the origin of our troubles? How was it when these men were in office before the rebellion commenced? How did they use the power that was intrusted to them? I answer, by sending our vessels away from our shores; by transferring our arms from the North to the South; and by depleting the Treasury of the United States by preconcerted arrangements, so that when the rebellion should be precipitated upon the country the power of the Federal Government would be crippled and to a great extent destroyed. Shall we again trust men of this character, who, while acting under the obligation of the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, thus betrayed their country and betrayed their trust?

I hope, sir, that we shall hear no more outcry about the injustice, the inhumanity, and the want of Christian spirit in thus incorporating into our Constitution precautionary measures that will forever prohibit these unfaithful men from again having any part in the Government. They have no moral right to it; they have forfeited it by their past conduct. If, hereafter, they shall show works meet for repentance, and that they are to be relied upon, this provision contains within it the means by which the disability may be removed, and they may be again allowed to participate in the political administration of the Government.

Mr. DAVIS. I will say a word in notice of the remarks of the honorable Senator from West Virginia. He and myself and the honorable Senator who now occupies the chair [Mr. HARRIS] are lawyers. We have read of the atrocious penal code of England, and the number of crimes that are punishable there by death and by transportation. We have read also of some of the benignant principles of law that characterize the administration of the penal code of England; and among those principles is this: it is better, says the law, that ninety-nine guilty men shall escape punishment than that one innocent man shall be punished. But the honorable Senator, in the benignity of his nature, reverses the humane spirit of that maxim of the law, and lest some men, under the pretext of having been involuntarily forced into the military service of the rebellion, should escape, he is anxious to have them all punished, guilty and innocent. That is about the spirit of his remarks. In the administration of this penal code of England, as it has been transferred to the United States and to all the States of America, what is the instruction rendered, I suppose by yourself, sir, if you ever presided in a criminal court, and certainly by every judge in America who has presided in a criminal court?

"If, upon a review of the whole case, you have reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused, it is your duty to give the accused the benefit of that doubt, and to acquit."

Mr. WILLEY. The honorable Senator will allow me to say that he totally misinterprets my remarks. The point of my remarks was to show that the guilt or innocence of the party was not the matter at issue; that we were not trying them for their crimes, but we were providing security for the future peace of the country.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator is an American citizen; he is a patriot; he is a Senator; and in addition to that he is a professor of the Christian religion, a follower of the lowly and humble Redeemer, whose death was given to expiate the sins of a fallen and a wicked world. What is the spirit that is taught to him by his Great Teacher? You say forgive your enemies; you say turn your other cheek to the man who smites you. You are taught benevolence and philanthropy and forgiveness by the precepts of the religion which the honorable Senator professes, and of which, I have no doubt, he is a very exemplary member; but it seems to me that he forgot all the spirit of his Christian charity and faith in the tenor of the remarks which he made.

The honorable Senator stated another principle to which I fully subscribe. It was this: that the duty of protection by the Government and the duty of obedience to the Government are mutual. It is the duty of the citizen to obey the law; and it is the duty of the Government to protect the citizen and to enable him to perform his obligation to obey the law. Now, sir, what has been the condition and what was the condition of things at the commencement of this rebellion? In the State of Tennessee there were two issues before the people submitted to the aggregate vote of the State. The one was whether the State would call a convention even to consider the subject of secession, and the other was whether the State would secede. On the first issue there were nearly fifteen thousand votes of a majority of the people of the State of Tennessee see against the calling of a convention; and upon the question of secession there was a majority of upward of fifty-six thousand votes in that State against it. How was it in the State of Virginia, the Senator's own State? There was a large majority of the people of Virginia against secession, and that majority was demonstrated by an actual vote at the polls of the people. Now, apply the principle of the honorable Senator. Here was a majority of fifty-six thousand people in the State of Tennessee, and a majority of from twelve to fifteen thousand loyal people in his own State. They expressed opposition to secession at the polls. What was the duty and the obligation of the Government, according to the honorable Senator's own maxim and according to the universal maxim of justice and humanity as between governors and governed? These people were anxious to adhere to the Union, to perform their duties loyally as citizens. They expressed that disposition and purpose in the most solemn manner, and in the State of Tennessee by an overwhelming vote. According to the honorable Senator's maxim—a principle to which I yield my hearty assent, and to which no just and humane man can offer a dissent—the Government of the United States ought to have upheld, supported, and protected this fifty-six thousand majority in the State of Tennessee in their wish and purpose to adhere to the Union; and so of the Senator's own State. Did the Government of the Union perform its obligation to the people?

The Senator asks triumphantly, was there ever a Government in the world, since the commencement of time, that so perfectly and fully discharged all its obligations to these people who went into the rebellion? Sir, I say that at that great crisis, at the time when the question of loyalty and disloyalty was to be effectively and finally decided, the Government was in flagrant default. It was not in the act of protecting the majorities in those States and the people in the other southern States who were opposed to secession in their position of fidelity to the Government. None of the honorable Senator's zeal, none of his eloquence, none of his vehemence of declamation against these rebels can shake the truth of that position. The true and loyal men who constituted large majorities in many of the southern States were abandoned, or, if they were not abandoned, they were left wholly without defense and protection by the Government that he wants now to oppress them. Sir, I tell the honorable Senator, and it is the truth of the case, that before the Government of the United States can hold these men rigorously to the charge of treason, to the consequences of treason and rebellion, to its forfeitures, its punishments, and disabilities, he and those who favor such a policy ought to be prepared to demonstrate beyond question that the Government performed its duty fully and effectively toward these people. That cannot be done. It was not the fact.

Then I assume, upon the gentleman's own principle and the fair deductions from it, that every man who was willing to remain faithful to the Government of the United States, provided he had received such protection and support from the Government as would have enabled him to maintain that position, ought to come under the benefit of the reservation, the exception of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin. If there is any doubt in discriminating the guilty from the innocent, those who ought to receive the immunity from those who ought not to receive it, I, to save the innocent, would give it indefinitely to all, just as the benignant principle of the common law of England declares that if there is a doubt, the accused shall receive the benefit of the doubt, and that it is better for ninety-nine guilty men to escape than that one innocent man should be punished.

But, Mr. President, I do not intend at this time to enter into a discussion on this subject. I shall avail myself of the right which the honorable Senator from Wisconsin said he would.

At a future time, in the progress of this debate, it is my purpose to enter into it, and to enter into it with more fullness and detail of principle and of fact than I have attempted upon the present occasion.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is not my intention now to enter into the discussion of the details of this proposition. I intend to do so before the debate closes. The immediate question before the Senate, as I understand, is to insert after the words "shall have," in the thirty-seventh line of this third section, the word "voluntarily;" so that it will read:

That no person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the Government of the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have voluntarily engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, &c.

The proposition is to insert the word "voluntarily." It is objected to, I understand. Upon what ground? I should like some gentleman to answer the question, upon what ground do Senators object to the insertion of the word "voluntarily?" If am compelled to do a thing against my will, if I cannot avoid it, shall my involuntary service be imputed to me as a crime? Sir, has not the spirit of vengeance gone far enough? Are you not satisfied with visiting punishments upon voluntary acts, but will you also visit them upon involuntary and unwilling acts? I read in the newspapers that we live in the nineteenth century, the Christian age, illuminated from the great East; that we receive our instructions in religion, morals, trade, and everything else from New England; and yet one of these modern doctrines and modern teachings is this, that involuntary acts are to be punished! That is the direct proposition before the American Senate; and when an amendment is seriously offered providing that men who have been constrained by force to enter into what you call the "rebel" service, shall be exempted from criminality, a star arises in the East, though it may not be over the plains of Bethlehem, and though it may not be heralded by the angelic voices which sang "peace on earth, and good-will to men," proclaiming, "Though you may have been constrained and forced to enter that service, yet you shall be punished." That is the enlightenment of the nineteenth century! That is Christian sentiment as expounded by New England!

Mr. President, I am surprised at my friend from West Virginia. No man has a greater respect for him personally, and for his character as a Christian gentleman, than myself. I have heard him upon the platform inculcating the precepts of the Christian religion. I profess, myself, nothing of the kind. I only wish I possessed it. But he advocates, as I understand, not only that a voluntary criminal act shall be punished, but that an act done involuntarily, against the will—that is the meaning of it—by compulsion and per force, shall be visited criminally.

Mr. WILLEY. No, sir; the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Explain the word "voluntarily;" then, which is the word it is proposed to insert.

Mr. WILLEY. Does the Senator ask me to explain it, or will he allow me to explain it?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. WILLEY. I wish to state, Mr. President, most distinctly, that I exclude the idea of punishment utterly from this amendment. It is not the philosophy of the amendment; it is not the principle upon which it is founded. I am not discussing the matter whether it is criminal or not. I only say that this is a precautionary, not a penal measure, looking to the future, not to the past; but that in looking to the future, and in providing for it, it is very right and proper to look to the past, to see whether we may trust men in the future who have been faithless in the past.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Before I proceed to reply to the remarks of the honorable Senator I will state that I was surprised yesterday to hear the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee say, in the discussion of this question, that this section was not one which indicted pains and penalties. He said that no case could be found, that no authority could be cited for that position. I did not interrupt him at the time, but I will say now, before I proceed to reply to the honorable Senator from West Virginia, that if the honorable Senator from Illinois, who is chairman of the Judiciary Committee, had looked into the case ex parte Dorsey, reported in 7 Peters's Alabama Reports, he would have found the whole doctrine explained. It was a case into which I had occasion to look many years ago. He there would have seen this whole doctrine of what pains and penalties are in a legislative act, or in a constitutional prohibition.

Without arguing that question I come back to my friend from West Virginia. He has not answered what I said. He only says that he means something in the future; he does not mean anything that has transpired. Now, sir, what does this provision mean? Does it not mean, is it not intended to apply, to that which has transpired? Are you going, and is that the object of your legislation, to provide for some contingency in the future? Is it not apparent to everybody, does not everybody know that this is not a measure to have an operation in futuro, but it is a measure to have an operation in presenti, to apply to existing cases?

Then, sir, I return to my original suggestion, and I call upon my honorable friend from West Virginia, or anybody else, to assign a reason why it is that when a man is compelled to do an act, when he has no freedom of choice, he shall be punished for doing it. The proposed amendment only exempts from the consequences of this section those who have involuntarily done these acts. And yet, sir, we here in the year 1866, which has been illuminated by the fulminations which have come up from New England and the northern pulpits, the enlightenment which has been spread all over this continent, that an involuntary act, an act done against the will, contrary to the choice of the individual, is to be visited with highly penal consequences. That is your Christianity; that is your morality; that is your civilization; and on the floor of the Senate of the United States gentlemen who are known in the Christian world as rostrum monitors in behalf of what are called Christian principles, are found advocating such a doctrine. I say these things in no disrespect to the honorable Senator from West Virginia. He knows that. But, sir, the spirit, the animus of the proposition, is only the spirit, the animus that characterizes the entire legislation of Congress at the present time.

Six years ago we were a happy, united people. No people on the face of the earth in so short a time had ever so rapidly increased in numbers and grown in power. From thirteen feeble colonies we had grown to be thirty-odd great States. Our flag floated from ocean to ocean and from Lake to Gulf. Upon every mountain-top that flag was planted, and in every valley anthems of praise to this glorious Union were sung. The burdens of Government were unfelt by the humblest and by the highest citizen. We were at peace among ourselves and at peace with all the world. In those days there were some exceptions. In certain quarters of the country the Sabbath was desecrated and the pulpit dishonored by talking of grievances which nobody experienced. A remedy was sought, and the great Republican party was brought into existence to remedy those evils. It came into existence. From 1787 till 1860 we had advanced as no nation, as the history of the world will show, ever did advance. We were happy, prosperous, and free. The party to which my honorable friend from West Virginia now attaches himself, and to which in former years I believe he did not belong, was to remove some imagined evils. It came forward and triumphed, and what have been the fruits of its triumph? A dissevered Union; a war lasting for four long years; a public debt of $4,000,000,000; every household draped in mourning; and every eye bathed in tears. That is the consolation that they have brought to us; that is the remedy they have afforded us. And yet, sir, in the pride of power and in the audacity of supposed superiority, they turn upon us, who have faithfully and consistently stood by the Union of these States, and we hear, hissing from their voice, as the words issued from the mouth of the serpent that uncoiled itself among the flowers of Eden, "copperhead," "rebel sympathizer."

Mr. President, I have said more than I intended to say; but before this constitutional amendment is finally disposed of I propose to discuss certain questions here. I know what will be said about it in certain presses of the country. I never read one of them under any circumstances, and do not care what they say; but I know they will apply these epithets to me. But, sir, before this joint resolution is finally disposed of I propose to discuss certain questions. I will state the questions that I propose to discuss, and gentlemen who take exception to them may as well look up their authorities. I say that whenever a government de facto is established, although there may be a government de jure, every person yielding obedience to the government de facto is excused, not to be punished for it; he is no traitor, and he is not liable to be hanged nor quartered. That is one question. I propose to discuss another question, without stating my opinion now with reference to it: whether any man in what was called the confederate States who acted under the authority and by compulsion of that government, can be visited with punishment. My opinion of it may be inferred from the statement of the proposition; and let me say to my friends on the other side that if they propose to combat these principles, they had better be prepared with the authorities. The principle I have just mentioned is not only founded in law, but it is founded in the teachings of the fathers.

Why, sir, you are drawing a great bill of indictment in this proposition against a whole community, indicting them all as criminals, rebels, and traitors. The thing is abhorrent to the instincts of humanity. What, sir, indict a whole community, simply because there is an imaginary line between them, as guilty of treason; that they are all traitors, all criminals. The thing is impossible. How would you feel, sir, how should I feel, if a gentleman south of the Potomac, that we believed to be a gentleman, should come and extend to us his hand? Would we not take it? If we took it would we not take it as a gentleman? If we believed that he was a traitor, that the crime of treason was upon his soul, the greatest crime known to the law, would we take his hand? Would you, sir? No, you would spurn it, and so would every honest man.

I know that the sentiments that I entertain and the opinions I avow are unpopular; but what do I care about that? The office of a man intrusted with public position is as much to make public opinion as to be governed by it. If he discharges his office correctly and honestly, though for the moment the discharge of that duty may be unpopular, it will not be long before the public voice will say that he is right. The great difficulty in this whole case has been that there has been a clamor in one section of the country against a subdued and fallen foe, and it is popular to cry out for blood and vengeance, and legislation is being shaped in conformity to that demand of an excited public opinion. I choose to say, for one, I heed not the clamor. Let it come with the whirlwind's power; let it come in the tornado's blast; let it come in the earthquake's shock; I stand unmoved amid the clamor for blood and vengeance. I heed it not. I will not listen to it. It is the voice of error; and it will not be long before the American people, North and South, will awaken and listen to the voice of reason. This cry for blood and vengeance cannot last forever. The eternal God, who sits above, whose essence is love, and whose chief attribute is mercy, says to all His creatures, whether in the open daylight or in the silent hours of the night, "Be charitable; be merciful."

But, sir, let me make another remark in reference to this matter. It will be misinterpreted, I know. My motives will be misinterpreted. My position will be misinterpreted. No man will misinterpret it to my face. It is this: recollect that south of the Potomac upon which your amendment is to operate there is a country extensive enough for more even than one empire. It is inhabited by millions of people. They are men who have honestly engaged in resisting your authority, as you have honestly maintained your authority. By the force of arms you have overcome them. They have yielded to that power against which they could not contend. But, sir, there are hundreds and thousands and millions of women and children there who have had nothing to do in what you say was an unlawful resistance to your authority. You tax all those people. You do not allow them a voice upon this floor. They are unheard. They cannot say a word. They have no representation here. If the eternal God was to send an archangel from heaven to plead their cause I do not believe he would be heard in legislative halls. I say that with no disrespect to the Senate. I am only speaking with reference to the spirit of the times. Your legislation affects that great class of people. Taxation without representation is abhorrent to every American mind. The denial of representation caused your fathers in revolutionary times, feeble as they were, to appeal to the God of battles for the arbitrament of the contest. And yet, sir, with all their lessons before us; with the illustrious example of George Washington; with the example of the noble men who signed the Declaration of Independence, pledging their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor to maintain their declaration that taxation without representation was a principle to which no freeman could submit, you exclude from your halls of legislation eleven of the States of this Union, twenty-two Senators from this Chamber; and in their absence you propose to pass and to submit to them a constitutional amendment.

Mr. President, if they are not fit to be represented here, are they in any sense fit to have such a proposition submitted to them? They are either in the Union or out of the Union. If they are in the Union, the Constitution says that every State shall be represented by two Senators upon this floor. They have elected their Senators; they have presented themselves here; but you say they shall not be admitted; and yet in the face of your own act, and in violent inconsistency with your own act, you propose to submit to them a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States. I ask you, sir, if they are not in a condition to be represented upon this floor, are they in a condition to have a proposition of this kind submitted to them?

The only proposition that I have seen in Congress—I will not refer to the proceedings of the other House—which is consistent with congressional action is the proposition of a gentleman from Pennsylvania, from the city of Lancaster, by the name of THADDEUS STREYENS. He treats them as out of the Union, having no part or parcel in it, and he proposes to govern them as districts and sections of country subject to the authority of the United States, but not being part or parcel of it. While I think that proposition is perfectly untenable, yet viewing your legislation in the light in which I conceive it, I say he has interpreted the whole theory of the system. I have no respect for him as a legislator, and do not know him as a man.

Now, sir, is it possible that there are three men on the floor of this Senate who honestly believe that the people down South are all traitors? The law says that treason is the highest crime that can be committed; but, sir, the instincts of your nature, acting responsively to the teachings of the law, tell you that those who have acted in obedience to a de facto government are not guilty of treason, and though it may be improper, though it may be imprudent—and I have been sometimes told by my friends that I do not always weigh my words—I now avow on the floor of the American Senate that you may arraign before a just court and an impartial jury as many of these southern gentlemen as you please who, after their States had seceded, yielded obedience to the government de facto over them, and you never can convict them of having committed any crime. For twenty years I have studied the law, and I have studied it that length of time with but little effect if I am not certain in the conclusion to which I have arrived. At the same time I may say, to prevent misrepresentation, and it is well known that while I have been opposed to the acts of the past Administration, and to many of the present, I never sympathized with the movement of these southern gentlemen.

The time has gone by to apply to the Democratic party or myself the epithet of "sympathizer with the rebellion." I state my opinions as I honestly entertain them; and when legal questions are presented, and not only legal questions but questions underlying the very science of government itself, which have been discussed by such great luminaries as Burke in the British Parliament, and by all the able writers upon international and municipal law, I may avow a concurrence in their opinion without subjecting myself to remarks prejudicial, not to my loyalty—a word that I do not know the use of in a republican form of government—but prejudicial to my devotion to the Constitution and the Government of the country under which I was born and hope to die. I seek controversy with no man; I avoid none.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks that the question, when taken upon the amendment to the amendment, may be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to make a single observation.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the honorable member proposes to debate the question at any length I hope he will give way to a motion to adjourn.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not propose to debate it at any length.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We ought to have a short executive session.

Mr. HOWARD. I shall be through in a moment, and then I shall be entirely willing to take the vote on this amendment. Indeed, I will not say a word if there be a possibility of taking a vote now on the amendments offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. FESSENDEN, and others. Let us vote on them now.

Mr. HOWARD. If no other gentleman wishes to address the Senate upon those two amendments, and the Senate is ready to take a vote upon them, I shall not occupy any time of the Senate by remarks.

Several SENATORS. Let us vote.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on the proposed amendment to the amendment?

Mr. HOWARD. Are both the amendments offered by the Senator from Wisconsin included in the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But one question can be taken at a time.

Mr. JOHNSON. The question now is on the amendment proposing to insert the word "voluntarily," as I understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the question.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 10, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, Norton, Riddle, and Saulsbury—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Dixon, Grimes, McDougall, Nesmith, Sherman, Van Winkle, Wright, and Yates—9.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I now move the other amendment of which I gave notice, to insert after the word "thereof," in the thirty-ninth line the words "excepting those who have duly received pardon and amnesty under the Constitution and laws, and will take such oath as shall be required by law," and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin, what is the meaning of the last clause of his amendment? Does it contemplate the enactment of a law in the future prescribing some new oath, or does it refer to the oath which has been already taken in pursuance of the proclamation of the President?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Perhaps that provision of the amendment is not necessary to the idea, and I will omit that portion of it and let it stand simply as a test of the question whether those who have received pardon and amnesty shall be excepted from the effect of this amendment or not.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think that is in better shape.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should like to hear it read as modified.

The SECRETARY. The words proposed to be inserted are, "excepting those who have duly received pardon and amnesty under the Constitution and laws."

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I understand that will dispense with the taking of the test oath. Is that the Senator's intention?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The words requiring the taking of the test oath are stricken out.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The test oath is still the law of the land. This has no effect on that law.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. This would override that if we adopt it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Not at all. This simply excepts from the provision of the section those who have received pardon and amnesty. I maintain that where we have granted under the Constitution and laws pardon and amnesty we have no right, though we have the power, to put them under the disability again.

Mr. HOWARD. One word. I desire to ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether the pardon and amnesty of which he speaks extend so far as to remove the disability created by the confiscation act of 1862 against the holding of office under the United States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to ask my friend from Michigan whether that would make any particle of difference. We all know that this proposition has no chance of succeeding in any shape.

Mr. HOWARD. Not the slightest; but the Senator from Wisconsin seems to make a point on that question.

Mr. FESSENDEN and others. Let us vote.

Mr. WILLEY. I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Wisconsin. Suppose there are pardons, as there are likely to be a good many, between the time this amendment shall be propounded by Congress and the time it may be adopted by the Legislatures; what will be its application to pardons granted between this time and that?

Mr. JOHNSON. It would apply.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should like to hear the amendment read as it was first offered.

The Secretary read the amendment as originally offered by Mr. DOOLITTLE.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the honorable member from Wisconsin propose to exclude all those who may after the adoption of the constitutional amendment receive pardon? That it seems to me would be the effect as it now stands. I move, therefore, to amend it by inserting the words "or shall receive."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin is not amendable. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 10, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, Norton, Riddle, and Saulsbury—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Dixon, McDougall, Nesmith, Sherman, Wright, and Yates—7.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurring upon the amendment of Mr. HOWARD, the yeas and nays were taken, with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, Norton, Riddle, and Saulsbury—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Dixon, McDougall, Nesmith, Sherman, Wright, and Yates—7.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose it is not intended to go further with this subject this evening. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 31, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BORTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

INTER-STATE COMMUNICATION.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, bill of the House No. 11, to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communication among the several States, with the amendments of the Senate thereto, was taken from the Speaker's table.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

First amendment:

In the fourth line of the first section strike out the word "connections."

Second amendment:

At the end of the second section add as follows: Nor shall it be construed to authorize any railroad company to build any new road or connection with any other road without authority from the State in which said railroad or connection may be proposed.

Third amendment:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. LE BLOND. Before the vote is taken upon these amendments of the Senate, I would like to inquire how they affect the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The only amendments by the Senate are in the nature of limitations upon the terms of the House bill as it went to the Senate.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 167) to incorporate the Women's Hospital Association of the District of Columbia; and

An act (S. No. 184) to define more clearly the jurisdiction and powers of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House papers in the contested-election case of Koontz vs. Coffroth; which were referred to the Committee of Elections, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DAWES asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, for one week.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia, asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence for Mr. LATHAM.

Mr. JULIAN asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. STILWELL for two weeks.

Mr. ANCONA asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. STROUSE for one week from to-morrow.

The SPEAKER asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. HULBURD for two weeks, and Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, for one week.

CLEVELAND AND MAHONING RAILROAD.

Mr. GARFIELD demanded the regular order of business.

The House accordingly resumed the consideration of House bill No. 537, to authorize the Cleveland and Mahoning Railroad Company, a corporation created and existing under the laws of the States of Ohio and Pennsylvania, to continue and construct the railroad of said company from the village of Youngstown, Mahoning county, in said State of Ohio, to and into the said State of Pennsylvania, and thence by the most advantageous and practicable route to the city of Pittsburgh in said State of Pennsylvania, and to establish said road as a military, postal, and commercial railroad of the United States.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend this bill by adding the following:

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall willfully do, or cause to be done, any act or acts whatever whereby any building, structure, or other work, or any engine, car, or machine, or other property appertaining to the railroad so to be constructed shall be injured, impaired, destroyed, or stopped, the person or persons so offending shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof by any court of competent jurisdiction, shall be punished by fine not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment not less than one year nor more than five years, or both, at the discretion of the court, and shall also forfeit and pay to the parties aforesaid, their associates, successors, or assigns, double the amount of damages sustained by means of such offenses, to be recovered by the parties aforesaid, with costs of suit, by action of debt or case.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That if any suit or proceeding, either in law or equity, or any criminal prosecution, shall be commenced in any State court against the said Cleveland and Mahoning Company, its successors or assigns, or any person authorized or employed by said company, for any act done or omitted to be done in and about the construction and use of the railroad hereby authorized under and by virtue of this act, or to restrain, by injunction or otherwise, the construction, completion, or operation of the said railroad, or for any damages growing out of the use of the same, or construction thereof, and the defendant shall, at the time of entering his appearance, or within thirty days thereafter, in such cases in said action or proceeding, file a petition, stating the facts and verified by affidavits, for the removal of the cause for the trial at the next circuit court of the United States to be holden in the district where such suit or prosecution is pending, and offer good and sufficient security for his filing in such circuit court, on the first day of its next session, copies of the process and other proceedings against him in such State court, and also for his appearing in such circuit court, and entering special bail in the cause of proceeding, (if special bail was originally required therein,) it then shall be the duty of the State court to accept the security, and proceed no further in the cause or prosecution; and the bail that shall have been originally taken in such State court shall be discharged. And upon such copies being filed as aforesaid, in such circuit court of the United States, the cause or prosecution shall proceed therein in the same manner as if it had been brought in such circuit court, whatever may be the amount in dispute or the damage claimed, or whatever may be the citizenship of the parties, any law to the contrary notwithstanding. And any attachment of the goods or the estate of the defendant by original process from such State court shall hold the goods and estate so attached to answer the final judgment, in the same manner as by the laws of such State they would have been holden to answer final judgment had it been rendered in the court in which the suit or prosecution was commenced; and from any final judgment rendered in any such suit or prosecution by such circuit courts, a writ of error shall lie to the Supreme Court of the United States, whatever may be the amount of such judgment, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. LE BLOND. I do not propose to debate the amendments which have been offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to this bill in detail. The bill embraces many novel features in congressional legislation. But I wish to make this suggestion to my colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that inasmuch as there are many important features embraced in this bill which in my judgment affect directly the rights of the States, I hope he will allow this bill to go to the Committee of the Whole, in order that it may be fully discussed and argued before final action is taken on it. I hope that the gentleman will do that.

There is another bill of a similar character, embracing the precise features of this bill, and in every essential feature it strikes down the right of domain in every State in this Union. I do not propose to stand here as the advocate of the rights of the State of Pennsylvania, or the right of the State of Maryland, nor do I propose to set myself up as the special advocate of my own State; but, sir, this bill involves principles which must affect every State in this Union. I do not believe that the time has yet arrived when this Congress is willing to declare that it possesses sovereign rights over every State in every particular of which the States have heretofore exercised exclusive control.

Why, sir, my colleague told us yesterday that the bill now under consideration confers no corporate powers upon this corporation.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not say that. I said it conferred no powers beyond those already embraced in the charter of the company.

Mr. LE BLOND. No corporate powers except in one particular, was his statement. Very well, sir; it being conceded that it does confer corporate rights in one particular, then, I ask, if Congress possesses the right to confer corporate powers in one particular, has it not the right to confer such powers in two particulars? And if it can confer corporate powers in two particulars, has it not the right to grant every essential power necessary to create an immense corporation, extending its vast power throughout the length and breadth of this Government? The bill confers the power to appropriate private property for the use of the company. It also confers power upon the company to compel the claimant of property taken who refuses to accept the amount tendered by the company in full satisfaction for his land taken by said company to seek redress in the Federal courts at a cost that denies justice.

It does confer additional corporate powers beyond what is granted in the charter under which they were organized. In point of fact it creates the corporation. It takes it in its powerless condition, as admitted by my colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and gives it vitality to act, which is, in point of fact, creating it.

This bill strikes down the rights of the States. It is the entering wedge for the establishment of a principle that will enable its advocates to establish a centralized Government. I admonish members that, before giving their support to any of these propositions emanating from this committee which has transcended the powers conferred upon it in its creation, they should ponder well the results or they may assist in establishing a principle that will totally destroy the rights of every State of this Union. This committee was created a select committee on a military and postal railroad from Washington to New York, but are enlarging their powers and are trying to help out every road that has met with difficulty in their enterprise.

If all that is claimed by my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] relative to the intervention of the State authorities of Pennsylvania be true, still they have their legal rights and can enforce them in the courts. They can carry on their road to completion without coming here for relief.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. LE BLOND. If the gentleman will allow me a few moments longer—

Mr. GARFIELD. I have promised a portion of my time to several other gentlemen; and my colleague will please be as brief as possible.

Mr. LE BLOND. I will.

Now, Mr. Speaker, where does the gentleman find any warrant for the exercise by Congress of the power to legislate in the manner provided for in this bill? He says that this road is to be used by the Government for postal and military purposes. It would seem as if he acknowledged that none of the ordinary powers of Congress are sufficient to warrant the enactment of such a law as this; and hence, availing himself of the extensive use of the military power within the last five years, he throws into each one of these bills a provision reserving to the Government of the United States the power to use these roads for military and postal purposes as a justification for what he proposes to do.

That reservation cannot confer the power. Our postal facilities are ample without it, and the power to establish post roads does not confer power to create railroad corporations with power to appropriate private property for their use and to override the State courts. Neither does the power to establish military roads confer this power. The war being over the necessity of military roads is over.

Why, sir, never in the history of the Government until the present period was it imagined that the Congress of the United States had the power to establish railroads and wagon roads for military purposes, except when, in time of war, necessity requires that such roads should be built. In time of peace this power has never been exercised. It is a power granted simply for the purpose of enabling the Government to build military roads in time of war, when the States decline or neglect to exercise their power in this respect. But now, sir, it is proposed that this power shall be exercised in time of peace, for the purpose of benefiting private corporations.

It is claimed by the advocates of this bill that the construction of this road is necessary to meet the wants of the public. Sir, I would ask the gentleman whether every road that is built throughout the length and breadth of the land is not a public necessity. But because a railroad is a public necessity does that confer upon Congress the constitutional power to establish it as a military road and override the right of the States to determine such matters for themselves?

It is urged, as a further reason why we should exercise this extraordinary power, that the State of Pennsylvania is averse to the establishment of these different roads. Suppose this be true; does the fact that Pennsylvania objects to the establishment of railroads in her State confer upon Congress the power to establish such roads? Sir, such power does not exist in this Congress, and whatever may be the policy of the State of Pennsylvania it cannot confer the power. If it be exercised in this case, we shall establish a principle which will authorize Congress to regulate all the internal concerns of the various States of the Union. This principle, carried to its logical consequences, would authorize Congress to control marriages, to control the appointment of guardians, administrators, &c., to regulate, in a word, all the local affairs of the respective States. For one, I protest against this system of usurping the power of the States, and I ask members to consider well the effect of these two bills before they assist in establishing a principle so broad and dangerous in its character.

My colleague having indulged me in my remarks thus far, I will not trespass further upon his courtesy.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to raise any question as to the constitutional right of Congress to authorize companies to construct railroads. Without having carefully examined the subject, I am inclined to believe that we have this power; but I am opposed to this method of exercising it. The gentleman proposes to exercise that power in the same way that he complains Pennsylvania and other States have exercised it—to authorize particular persons or a particular company by a mere power of vote. I believe that is his word as reported in the Globe; by the mere power of vote to authorize the favorites of Congress to construct a road in particular places. Now, the gentleman complains of Pennsylvania for doing that very thing, and yet he asks us to do it here. If we have the power, if the committee has come to the conclusion that we have the power to control railroad franchises, let us exercise it in a way not inconsistent with the interests of the people. Let us pass a general law on the subject; do not authorize our friends to establish a particular road or a particular track, but authorize the American people to establish roads wherever they may see fit, where ever they think it will pay, or the public interest may require them.

The gentleman says Pennsylvania would not give the privilege. Is not that some evidence it ought not to be granted? The gentleman says his own patriotic State of Ohio would not grant the privilege. Is not that some evidence it ought not to be granted?

Mr. GARFIELD. I said no such thing. I referred to the portion which lies in the State of Pennsylvania. The State of Ohio has granted the right to the portion in that State, and most of it has been built.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The people of my State may have been wrong in refusing this; but the fact they have refused is some evidence to me that they were right. If the gentleman wants to avoid the very difficulty, the very wrong rather, which he charges upon the State of Pennsylvania, let this committee bring in a bill which will authorize anybody to make a road anywhere.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield five minutes of time to the gentleman from Pittsburg, [Mr. MOORHEAD.]

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I was somewhat astonished at the closing remark of my colleague, that the proper way would be for this committee to bring in a bill to authorize any company to make a road anywhere. Having been a Democrat a great many years, and my friend from Lancaster [Mr. STEVENS] thinking my Democratic principles still stick to me, I have doubts about the authority of Congress. I think we have power to grant a remedy where roads running from one State to another, under charters granted by these respective States, are interfered with by either one of them from interested motives or through influences brought to bear in any particular way, to annul the grant. I think Congress has the right to step in and afford a remedy and confirm the rights to the people. That is the case here. The Pittsburg and Fort Wayne railroad passes through four different States. It has been chartered by the States of Pennsylvania, Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois. If any one of these States should interfere with that road, I think it would be proper for Congress to step in and say "Hands off! This road shall be permitted to go on." That is the case here.

Here was a charter granted by the Legislature of Ohio and a charter granted by the Legislature of Pennsylvania for the construction of these roads or this road. The Pennsylvania charter has been repealed after the Ohio portion of the road had been completed, or nearly so, and now the company very properly come to Congress, not to establish a new corporation, not to authorize a new road, but that these parties shall go on and build their road as was intended under the original charter. I feel it my duty to say that the constituency I have the honor to represent have never before been wrought up to so high a pitch of excitement as now on the subject of a free railroad law. They want the State of Pennsylvania to pass such a law. I have received the proceedings of meetings in Pittsburg and Beaver, and the people instruct their members in the Legislature to vote for a free railroad law. Why this great excitement about a free railroad law? It is because these companies chartered by different States have been interfered with. I am sorry to say that the State of Pennsylvania has interfered with them, and the people are determined there shall be a free railroad law, so that companies may run in any direction.

I think this bill is eminently proper, and I hope it will pass, as well as the one reported yesterday.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL.]

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at a remark which fell from my colleague from the Pittsburg district, [Mr. MOORHEAD.] I understood him to say that the State of Pennsylvania by her legislation had sought to interfere with the construction of railroads running into or through that State. Does the gentleman forget that Pennsylvania has given time and again the right of way to railroad companies incorporated by States adjoining her? Does he forget that she gave the New York and Erie railroad the right to run through a portion of the State even before her great line of railroad connecting Philadelphia and Pittsburg was finished, and before connecting her eastern and western borders or extending her communications with the West and Northwest?

Mr. MOORHEAD. I do not forget, either, that she has taken back that grant in violation of chartered rights.

Mr. O'NEILL. I only wanted to show the House—

Mr. UPSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'NEILL. I decline to yield. I only wanted to show the House that the policy of Pennsylvania has been liberal in the extreme to her sister States. She also permitted the New York and Erie railroad to run through her northeastern corner, in Susquehanna county long before she finished her great line from the Delaware to the Ohio, and granted the right of way to railroads of New York, or in the interests of New York, to run through the county of Erie. She has also dealt generously with the State of Maryland, having given her Northern Central road the right to run into her coal regions unimpeded. And my colleague from the Lancaster district [Mr. STEVENS] complains because the House hesitates to incorporate a charter for the Connellsville railroad, an unfinished part of which is to run from that State into ours. Did not Pennsylvania permit the State of Maryland to build her railroad along the west bank of the Susquehanna in competition and rivalry with our roads? Sir, Pennsylvania has been extremely liberal to her neighboring States, and intends to be so as long as they comply with the provisions of her enactments.

But my friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] stigmatizes as narrow and contracted this legislation of our State restricting railroads, preventing them from running through her territory. Does he not remember that the States of Ohio and Pennsylvania fought together to prevent the building of the Wheeling bridge? Does Ohio now, only because it suits her present policy, wish to convince the House that she has never endeavored to prohibit the corporations of other States from coming into competition with her own companies? The time is too recent when she wished to cherish her own railroads and to save them from the loss of trade which rivals might have carried off before her numerous lines were fully under way. I repeat it, all these privileges to which I have adverted were given by Pennsylvania to neighboring States long before she had completed her great lines of railroad.

Now, to come to the case before us. The Cleveland and Mahoning Railroad Company was chartered in the State of Ohio in 1848, with a provision that it should be organized within three years and completed within seven years from the date of its charter. The parties interested in the building of that road at that time, as I am led to believe from the provisions of a bill subsequently passed by the Ohio Legislature, did not even organize their company. Hence in three years after the charter was granted, it expired by neglect, and had to be reenacted into existence; afterward these parties came to the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and in the year 1853 obtained an act of incorporation for their company in the precise words of the Ohio charter of 1848, with the privilege of extending the road into her territory. But the Pennsylvania act contained the same provision as was in the Ohio act of incorporation which required that the railroad company should be organized within three years and completed and finished within seven, as appears by the preamble to the Pennsylvania act of 1853. Now, the State of Pennsylvania did not demand that that enactment should be repealed until fourteen years had elapsed since the original charter of the Cleveland and Mahoning road had been granted in Ohio, and not for eleven years after the passage of her own act of 1853.

Sir, there is a misapprehension in regard to this matter. The State of Pennsylvania by her constitution has the power to add to, alter, or amend her laws, provided no rights of individuals are invaded. There is such a provision in almost every charter and almost every act of the Legislature giving privileges or franchises to corporations, and it does not come with a good grace from the Representatives of a State to one of whose railroad companies powers and franchises have been given in perfect faith to proclaim here that the Legislature of Pennsylvania would do a wrong or abridge a right, while that company has never as yet, at least beyond the soil of its own State, complied with any of the terms of its charter.

Mr. Speaker, if I had time to read the act of 1864 repealing the charter of this company, in which the reasons for the repeal are set forth, it would be seen that it never commenced to build its road in the State of Pennsylvania, and I believe did not even commence, much less complete, the survey. My impression is that other projects failing, and other connections being impracticable, the road was deliberately stopped at the eastern line of the State of Ohio, and the legislation of Pennsylvania entirely disregarded and set at defiance. To show the good feeling of her Legislature, during the very same session of 1853 an act was passed to deprive of certain privileges a county which promised a subscription to the Ohio company and had failed to pay it. The noble old Commonwealth deals out even-handed justice to all, and will not let her own citizens, in the violation of law and promises, escape her condemnation.

Now, I say, for good reasons the State of Pennsylvania repealed this charter. She had a right to repeal it. She did it upon sufficient grounds, and those grounds are stated in the repealing act. The charter provided that certain things should be done which had not been done; not a mile of the road had been built and not a mile surveyed, and even now this company does not mean to build the road, as originally intended, through Lawrence county. It asks now to be allowed to get to Pittsburg by any route it chooses to adopt, so as to save sixteen miles. The State of Pennsylvania did right to revoke this charter. No one can complain of it. It was done in open day. There is the law upon her statute-book. There are the reasons for it set forth. I rise here only to defend the course of the Commonwealth in this matter and to assert that she has a right to confer franchises upon such corporations as she pleases and where she pleases. She has the sole right, and I do not think that it is within the power of Congress, on the pretense of establishing military roads, or on any other pretense, to take that right from her.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield now for a few moments to my colleague, [Mr. EGGLESTON.]

Mr. EGGLESTON. This is a question of vital importance to the western portion of this Union. Although the claims of the State of Pennsylvania and her State rights have been so ably argued by my distinguished friend from the city of Philadelphia, [Mr. O'NEILL,] yet I have failed to see the reason why we should sit here as the representatives of the people of the entire country and say that the State of Pennsylvania shall set up her puny arm and tell us of the West that our produce cannot pass through that State without paying tribute to her as she has done in former days.

Sir, if State lines are to be recognized in reference to the transit of property and persons and say that when you arrive at particular points where one State connects with another you shall not pass over it without stopping and paying tribute, as was the case a few years ago in Pennsylvania, I say it is time for this Congress to take the matter into their own hands and obliterate State lines entirely, so far as commerce is concerned, and give us free trade.

Why, sir, I remember the action of the State of Pennsylvania some eight or ten years ago, when they erected pea-nut stands at Erie and told us that we must ship our property there to accommodate a few persons. And yet we find advocates here for the State rights of Pennsylvania in thus obstructing the commerce of the West.

I say that to us of the West it is important that we stand firm upon this question. We should stand together and hold that the commerce of the country should go free from one State to another and through all of the States; and I hope we shall get such a vote upon this question that we will settle it now and forever, that the West has an interest in the means of transit as well as the States through which the roads pass.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield now for five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COFFROTH.]

Mr. COFFROTH. Mr. Speaker, I would hesitate as long as any other member of the House before I would take away a right guaranteed to any State. The history of the legislation of Pennsylvania on railroads is such that the interests of the people require the passage of this bill. The Pittsburg and Connellsville railroad was chartered some years ago, and a great part of it had been put under contract when the Pennsylvania Legislature repealed the charter of the company and thus prevented the road from a speedy completion. Now, sir, after such conduct, what can we expect from the Pennsylvania Legislature? It appears to me, judging from its legislation, to be held in the socket, or kept under the influence of the eastern portion of the State. We have appealed in vain to the Legislature of Pennsylvania to respect the railroad interest of the southwestern portion of the State, and all our appeals have been spurned and refused.

It is true that our people are in favor of a general railroad bill. But they are especially in favor of the passage of this bill by Congress, and the construction of the Pittsburg and Connellsville railroad, which passes through the richest mineral regions of our State.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOD] asks, what is the necessity for this now in a time of peace? Sir, now is the time to secure the construction of this road. If it had been made before the late war began millions and millions of dollars would have been saved to this country. It would have paid itself ten times over in transporting for the Government soldiers, arms, and ammunition from the West to the seat of war. I am therefore in favor of the passage of this bill. It is not destroying the rights of any parties, but I believe it is only doing justice to the great Northwest and the western and southern parts of Pennsylvania. Their interests demand it, and they appeal to Congress to pass this bill that they may be protected from the monopoly that now rules the Legislature of Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I noticed, when the amendment was read which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] moved to this bill this morning, that there is one section of it which declares that certain acts done toward this company shall be deemed misdemeanors and punished in a certain manner. The lowest punishment when by a fine is $1,000, and when by imprisonment the shortest term is for one year.

Now, I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] either to withdraw that section entirely or to modify it. It seems to me that the penalty therein provided is too severe for many acts which may be done toward the property of this railway company. And in addition to that I would suggest that this legislation, even if it shall pass Congress, receive the approval of the Executive, and become a law, will doubtless be brought into the courts for adjudication. Doubtless the State of Pennsylvania will resist, and this matter will go into the courts before anything can be done under this bill.

The decisions of the State courts may yet be such that this company will receive all the protection necessary from State legislation. Now, it seems to me that it would be better, and perhaps strengthen the bill, if that section were omitted altogether.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am willing to adopt the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] and withdraw the first of the two sections which I offered as an amendment. The other section is one merely authorizing appeals in suits, and is precisely the section adopted in the Connellsville railroad bill.

The first section of the amendment of Mr. GARFIELD was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman to allow me a little time to reply to those gentlemen who have spoken particularly of the illiberality of the people of my district.

Mr. GARFIELD. I must decline. I will take it for granted, if the gentleman pleases, that the people of his district are the most liberal people in the whole country.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I do not thank the gentleman for giving the floor to three different persons to assail the people of my district, and then say that he will take it for granted that the assault was uncalled for. I hope, if it is the intention that no one shall speak upon this bill except those who are pledged to these pet corporations, that the previous question will not be sustained.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yielded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] and to his colleague, [Mr. O'NEILL,] I have yielded no more time to the other side.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman said that if he had known that I would have spoken against the bill he would not have yielded to me.

Mr. GARFIELD. When did I say that?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I heard the gentleman make the remark to members around him. They asked him why he yielded to me, and he said he thought I was in favor of the bill, or he would not have yielded to me.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman certainly misunderstood me.

Mr. SCOFIELD. No, sir; I think not.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is one point which has been urged by the gentleman from Philadelphia, [Mr. O'NEILL,] which I must notice before I ask action on this bill. He says there was a clause in the charter of this company requiring that the work should be begun on the road within three years and completed within seven years. I wish to inform the gentleman and the House that there was no such provision in the charter.

Mr. O'NEILL. Let me suggest to the gentleman that if he will send to the Library for the Acts of the Ohio Legislature of 1848 he will find that provision. The preamble to the act of the Pennsylvania Legislature of 1864 recites the fact as I have stated it. The limitation may, perhaps, have been in some general railroad law of the State of Ohio, and hence the statement in the preamble.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have the volume in my hand. I have here on my desk every law of Ohio and Pennsylvania on this subject, and I am responsible for the accuracy of every statement that I make. In 1848 a charter was granted by the Legislature of Ohio to the Mahoning Railroad Company. That company did not comply with the terms of their charter within three years, and in 1851 the charter was renewed with no limitation of time in the charter itself. But there was on the statute-book of Ohio a general corporation law, one section of which I will read:

"If any railroad company shall not be organized within three years from the passage of the special act incorporating the same, and not less than ten miles of such road shall be completed sufficiently for use within seven years from the same date, then the act creating the same shall be void."

That is the only limitation of time imposed upon this company by the laws of Ohio.

Now, sir, in 1853, after the road had been commenced, the Legislature of Pennsylvania reenacted, word for word, in express terms, the charter of the State of Ohio of 1851, without adding any limitation of time other than that embraced in the Ohio law. Now, what was that limitation? Why, that the work should be begun on the Cleveland and Mahoning railroad within three years, and that ten miles should be completed within seven years. Before the seven years had elapsed fifty miles of road had been completed, and seventy miles are now completed. The whole road had been surveyed, the construction contracts were being made, and all the money had been raised for completing the road when this act of repeal was passed by the Pennsylvania Legislature. The facts are fully set forth in the preamble of the pending bill.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has said that the legislation of his State has been liberal. I grant that up to a certain time it was very liberal. But within the last eight or ten years a marked change has come over the spirit of its railroad legislation. The gentleman says that Ohio was in fault in reference to the Wheeling bridge case. I remind the gentleman that Congress rebuked the State of Ohio and the State of Pennsylvania for their narrow and illiberal policy in reference to the Wheeling bridge, and made that bridge, under the authority of an act of Congress, part of a national, military, and postal road. I am very glad that my State received such a merited rebuke when it attempted an illiberal policy that would shut up the great avenues of trade between and among the States; and I am very glad also that Pennsylvania shared in the rebuke, and that a great highway is now open by the authority of Congress. I ask that, in the same spirit, this Congress, now appealed to by this corporation, which is trying to open this great and important highway between the West and the Atlantic coast, shall also throw the aegis of its protection over those men whose money was raised and whose labor has been expended until the work is so nearly completed that eighteen months will see the whole line finished.

I wish to inform the House that an ex-Governor of my State, who was one of the corporators of this company, went to the Legislature of Pennsylvania this last winter and asked that they should reinstate the company in its rights to complete the road. The committee on railroads of the Pennsylvania Legislature referred him to a railroad president, not a member of the Legislature, to ascertain whether that company could have its charter restored. And when he appealed to that railroad president—one word. The same ex-Governor of Ohio, not the Governor at that time, I think in 1853, came to the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania and begged through this act upon the faith that the road should be built into the State of Pennsylvania according to the provision of the Ohio charter.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I want to say

Mr. GARFIELD. I am informed that the Governor was told by the railroad president that the charter might be restored if he would run the Ohio road so as to connect with the Pennsylvania Central road some fifty or sixty miles east of the city of Pittsburgh, and thus turn the tide of travel into that channel. He could not accept justice on such a condition, and so abandoned any attempt to obtain a restoration of the company's rights from the Pennsylvania Legislature, and now they appeal to this body to take that important work under national protection and allow the road to be completed.

The bill provides that the rights of the company shall be guaranteed to them by the Congress of the United States, and in case litigation shall arise they shall have access to the courts of the United States.

I hope to be able on a future day—when the general national railroad bill, which I had the honor to introduce a few weeks ago, comes up for discussion—to go into the whole question of commerce among the States as I have not the time to do now.

I believe the time has come when the General Government must use the authority clearly vested in it by the Constitution "to regulate commerce among the States," and not allow States and close corporations to block that free commercial intercourse which is the life of industry and vitality necessary to the growth and harmony of the Union. In order that the House may understand the spirit and policy of the Pennsylvania Legislature on this subject I append the opinion of Justice Grier, of the Supreme Court, on the repeal of the Pittsburgh and Connellsville Railroad Company's charter.

His Honor Judge McCandless, in the United States circuit court, read the following opinion of Judge Grier in the case of the Mayor, &c., of Baltimore vs. The Connellsville and Southern Pennsylvania railroad. The case was argued at Williamsport on the 20th of June last by B. H. Latrobe, Esq., and Hon. Reverdy Johnson on the part of the city of Baltimore, and Judge Walter H. Lowrie and G. P. Hamilton, Esq., for the Southern Pennsylvania railroad.

Opinion of the Court.

The single question for decision in this case is correctly stated in the argument of the learned counsel for the respondent, as follows:

The charter of the Pittsburgh and Connellsville Railroad Company contains the following provision, namely: "If said company shall at any time misuse or abuse any of the privileges herein granted, the Legislature may resume all and singular the rights and privileges hereby granted to such corporation."

Under this clause the Legislature, by an act passed in 1864, revoked and resumed all and singular the rights and privileges granted to said company, so far as the same authorized it to construct any line or lines of railway southwardly or eastwardly from Connellsville.

Is this repealing act repugnant to the Constitution of the United States on the ground that it impairs the obligation of the contract between the State and the company?

The objections made on the argument to the form of the pleadings and the right of the complainant to have the remedy sought in his bill will be found overruled in a similar case by the Supreme Court. We refer to the case of Dodge vs. Wolsey, 18 Howard, 336. In that case the complainant was a stockholder in the corporation, whose interests were likely to be injuriously affected by the State legislation, if it should be carried into effect. In this case the complainant is a creditor, who, on the faith of legislative acts granting certain franchises and privileges to the Pittsburgh and Connellsville Railroad Company, has advanced large sums of money, which have been expended in constructing their road. If that corporation submit to this act of the Legislature, divesting them of the most valuable part of their franchises, the security and rights of the complainant would be materially injured. The bill is in the nature of a bill quia temet, and the complainant has a right to the remedy sought, if the court should be of opinion that the act of 1864 impairs the obligation of the original contract or act of incorporation granted to the Connellsville Railroad Company.

The only question, then, is as to the validity of this act. The act repealing the franchises of the corporation, or material part, and transferring its franchises and property to another corporation without its consent, impairs the obligation of the original contract, is not and cannot be denied. Nor is it denied that an act granting corporate privileges to a body of men who have proceeded on the faith of it to subscribe stock and borrow money, and expend it in the construction of a valuable public improvement, is a contract, and that it is not in the power of either party to it to repudiate or annul it without the consent of the other.

The State claims no sovereign power to repudiate its contracts or defraud its citizens, and the Constitution delegates no such power to the Legislature.

If in the act of incorporation the Legislature retains the absolute and unconditional power of revocation for any or no reasons; if it be so written in the bond, the party accepting a franchise on such conditions cannot complain if it be arbitrarily revoked; or if this contract be that this Legislature may repeal the act whenever in its opinion the corporation has misused or abused its privileges, then the contract constitutes the Legislature the arbiter and judge of the existence of that fact.

But the case before us comes within another category. The contract does not give an unconditional right to the Legislature to repudiate its contract. Nor is the Legislature constituted the tribunal to adjudge the question of fact as to the misuse or abuse. Moreover the case before us admits that the condition of facts upon which the Legislature is authorized to repeal the act does not exist. It admits that the corporation has neither "misused or abused its privileges." A charter may be vacated by the decree of a judicial tribunal, in a proper proceeding for that purpose, without any such reservation in the act.

Then both parties are heard and the verdict of a jury on the facts can be obtained, which concludes the question. But the Legislature possesses no judicial authority under the constitution, and has no established course of proceedings in the exercise of such power.

The party who is injured by its action is not heard. The reasons usually alleged in the preamble to such acts are the mere suggestions of some interested party, seeking to speculate at the expense of others. Professional solicitors who infest the lobby are ever ready for a sufficient consideration to impose on the good nature of honest but often careless legislators by the suggestion of any necessary falsehood.

If any one should feel curious as to the method used by agents of corporations to obtain such legislative acts as may be desirable, they will find them fully exposed in the opinion of the Supreme Court, delivered in the case of Marshall vs. Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, 16 Howard, 333.

We do not intend even to insinuate that any such secret services by "skillful and unscrupulous agents," "stimulated to active partisanship by the strong lure of high profits," to use "most efficient means," to get the vote "of the careless mass of legislators," have been used in this case. But we do say that the recitals in the preamble to this act exhibit a labored attempt to justify a more than doubtful exercise of power by an array of reasons which, even if true in fact, might be demurred in law as insufficient.

The act does not contemplate the exercise of the right of eminent domain by which the property of individuals or corporations may be taken for some public use on making ample compensation. Its object is to transfer the franchises and property of one corporation, anxious by every means in its power to complete a valuable public improvement, to another whose interest it is not to complete the road, and who are not required to do so at any time in this or the next century. Where in a case like the present the Legislature are asked to take the property of one corporation and give it up to another, on the ground that one has misused or abused its privileges, the just and proper mode would be to pass a resolution ordering the Attorney General to institute the proper legal proceedings to ascertain the fact of "misuse or abuse." If such issue be found true, then that the charter be revoked or resumed. We do not say that without such judicial proceeding ascertaining the existence or condition in which the right of repeal is reserved, the act is absolutely void; but we do say that in all such cases the party injured, if he denies the existence of such "misuse or abuse," has a right to be heard, and to have that question tried before he shall surrender his property or his franchise. We do not think it necessary to notice the numerous and conflicting cases which have been brought to our notice by the learned counsel.

In the case of the Erie and Northeast Railroad vs. Casey, 26 Pennsylvania and 1 Grant, the court found, after a full hearing of the parties, that the fact of "misuse or abuse" did exist, and therefore the act was not void.

It cannot, therefore, be any precedent for a case which admits that such facts do not exist. The principles of law, so far as they affect this case, are very clearly and tersely stated by Chief Justice Lewis, in his opinion to be found in 1 Grant, 275, with a review of the cases and a proper appreciation of that from Iowa.

The sum of the whole matter is this:

1. The complainant has shown a proper case for the interference of the court in his favor.
2. That the act complained of is unconstitutional and void under the admissions of the case.
3. The complainant is entitled to the decree of the court on the pleadings as they stand.
4. That the defendants have leave to withdraw their demurrer and answer over; and if they shall so request, an issue will be ordered to try whether the Pittsburgh and Connellsville railroad have misused or abused their charter.

I am authorized to say my brother McCandless fully concurs in this opinion.

Bill dismissed to the Governor, as his acts can do neither harm nor good to either party. Respondents have thirty days to file answer and request issue. If not done in that time final decree according to the prayer of the bill. Per curiam:

R. C. GRIER.

I now call for the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman to let me say a few words on this bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I decline to yield.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 49, noes 32; no quorum voting.

Mr. MOORHEAD demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. GARFIELD, and RANDALL of Pennsylvania, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 34.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. ANCONA demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The main question was then ordered.

The question recurred on the amendment.

Mr. FINCK demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. GARFIELD demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. LE BLOND demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 41, not voting, 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Bidwell, Bingham, Bromwell, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Conkling, Cook, Davis, Delano, Dodge, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Henderson, Higby, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jonckes, Julian, Kelso, Ketcham, Kaykendall, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, McRuer, Moorhead, Moulton, Paine, Perham, Price, Raymond, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Schellabarger, Sloan, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, and James F. Wilson—77.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Baldwin, Blaine, Brandegee, Chandler, Darling, Dawes, Deffrees, Deming, Finck, Glossbrenner, Harris, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Kelley, Kerr, Le Blond, Marvin, McCullough, Mercer, Miller, Morris, Myers, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Orth, Samuel J. Randall, Ross, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Thayer, Thornton, Trimble, William B. Washburn, Windom, and Wright—41.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Anderson, Barker, Benjamin, Bergen, Blow, Boutwell, Boyer, Broomall, Bundy, Cullom, Culver, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Eldridge, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Aaron Harding, Hayes, Hill, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jones, Kasson, Latham, Marshall, McIndoe, McKee, Morrill, Nocil, Patterson, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Radford, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Rousseau, Shanklin, Smith, Stilwell, Taber, Taylor, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Woodbridge—65.

So the bill was passed.

During the vote,

Mr. JOHNSON stated that his long absence was occasioned by sickness.

Mr. WRIGHT. I think this bill is an invasion of the rights of the States, and I vote "no." I will state, also, that my colleague, Mr. ROGERS, is absent; if he were present he would vote "no."

The result having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour having expired, the next business in order is the consideration of House bill No. 450, to reduce and establish the pay of the officers and to regulate the pay of the soldiers of the armies of the United States, upon which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] has the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would suggest whether there is not some business on the Speaker's table that might as well be disposed of.

Mr. THAYER. With the understanding that I shall be entitled to my time I have no objection to proceeding to other business.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

POSTAL LAWS.

The first business on the Speaker's table was House bill No. 281, to amend the postal laws, returned from the Senate with amendments. The bill, with the amendments, was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

NITRO-GLYCERINE.

The next bill on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 313, to regulate the transportation of nitro-glycerine and glycol oil; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

COMMODORE THOMAS TURNER.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 251, in relation to Commodore Turner; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, informing the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill of the House (No. 363) supplementary to the several acts in relation to pensions.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendment to the bill of the House (No. 459), granting a pension to Anna E. Ward, asked for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Messrs. LANE of Indiana, EDMUNDS, and GUTHRIE managers on its part.

Also, that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the House (No. 142), authorizing the Postmaster General to pay additional salary to letter carriers in San Francisco.

Also, that the Senate had passed a joint resolution manifesting the respect of Congress to the memory of the late Lieutenant General Winfield Scott, in which he was directed to request the concurrence of the House.

FRESH-WATER BASIN FOR IRON-CLADS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 92, authorizing the appointment of examiners to examine a site for a fresh-water basin for iron-clad vessels of the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. LYNCH. I ask for the immediate consideration of this joint resolution.

The joint resolution was read in full. It authorizes an examination for a site for a fresh-water basin for iron-clad vessels near Portland, Maine.

Mr. LYNCH. I move the previous question on the joint resolution.

Mr. LEBLOND. I would like to move a reference of this joint resolution to the appropriate committee. It is too limited, I think, in confining the examination to Portland, Maine. It may be thought proper to go further. I hope the resolution will take the usual course and be referred.

Mr. LYNCH. This is a proposition to examine a site. I understand an officer of the Navy near that station will be detailed for that purpose. The object is simply for the Secretary of the Navy to get information and report it back to the House for final action. It is simply a matter of inquiry, and I see no reason why it should go to the Naval Committee.

Mr. LEBLOND. The gentleman's remarks show the necessity of its reference. If a naval officer at that station is simply to report upon the utility of a basin of that character at that point it can certainly have but little weight in the subsequent action of this House. If such a place is necessary perhaps a committee should be appointed to examine and determine where is the most feasible locality. I hope, therefore, that it will be referred.

Mr. LYNCH. This is simply a matter of examination and inquiry, which will probably take a day. I do not see any necessity of having the resolution referred to the Naval Committee after having passed the Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT. I would ask the gentleman from Maine to allow me a few moments. I wish to offer an amendment. It is of great importance to the country that we have a site for a navy-yard capable of affording the means of taking the best care of our iron-clads. I would like to amend the resolution simply by adding "and also the Hudson river at Tappan bay." There is a splendid site there, and there is a natural flow of fresh water from the Palisades. It is able to accommodate vessels having the greatest draught of water in the United States. The amendment can do no harm if the gentleman is really in earnest.

Mr. LYNCH. I do not propose to go into the merits of this resolution at all, for I know nothing of it, and if the gentleman will bring in a resolution asking for the examination of a site there, I will vote for it cheerfully; but I do not propose to give way for any amendment to this resolution. I demand the previous question.

The question was put upon seconding the demand for the previous question; and there were—ayes 35, noes 19; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. LYNCH and LEBLOND.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes fifty-nine, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. LYNCH moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. COOPER, his Private Secretary.

DEATH OF GENERAL SCOTT.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up the message of the Senate in regard to the death of General Scott.

No objection was made; and the message from the Senate was taken up and read, as follows:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
May 31, 1866.

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That the two Houses of Congress have received with profound sensibility intelligence of the death of Brevet Lieutenant General Winfield Scott.

Resolved, That the exalted virtues, both public and private, and the wisdom, patriotism, and valor of this illustrious man in defense of his country and the maintenance of her honor and glory for more than half a century against foreign and domestic enemies in war and in peace, claim the liveliest gratitude and the deepest veneration of the American people.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, when the two Houses of Congress adjourn to-day, they shall adjourn to meet on Monday next, and that a joint committee, to consist of seven members of the Senate and nine members of the House of Representatives, be appointed, who, together with the Presiding Officers of both Houses, shall proceed to West Point to represent Congress at the funeral ceremonies which are to take place to-morrow; and that said committee be attended by the Sergeants-at-Arms of both Houses.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the members of the joint committee on the part of the House to report that the resolutions as they come to us now from the Senate embody just what was agreed upon by the joint committee.

They were directed to be reported first in the Senate and put upon their passage there. They have come to us now from the Senate, where they have been adopted, and they are therefore before the House as the report of the committee as well as in the form of a message from the Senate. I ask that the resolutions be concurred in.

They were unanimously concurred in.

The SPEAKER subsequently said: The Chair announces the following members on the part of the House of the joint committee of Congress to attend the funeral of the late Lieutenant General Winfield Scott; being the Committee on Military Affairs of the House: Mr. ROBERT C. SCHENCK, of Ohio; Mr. HENRY C. DEMING, of Connecticut; Mr. GILMAN MARSTON, of New Hampshire; Mr. LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU, of Kentucky; Mr. JOHN A. BINGHAM, of Ohio; Mr. SYDENHAM E. ANCONA, of Pennsylvania; Mr. JOHN H. KETCHAM, of New York; Mr. JAMES G. BLAINE, of Maine; Mr. CHARLES SITGREAVES, of New Jersey.

The train will leave at half past six o'clock this evening, and if any gentleman named is unable to go, by notifying the Chair the vacancy will be filled.

Mr. BLAINE. On account of personal engagements I am compelled to decline to serve on the committee appointed to attend the funeral of the late Lieutenant General Scott. I therefore ask to be excused.

The gentleman was accordingly excused.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint, in place of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.]

SAMUEL STEVENS.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was bill of the Senate No. 309, to authorize Samuel Stevens, a Stockbridge Indian, to enter and purchase a certain tract of land in the Stockbridge reservation, Wisconsin; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CHANGE OF NAMES OF VESSELS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a joint resolution (S. R. No. 52) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the steamboat City of Richmond to City of Portland and the name of the schooner Lucinda Van Valkenburg to Camden; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS IN THE DISTRICT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 240) relating to public schools in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 296) to incorporate the American Fire and Marine Insurance Company of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

CHESAPEAKE AND POTOMAC CANAL COMPANY.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 281) to authorize the Chesapeake Bay and Potomac River Tidewater Canal Company to enter the District of Columbia and extend their canal to the Anacostia river at any point above Benning's bridge; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

COLORED SCHOOLS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 247) donating certain lots in the city of Washington for schools for colored children in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

OTWAY H. BERRYMAN, DECEASED.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 284) for the relief of the children of Otway H. Berryman, deceased; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

BOUNTIES TO INDIAN REGIMENTS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a joint resolution (S. R. No. 87) to provide for the payment of bounties to certain Indian regiments; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

JOHN GORDON.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 294) for the relief of John Gordon; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

IRA B. CURTIS.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 342) for the benefit of Ira B. Curtis; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

LUMBERING ON ST. CROIX RIVER, MAINE.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 208) to protect American citizens engaged in lumbering on the St. Croix river, in the State of Maine; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. PIKE. I ask that this bill may be considered at this time.

The bill was read at length. The first section provides that the produce of the forests in the State of Maine, upon the St. Croix river and its tributaries, owned by American citizens, and sawed in the Province of New Brunswick by American citizens, (the same being unmanufactured in whole or in part,) having paid like taxes with other American lumber on that river, shall be admitted into the United States free of duty, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The second section provides that this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. PIKE obtained the floor.

Mr. ELIOT. I will state that the Committee on Commerce have carefully considered this bill, and I have been instructed to report from that committee in favor of its passage.

Mr. MOORHEAD. We had this same question up here some time ago, and the House decided largely against it. I therefore move to refer this bill to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. PIKE. I cannot yield the floor for any such purpose as that. I want to say in relation to this bill merely that it is precisely similar to one that was passed some time ago in relation to the St. John river. The necessity for it arises from the fact that lumber of American growth coming down the St. Croix river can, a portion of it, be sawed more conveniently on the New Brunswick side of the river. This bill proposes that lumber owned by American citizens and sawed by American citizens and paying the same taxes as other American lumber on that river, shall simply be considered American lumber. That is all there is in the bill.

Mr. MOORHEAD. As I understand it, this lumber is grown in the State of Maine, and brought down the St. Croix river, and sawed in New Brunswick. Now, I would like the gentleman to inform me how we can tell, when this lumber is delivered, whether it was grown in Maine or in New Brunswick. I think the effect of this bill will be to allow all New Brunswick lumber to come in free. We investigated this matter thoroughly in the Committee of Ways and Means when we had the reciprocity treaty before us, and I hope the House will either vote down this bill or refer it to the Committee of Ways and Means, where it can be examined.

Mr. PIKE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD] is altogether mistaken. This is simply a local matter, and has nothing whatever to do with the reciprocity treaty.

Mr. MOORHEAD. The gentleman does not answer my question, which is, how can you tell, when this lumber is brought into market, whether it was grown in Maine or New Brunswick?

Mr. PIKE. On this river the whole of the lumber which can possibly be affected by this bill amounts to about sixty million feet per year. That is the whole manufacture of the river. Of those sixty million feet, more than two thirds of the whole quantity grow upon our side of the river. Consequently there can be no possibility be more than twenty million feet taking advantage of this bill. Now, I tell the gentleman that where the place of growth is but about twenty-five, thirty, or forty miles from the place of manufacture, there is practically no such difficulty as he suggests. The man who manufactures the lumber is known; it is known whether he manufactures American timber or New Brunswick timber; it is known where he manufactures it; and there is no difficulty.

I will say also that I have talked with the Secretary of the Treasury about this matter, and he is in favor of the passage of the bill as conducting to the convenience of the Treasury.

Mr. UPSON. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether it would not be better to encourage the sawing of lumber on our own side, instead of the New Brunswick side.

Mr. PIKE. That proposition was taken up and carefully considered; and the mill-owners on the American side of the river were opposed to it, because on examination it was found that in consequence of the run of the river there were on the New Brunswick side conveniences which were not to be had on the American side.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I recollect very well that when we had before the Committee of Ways and Means the question of the reciprocity treaty this same question arose with reference to the St. John river, which I believe heads in the State of Maine, and runs down through one of the Provinces, where the timber was manufactured. Lumbermen from the State of Maine appeared before the committee protesting against any such legislation as is proposed in this bill. All the testimony before us was against such a proposition. The effect of this bill will be to allow this lumber, because it is grown in the State of Maine, to go into a foreign province to be manufactured, thus encouraging the labor of a foreign country in preference to our own. In addition to that, the difficulty will be that when the lumber comes into market it will be impossible to tell whether it was grown in Maine or in New Brunswick; and the result will be that all lumber grown upon that river will come in free.

Now, sir, I have no connection with the lumber business, nor have my constituents any connection with it. But if there are any lumbermen in this House, I hope they will give this bill their attention, for it appears to me to be contrary to a principle which should always be regarded in our legislation.

Mr. PIKE. The gentleman has not read the bill, or he would not raise this objection. The bill provides that this lumber shall be manufactured by American citizens, as well as owned by American citizens, and that it shall be of American growth. This measure is a simple matter of convenience to a small portion of the people of my district.

Mr. PAINE. It appears from the statement which has been made that this lumber proposed to be introduced has already paid some tax. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine what tax it has paid, and how and where.

Mr. PIKE. It must pay all the local tax.

Mr. PAINE. But is any tax paid on the lumber before it is manufactured?

Mr. PIKE. All the local tax on the logs. The lumber on this river floats indiscriminately on both sides. It is provided that the lumber manufactured on the other side shall be taxed the same as that manufactured on our side—taxed in the logs.

Mr. Speaker, I call for the previous question. The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was read a third time.

The question then recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MOORHEAD demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was passed.

Mr. PIKE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAYMENT OF KENTUCKY MILITARY FORCES.

The next bill upon the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 94, providing for the payment of certain Kentucky military forces; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ANNA E. WARD.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a message from the Senate asking for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses on House bill No. 489, granting a pension to Anna E. Ward; which was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed Messrs. TAYLOR, SAWYER, and HARDING of Kentucky as managers of such conference on the part of the House.

CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. PERHAM submitted the following report, and demanded the previous question:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 363) supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to Senate amendments numbered one, two, three, four, and five.

That the House recede from their disagreement to Senate amendment numbered six, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: after the word "to," erase the words "materially interfere with the performance of manual labor without wholly incapacitating them therefor," and insert "render their inability to perform manual labor equivalent to the loss of a hand or a foot."

That the House recede from their disagreement to Senate amendment numbered seven, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out all of the new section proposed to the word "effect," and retain the remainder as an addition to section three of the House bill.

That the House recede from their disagreement to Senate amendment numbered eight, and agree to the same with the following amendments: in the third line strike out "fifty" and insert "twenty-five," in line six strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifteen;" and in line seven, after the word "pensioner," insert "or his attorney in fact."

That the House recede from their disagreement to Senate amendment numbered nine, and agree to the same with the following amendment: after the word "age," in line six, insert "and the father as well as the mother."

That the House recede from their disagreement to Senate amendment numbered ten, and that the following be inserted after the word "time," in line six: "and in every case in which a claim for pension shall not have been filed within three years after the discharge or decease of the party on whose account the claim is made, the pension, if allowed, shall commence from the date of filing the last paper in said case by the party prosecuting the same."

That the House refuse to recede from their disagreement to the Senate amendment numbered eleven, and that the Senate recede from said amendment.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the Senate amendment numbered twelve, and agree to the same with the following amendment: in lines fifteen, sixteen, and seventeen, strike out the words "for a period of two years next preceding the enlistment of the man."

SIDNEY PERHAM,

G. V. LAWRENCE,

NELSON TAYLOR,

Managers on the part of the House.

H. S. LAKE,

P. G. VAN WINKLE,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report was adopted.

PENSION BILLS PASSED.

Mr. PERHAM, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back the Senate amendments to the following bills, with the recommendation that they be concurred in:

An act (H. R. No. 216) for the relief of Cordelia Murray;

An act (H. R. No. 345) for the relief of Christina Elder;

An act (H. R. No. 493) granting a pension to Mrs. Joanna Winans; and

An act (H. R. No. 462) granting a pension to Mrs. Sally Andrews.

The amendments of the Senate were severally concurred in.

RAILROAD LINE TO THE NORTHWEST.

The SPEAKER stated the next business in order to be House bill No. 527, to promote the construction of a line of railroads between the city of Washington and the Northwest, for national purposes.

Mr. GARFIELD demanded the previous question on its passage.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. FINCK demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 65, nays 37, not voting 81; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Bidwell, Bingham, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Conkling, Cook, Culom, Davis, Delano, Driggs, Dumont, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Garfield, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Henderson, Higby, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelso, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Longyear, Lynch, McClurg, Moorhead, Paine, Perham, Plants, Price, Raymond, Rollins, Rousseau, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Sloan, Spalding, Stevens, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Windom—65.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Baldwin, Blaine, Brundage, Darling, Dawes, Defrees, Deming, Eldridge, Finck, Grider, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hogan, Asahel W. Hubbard, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Kelley, Ketcham, Le Blond, Marvin, Mercier, Miller, Myers, Newell, Niblack, O'Neill, Samuel J. Randall, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Taylor, Thayer, Thornton, Trimble, Ward, William B. Washburn, and Wright—37.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Anderson, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bergen, Blow, Boutwell, Boyer, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Farquhar, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grinnell, Griswold, Hart, Hayes, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hulburd, Jones, Julian, Kasson, Kerr, Ladin, Latham, Loan, Marshall, Marston, McCullough, McIndoe, McKee, McKuer, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Nicholson, Noell, Orth, Patterson, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Smith, Starr, Stillwell, Taber, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Elibu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Woodbridge—31.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. UPSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its Clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 265) to protect the manufacturers of mineral waters in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

MINERAL WATERS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 265, to protect the manufacturers of mineral waters in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 11) to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communication among the several States; when the Speaker signed the same.

FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit a communication from the Secretary of War covering a supplemental report to that already made to the House of Representatives in answer to its resolution of the 21st instant requesting the reports of General Steedman and others in reference to the operations of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 30, 1866.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection this communication, together with one of the same character received yesterday, will be ordered to be printed and referred to the committee on freedmen.

Mr. LE BLOND. I move that ten thousand extra copies of the report just handed in, together with the former reports of Generals Steedman and Fullerton, be printed.

The SPEAKER. That motion goes to the Committee on Printing, under the law.

PENSIONS.

Mr. PERHAM, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the pensions of the widows of deceased soldiers and sailors of the recent war in proportion to the number of minor children under sixteen years of age of such deceased soldiers and sailors dependent on such widows for support, and to report by bill or otherwise.

UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill relative to records in appellate courts; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to enlarge the powers of the national courts as to process; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BUTLER MORRIS.

Mr. JOHNSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Butler Morris; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

JACOB A. GOBLE.

Mr. JOHNSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Jacob A. Goble, late of company G, one hundred and fifty-third regiment Pennsylvania volunteers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HEIRS OF SIMEON GOBLE.

Mr. JOHNSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of the children of Phoebe Wilson, deceased, who was the widow of Simeon Goble, a revolutionary soldier; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

CHARLES M. STOUT.

Mr. JOHNSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Charles M. Stout, late second lieutenant in company E, seventh regiment Pennsylvania Reserve corps; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PAY OF THE ARMY.

Mr. THAYER. I call for the regular order. The House accordingly resumed the consideration of the special order, being House bill No. 450, to reduce and establish the pay of the officers and to regulate the pay of the soldiers of the armies of the United States, upon which Mr. THAYER was entitled to the floor.

Mr. THAYER. I took occasion yesterday to point out to the House wherein I conceived the attempted analogy which was drawn by the chairman of the Military Committee between the circumstances of the officers of the Navy and the circumstances of the officers of the Army failed. I endeavored to show that there was such a total want of similarity in those circumstances that no argument could be predicated upon any such analogy.

I desire now, sir, to call the attention of the House to the fact that these very allowances which were prohibited by law to the Navy have been restored by law, the act prohibiting those allowances having been repealed. An order has recently been issued by the Secretary of the Navy upon this subject which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[General Order, No. 75.]

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 23, 1866.

Congress having, in view of the call for increased compensation to officers of the Navy, repealed the law which prohibited any allowance to them "for rent of quarters or to pay rent for furniture or for lights or fuel, &c.," the Department, in order to prevent a recurrence of the irregularities, abuses, and arbitrary allowances which occasioned the prohibition, deems it proper to establish a fixed rate of compensation in lieu of the extra allowances which were prohibited by the law now repealed. Accordingly, from and after the 1st day of June proximo, officers who are not provided with quarters on shore stations, will be allowed a sum equal to thirty-three and one third per cent. of their pay in lieu of all allowances, except for mileage or traveling expenses under orders; and those provided with such quarters twenty per cent. of their pay in lieu of said allowances.

The act of March 3, 1865, having increased the pay of midshipmen and mates, the allowance hereby authorized will not be extended to them.

GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. THAYER. It thus appears that allowances in the Navy, which were formerly prohibited, have been restored, and of course the argument founded upon the refusal of these allowances to the officers of the Navy falls to the ground. The House, if it listened to the reading of the order of the Secretary of the Navy, will observe the discrimination which is made in it in reference to these allowances. The order allows thirty-three and one third per cent. of the pay of every officer of the Navy in addition to his ordinary pay and in lieu of all allowances where he is upon shore duty and no quarters are provided by the Government; and when he is upon shore duty, and quarters are provided, he is allowed thirteen and a half per cent. upon his pay, to be added to his regular pay.

I suppose, therefore, that so much of the argument of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] as was founded on the difference in the system which prevails in the Navy and that which prevails in the Army must, in view of these facts, fall to the ground. I adverted yesterday to the hardships which would be inflicted upon many officers, if this measure should become a law, in consequence of the exceedingly high price of the necessities of life at certain posts to which they must resort in pursuance of their orders and in the discharge of their duties.

I alluded to the cost of living on the western plains, at those forts in the far West which are established for the protection of the overland emigration and of the settlers in that country.

In proof of the correctness of my statements upon that subject I desire now to read a few words from one who can speak with accuracy on the subject because he speaks from actual observation. I refer to the work of Mr. Samuel Bowles, entitled "Across the Continent." Mr. Bowles, as we all know, was the historiographer of that pleasant summer journey in 1865 accomplished by the Speaker of this House and his companions across the continent to the Pacific ocean. In his account of that journey he gives many interesting facts and some which have a strong bearing upon the point which I am considering. Writing from Denver, in Colorado, under date of May 29, 1865, he says:

"Wood costs on the plains $75 per cord, so distant are the thin forests that furnish it; lumber when it is used at all, which is rarely, for it must be freighted from one end or the other of the route, $150 to $200 per thousand feet; a wagon and team of oxen, five pairs, $20 to $25 per day; common labor $2 and $3 per day and board. And at Denver, the end of the route, here is a specimen of the prices to-day: potatoes, 25 cents per pound or $15 per bushel; flour, 15 and 20 cents per pound; corn, 18 cents per pound or $10 per bushel; mechanics and laborers, $8 and $10 per day; beef, 40 cents per pound, and hams 45 to 50 cents; girls as house servants, $10 a week. These rates are likely to be cut down one third or one half during the present season, however, as General Connor gives security to transportation across the plains, and competition in freighting and merchandising works its legitimate influences.

Now, it will be observed from this how enormous are the expenses of living in that country. For example, this writer says that at the time he wrote wood was seventy-five dollars a cord. Suppose this bill passes, and an officer is stationed out there. You have deprived him of his allowance of fuel, and he must buy wood or freeze. The amount of fuel now allowed by law changes with the location. An officer stationed south of the thirty-ninth parallel of latitude gets three cords of wood per month for the cold months of the year; north of the thirty-ninth parallel he gets four cords per month; and the allowance is still further increased for stations north of the forty-second parallel. Now, at Fort Bridger an officer would be entitled to receive four cords of wood per month for seven months and one cord per month for the balance of the year from the Government according to existing law. Four cords of wood per month for the seven cold months, and one cord per month for the remainder of the year would make a total for the year of thirty-three cords of wood which an officer in that locality would be entitled to draw from the Government; at seventy-five dollars per cord that would amount to $2,375. The pay of a captain under this bill is $2,000 a year, or deducting the tax $1,980 per annum. So that if the Government deprives him of the allowance for fuel he is now entitled to receive by law, he would be obliged to pay for his wood alone $445 more than all the pay which you propose to give him by this bill. I think that illustration is a tolerably complete answer to this whole bill.

Now, let us look for a moment at the prices at Salt Lake City. I find from the statements of this traveler the following rate of prices there at the time he wrote: hams $1 per pound; wood $18 per cord; lumber $100 per thousand feet; sugar from 75 to 85 cents per pound; coffee from $1 to $1 10 per pound; tea from $3 50 to $5 per pound; tobacco from $2 to $2 50 per pound; heavy brown sheetings, 85 to 90 cents per yard; fine sheetings, 75 to 90 cents per yard; dried apples, 60 cents per pound; molasses, $3 to $3 50 per gallon; labor, $3 per day, &c. Now, any one with very little arithmetic can soon ascertain how far the salary of a captain, as proposed by this bill, would go toward his support in the localities I have mentioned. It would be impossible for an officer to exist in that locality upon the pay you propose to give him by this bill, after you have cut off the allowances which the Government hitherto has made to him.

I now ask the Clerk to read a letter upon this subject written by General Brice, Paymaster General of the Army, to the Adjutant General of the Army, together with the papers therein referred to, and which are attached.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
PAYMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, March 10, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to reply to your verbal application for suggestions on the subject of the comparative merits of the present system of compensation to the Army by "pay and allowances," and the other plan now under consideration in Congress of "fixed salaries."

This, you are aware, is no new question; the same subject has been mooted, discussed, and considered heretofore on various occasions in Congress and in the Army. The results have uniformly been the same, namely, a conviction, after a careful investigation of the subject in all its bearings, that the present plan is the most equal, just, and economical that can be devised for officers of the Army whose condition and services are subjects of continual change, modified contingencies of duty, which make corresponding changes of compensation expedient and proper, and which is so easily and justly regulated by the system of "allowances," which, with slight modifications, has obtained in our service from the beginning of its history to the present day.

I send you, herewith, an extract from an official report of that gallant and much distinguished officer of the war of 1812, Brevet Major General Nathan Towson, Paymaster General of the Army for thirty-five years, (from 1819 till his decease in 1854,) made to the Secretary of War, April 3, 1826.

Also a letter on the same subject, addressed to the Secretary of War, dated February 18, 1856, by the excellent successor of General Towson, the late Paymaster General Larned.

These opinions of my intelligent and distinguished predecessors leave nothing for me to add except the expression of my entire concurrence in them. Years of familiarity with the military service, not alone in this department of it, have confirmed in my mind the belief that a change from the present system of compensation to any plan of stated salaries will work injuriously to the officers of the Army and to the Government.

The evils of such plans, as made apparent in the development of its workings, will necessarily lead to frequent future acts of legislation to correct them, till finally, by that process, a system shall be attained having essentially the features of the present one.

It is perhaps worthy of remark: in the long line of eminent men who from the beginning of our history have filled the office of Secretary of War, it is a traditional fact, if not one of recorded history, that only one of them has shown favor to the salary system for the Army, to wit, Jefferson Davis. And the only Army officer of any note who within the last forty years is known to have advocated such a system after a full consideration of the subject is General Braxton Bragg, late of the rebel service. And as a commentary upon the opinions of these two—while the first was at the head of the rebel government and the other a general officer high in his confidence—precisely the same system as ours now prevailing was adopted and continued for the payment of the insurrectionary forces.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
B. W. BRICE,
Paymaster General,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL OF THE ARMY.

PAYMASTER GENERAL TOWSON. 1826.

Extract from a report made by the Paymaster General to the Secretary of War, dated April 3, 1826. (Vide Reports Committee, first session Twenty-Third Congress, vol. 4.)

To judge of the expediency of changing the present mode of compensating officers of the Army, it will be proper to examine the several items of allowance; to inquire the reasons why they were so made, and the probable effect that would be produced by substituting a fixed sum of money in lieu.

I.—PAY AND SUBSISTENCE.

The allowances under this head may be considered similar to the salary of civil officers, and on a slight view it would seem that no inconvenience would result to the Government or officer from substituting a fixed sum of money for the subsistence part which is so definite and unvarying, but a little reflection will show that the reasons for including rations in the allowance are cogent.

It frequently happens that troops serve, both in peace and war, in unsettled or exhausted countries where provisions cannot be procured or where the prices would exceed the officers' means of purchase. It is, therefore, indispensable that the Government provide food for the officer as well as for the private, and it is accordingly stipulated to be done. The price of the ration is fixed in order that the compensation may be equal wherever drawn. The option to draw in kind or to commute is granted to the officer that the compensation for his services may be as entirely within his control as the salaries of civil officers are within theirs. It is evident that it would be embarrassing to the service as well as to officers to deprive them of the privilege of drawing rations in kind, in many situations; they must, therefore, be furnished as at present or sold to the officer by the subsistence department, which amounts to the same thing.

II.—SERVANTS.

This allowance is contingent, and cannot be granted unless the servants are actually employed. If it were intended solely as an emolument, as is frequently supposed, it would be of no importance to the Government, and for the interest of the officer to it should be granted without the condition of service; but this is not the case; the good of the service, as well as the convenience of officers, requiring that the expense of employing servants should be incurred. It would not do for officers on a march, near an enemy, or in many other situations, to neglect their proper and important duties to look after their baggage, take care of their horses, or to cook their provisions.

The compensation for servants is made under the heads of pay, subsistence, and clothing. The two last are included for the same reason that subsistence forms a part of the compensation for services, namely, that they may be obtained in all situations and at a reasonable price. They may, therefore, be drawn in kind or commuted, as officers shall elect. The effect of granting a fixed sum in lieu of this allowance would be to hold out an inducement to dispense with the employment of waiters, which, it has been shown, would be injurious to the service. It is true, servants are frequently a convenience to officers, independent of their public duties, but this is incidental. The true reason for allowing them is that the interest of the Government is promoted by employing waiters, instead of officers, to perform menial duties.

III.—FORAGE.

Forage is only granted to officers whose particular duties require them to be mounted, which involves an expense that it is reasonable should be borne by the Government. The number of horses for which forage can be claimed is determined by the rank of the officer. The allowance is contingent, and can only be charged when the horses are actually kept; consequently there can be no inducement to keep a greater or less number than the duties of officers require.

If not furnished by the Government, it would be frequently impossible for officers to obtain it. Another reason why it should be is the difference in the price of the article at different places. An officer traveling through the Creek nation was compelled to pay four dollars per bushel for corn at a time when it could have been purchased in Ohio or Kentucky for twenty-five cents. It is therefore evident that the same amount allowed for forage at different places would be unequal in its value.

IV.—ADDITIONAL OR DOUBLE RATIONS.

These are granted to commandants of military departments, posts, and arsenals, engineer officers superintending the construction of fortifications, and to particular heads of the staff at this place, on the ground that the duties and stations of such officers unavoidably subject them to a greater intercourse with military men and persons on public business, and, consequently, to greater expense than officers who are not so situated. The reason for making this allowance under the head of rations is to enable officers to draw a greater quantity of provisions from the subsistence department than they are authorized to do when not subject to the expense of entertaining official visitors. When the difficulty of procuring provisions does not exist, the rations are commuted at twenty cents each, which amounts to the same as allowing a specific sum. The option to commute is with the officer. This allowance is not considered an emolument, but the reimbursement of an expense imposed on the officer by his particular situation and duty. It is contingent, being governed by command and locality.

V.—FUEL.

This article is always furnished in kind, except at this place. It is supplied by the Government because it would frequently be difficult for officers to obtain it in any other way, and because the price varies very materially at different posts, which would produce inequality in the compensation of officers of the same rank. The allowance is not intended to be greater than is necessary for current consumption; therefore, if not drawn monthly, it reverts to the Government. It is unnecessary to add that this object would be defeated by substituting a fixed sum in lieu.

VI.—QUARTERS.

It would often be impossible, and always inconvenient, for officers to procure lodgings when serving either in fortifications, cantonments, or camps, and if they could it would be prejudicial to the service, to separate them from their commands. Quarters and tents are therefore provided by the Government for officers as well as privates. They are always furnished by the quartermaster's department in kind, except at this place, where it is mutually the interest of the Government and officer to commute them. Many restrictions are imposed on this allowance. (See article on the quartermaster's department, No. 69, Army Regulations.)

There is no allowance, perhaps, which would be so unequal in its value to officers differently located, as a fixed sum in lieu of quarters, unless a charge is raised against those who occupy public buildings. For instance, it would make the entire difference of the sum allowed between officers of the same rank stationed at Greenleaf's Point and in this city. A fixed sum in money in lieu of the present allowance would be much more expensive to the Government, unless rent be charged for public quarters.

VII.—STATIONERY.

This is furnished by the Government in kind, because it cannot, at frontier posts, and in time of war, be procured by officers in any other way. The allowance is very limited, and so far from being an emolument, is in most cases not equal to the actual consumption on public business. The allowance of a fixed sum in lieu would, in all cases where a supply of the article was precarious, produce great embarrassment to officers, and to the service generally.

VIII.—TRANSPORTATION.

This is so entirely contingent as to make it impossible to fix a given sum as an equivalent. All that can be done is to regulate the allowance according to the rank of the officer, and to fix the rate per mile, which is now the case. In many instances the means of transportation must be furnished by Government from necessity; in others it is its interest to do so. The option, therefore, of furnishing it in kind is reserved to the Government. The allowance is very strictly guarded. (See article No. 69, Army Regulations.)

The foregoing embrace all regular allowances authorized by law or regulations, and from these it will be seen that pay and subsistence proper include everything given in lieu of salary and in payment for services; all other allowances are contingent and granted to cover expenditures which the duty of officers and the interest of the Government require should be made. Those allowances frequently add to the officers' convenience, but this, as I have before observed, is incidental, and not the object for which they are made. Hence the condition, that officers must keep the servants and horses; command double ration posts; receive fuel as it is used; occupy the quarters; travel the distance stated in their transportation accounts, and draw the stationery in kind, to entitle them to the allowances under these several heads. In many cases they are not even a convenience, and then, if the good of the service does not require it, the expense is not incurred.

The Government has a security in the high sense of honor of military men that those contingent allowances will not be abused, and if this were not so, the fact that an officer places himself at the mercy of his enemies, and that his commission would be the price of an improper certificate, is a sufficient guarantee.

Our laws and regulations which relate to pay and allowances were formed with a thorough knowledge of the usages in other services, and in whatever particulars they may differ, I am persuaded a sufficient reason will be found, either in local circumstances or in advantage to the service, to justify the change.

There is no service in which the pay proper includes all allowances. In time of war it would be impossible for the operations of an army to be carried on, even in Europe, where all supplies can be more readily provided than in this country, if the Government did not furnish its officers with such as are indispensable. In this country the impossibility of procuring them exists in time of peace as well as war; it follows, therefore, that certain allowances must be made in kind, in numerous cases, at all times. The practice, both in the French and British service, is to grant the allowances as permanent emoluments, and to furnish the article in kind whenever it is necessary for the good of the service. We have preferred to make allowances, not as emoluments, but to cover official expenses, to prevent the service from suffering from the cupidity of some, and to remunerate the faithful and patriotic discharge of duty in others. The option with the officer to receive in kind has the advantage, also, of equalizing the compensation much better in this country, than a difference in a moneyed allowance at different stations would, for the prices of the several articles granted in kind fluctuate as much with time as they do with place, and what might be a fair allowance in one year would be unfair in the next.

It is scarcely thought necessary further to urge the importance of equalizing the compensation at the different posts. One of the privileges of seniority is the choice of command—a necessary privilege. No senior officer would relinquish his claim to an economical command in favor of a junior, however beneficial it might be to the service. It is true this might and would become the duty of superior authority to decide, and to order accordingly; but if the decision was against the senior, it would produce much dissatisfaction. It is therefore better to avoid the cause of contention, unless some positive advantage were to result from the change.

It may be urged that the arguments founded on the necessity of furnishing allowances in kind apply to a state of war, and are not forcible objections to a salary in time of peace. If this were admitted to the fullest extent, it is respectfully conceived that it would not be sufficient to justify the change. All changes must be vicious in a body whose operations are so multifarious and complicated as those of the Army, unless they produce a positive advantage. The alterations in the supplying departments alone, on recurring to the war allowances, would be of the most embarrassing nature, and would take place at the most inconvenient and perplexing crisis. Another, and, I think, an important objection, is that the economy of officers' arrangements would be broken, and must be studied anew on every change; and, in this respect, the officer in peace and the officer in war would be as unlike as the recruit is unlike the soldier.

But if my view of the subject be correct, the necessity, in our service, of supplying the articles in kind, at particular posts, exists as well in time of peace as of war.

The alteration, then, can only be adopted at particular stations. I am therefore of opinion that it would not be expedient to change the present pay and allowances of officers for a fixed compensation, and I most respectfully recommend that if it should at any time be thought advisable to augment or diminish the compensation, it may be done by changing the amount of the allowances, and not by abolishing them, and granting money in lieu.

If Congress should view the subject differently, and decide on a "fixed compensation," justice to the officers requires that, in determining the amount to be allowed, they should consider the great and unavoidable expense to which the erratic life of an officer subjects him, and the extravagant price of living at many stations. It should also be considered that our service holds out none of those pecuniary rewards which are so liberally bestowed by other Governments. Your officer has no life estate in his commission, which he can sell out at great profit; no nominal command for which he receives pay, as well as for the one he exercises; no emolument from the paying, clothing, &c., of his regiment or company; no booty or prize money; no share of the estimated value of all contraband articles seized by his regiment in aid of the revenue laws. Not so the officer in other services; the greater part of the rewards enumerated are granted by all the European Governments, and the whole by that Government whose troops yours have been twice called on to meet in battle. The movable property captured by the Duke of Wellington in the Peninsula, and other campaigns of that war, which was claimed by him as lawful prize of the army, and admitted by the British Government, amounted to £916,450 2s. 6d.

In our service everything captured by the army becomes the property of the Government, while the Navy is entitled to the whole amount captured from an equal or superior force, and half the amount captured from an inferior force.

In all services, except ours, allowance is made for the loss of officers' baggage. The officers' baggage of Sir John Moore's army lost on its retreat to Corunna was estimated at £40,700 3s. 9d. sterling, and paid for by the Government. The same quantity lost by officers of the United States Army would neither have been estimated nor paid for.

If it be true that "officers are the soul of the army," and that victory will accompany the army best paid, fed, clothed, and lodged, everything else being equal, then it is as politic as it is just to make a liberal provision for those on whom you must rely in the hour of danger.

Respectfully submitted

N. TOWSON,
Paymaster General.

PAYMASTER GENERAL LARNED. 1856.

PAYMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., February 18, 1856.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a copy of the resolution of the Military Committee, House of Representatives, on the subject of establishing a fixed salary for officers of the Army in lieu of rations, allowances, and emoluments now authorized, on which I am required to report.

The late Paymaster General gave to this subject the most careful consideration, and embodied his views in an elaborate report made to the Secretary of War on the 3d of April, 1826, a copy of which was sent to a select committee of the House, appointed at the first session, Twenty-Third Congress, to inquire into the expediency of equalizing the pay of officers of the Army and Navy, and will be found in Reports of Committees, first session, Twenty-Third Congress, volume four, document four hundred and sixty-seven, to which I respectfully refer the Secretary of War.

I fully concur in the views expressed therein, and am confirmed in the opinion that such is the nature of our service that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to fix a salary for officers of the Army that would not be liable to serious objections.

BENJAMIN F. LARNED,
Paymaster General.

HON. JEFFERSON DAVIS, Secretary of War.

Mr. THAYER. Now, if any gentleman has doubts in relation to the unjust operation of this bill upon officers of the Army, I hope before he casts his vote for it he will consider attentively the facts stated in these letters.

The opinion of General Brice will, I suppose, be objected to by the gentleman from Ohio as perhaps not being entitled to much weight, although he is certainly an officer familiar with this subject. But he is a bureau officer, yea, the head of a bureau; and I suppose that in proportion to the closeness of his connection with that bureau the value of his testimony will depreciate in the estimation of the gentleman from Ohio. However, sir, the reasons which he gives are for the consideration of the House; and I direct attention to what he says, not so much on account of the position which he occupies as on account of the common-sense views which he presents and the cogent reasons by which he supports them.

I desire now to glance, in a very rapid manner, at the arguments by which the gentleman from Ohio undertakes to maintain the proposition which he presents. I throw out of the account, as of no value in the estimation of the calm judgment of this House, what he has said about the bureaus of the War Department. I suppose, sir, that bureaus are necessary, if you have a staff for your Army; and if you have a staff and bureaus, I suppose that you must employ officers for the conduct of the business of the staff and the bureaus. I do not see the justice of the implied imputation which the gentleman has frequently cast in his remarks on this floor upon the officers of these bureaus. I do not feel myself called upon to defend those officers, because I do not understand that even the gentleman, notwithstanding all his insinuations, has ventured to make, in plain language, any charge against the officers of those bureaus.

Mr. SCHENCK. Once for all, let me tell the gentleman that I made no insinuation. What I say in this House I say openly and distinctly.

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman says that he makes no insinuations. Then he makes charges. Now, I would like any gentleman to read his speech as printed in the Globe, to sift it, and then tell me what is the precise charge that the gentleman makes against the officers of the bureaus of the War Department. I will yield to the gentleman if he has any charge to prefer. I do not understand him as making a charge. He now says he did not make an insinuation.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, all I wanted was to call the gentleman back to the real question in this case. His whole argument is a tissue of sneers and intimations that the Committee on Military Affairs are carrying out their prejudices, are influenced by some sinister motive. And when he used the word "insinuation" I interrupted him—a thing I very seldom do—in order to tell him that I, for one, am not in the habit of making insinuations in this House; that if I have anything to say on any subject I say it openly, plainly, and distinctly. Now, whether I have made any charges or not—and in the sense in which the gentleman uses that term I know I have not, for I have attacked nobody, nor made this a personal question in any way—the gentleman can find by referring to what I have said, for it is reported in the Globe.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, I have endeavored in my remarks on this bill to confine myself to the rules of parliamentary debate. I disclaim what the gentleman imputes to me—sneering at the committee. Nothing that I have said is fairly susceptible of any such interpretation; I have said nothing reflecting upon the committee. I have not alluded in a personal way to the committee, or to any member of it. The House will bear witness that I have confined myself strictly to a discussion of the questions which the committee has brought before the House.

But, sir, in reference to the subject of the bureaus, whether the gentleman means an insinuation or a charge, everybody will bear witness that he has paraded it constantly in the face of the House whenever he has had charge of a military measure here during this session. He talked yesterday about the centripetal force of the bureaus, as if all the officers of the Army were engaged in a scramble to get upon a bureau. If that is not an insinuation of dishonorable purposes and of conduct unbecoming an officer, I do not know what is.

Now, sir, I do not wish to waste my time or the time of the House in dwelling upon this matter. I merely touch upon it in passing. I am not particularly called upon to defend the officers of the bureaus of the War Department. In my judgment they need no defense. They have done their full share of labor in the great struggle through which we have passed. Much of the success which we have achieved is due to the labor and the skill of these officers in the bureaus.

Deeds in the field have more glitter and glory; but when you come to examine into the matter perhaps you will find some credit is due to officers in the bureaus who attended to those details without which you could not have achieved success. But, sir, this has really nothing to do with the question; and I allude to it only in reply to what was said by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

In my judgment, the bill will do greater injury to the officers in the field than to those obliged by the Secretary of War to report in Washington for duty. I have endeavored to explain how it will work to the injury of those officers by a statement of the facts to which I have referred this morning.

Well, sir, if these facts cannot be denied it is apparent, from the nature of the case, that you cannot apply a rigid rule of pay which will do justice to all officers in all parts of the country under all circumstances; that principle was virtually admitted, let me say in passing, by the gentleman from Ohio, when he offered his amendment allowing officers forage in kind. He abandoned the very principle of his bill when he offered that amendment, for every argument which can be made in favor of the allowance of forage can be made in favor of the allowance for fuel and every other allowance to which officers of the Army are entitled.

If, sir, it cannot be denied that the only way to promote equality in pay is to continue in force that plan for the payment of officers which has obtained always hitherto, then why should we alter it? What circumstances call upon this House to make the proposed change? What high officer of the service has recommended it? What official of the Government in any Department has called our attention to it? Not one. Why should we make this change and unsettle a long-settled usage of the Army on this subject?

That brings me to the arguments by which the gentleman supports his bill. I listened attentively yesterday to the argument of the gentleman from Ohio, and I have read it attentively in the Globe this morning. I will undertake to give a perfect analysis in a very few words of the argument he has made in favor of this revolution relating to the pay of officers of the Army.

He says, and that is his first point, the pay of officers of the Army is a mystery to outsiders and the uninitiated. What is the force of an observation like that? It is not a mystery to those who wish to ascertain what it is. That is proved by the fact that the gentleman has given in his speech the exact pay of a major general of the Army, including his pay proper and all his legal allowances. He has given you to a cent the pay of a major general. That shows conclusively that though a mystery to those who will not take the trouble to examine it, it is not a mystery to those who wish to ascertain what the truth is.

The second point which the gentleman makes, is the immoral effect of the present system upon the officers, that is, the temptation which it holds out to fraud. That makes a conspicuous figure in his argument. He puts the case of an officer entitled to forage for a horse. The law is, he is not entitled to draw forage unless he keeps the horse which he is allowed to keep. He says a man in his desire to get forage will be tempted to make this certificate and certify that he keeps a horse when he does not keep a horse. That is his argument of the immoral effect of the existing system! I suppose if any officer were to be found guilty of a practice such as that of certifying that he kept a horse and was entitled to forage, when in point of fact he did not keep a horse and was not entitled to forage, he would be instantly dismissed from the Army. But does it amount to anything? As an argument I submit to the House it does not. If a man is determined to be a rascal, he will be a rascal in defiance of all the laws you may make.

The third point is, that the present system opens the door for legislation by the chief officers of the War Department, and the gentleman gives as an example of the exercise of that power a case in which the Secretary of War—I suppose authorized by law to do it—changed the commutation allowed for quarters in Washington and some other places to rates corresponding with the advance of house rent. Well, sir, I suppose there is nothing in that which will frighten the members of this House out of their propriety or induce them to change the present system.

Fourthly, the gentleman says it tends to take away the independence of officers. Now, sir, is it not really a grim joke to put to this House that a bill which is entitled "An act to reduce the pay of the officers of the Army" is calculated to add to their independence? He says that now they intrigue for places in order that they may get the largest allowances. Sir, will they not intrigue much more if you put them upon the footing which this bill proposes? If the question is, as it will be under this bill, whether they shall remain in the Army by being at a post where by great economy they can live within the salary which you allot them, or whether they shall be driven by their necessity to resign, will they not be induced to intrigue to get into places where they can exist upon the pay you fix? Is not the temptation infinitely stronger in the circumstances which will arise out of the passage of this bill to induce that intrigue of which the gentleman complains than the circumstances which exist under the present system?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have summed up the arguments which are made in support of this bill by the gentleman from Ohio. The House will decide whether those arguments are sufficient to justify the recommendation which is made to this House to overturn a system which has prevailed from the foundation of the Government; which has worked equitably and fairly and justly; which no officer of the Army or of the Government recommends shall be abolished, but which has in its favor uninterrupted usage for a long series of years and the approval of those who are most capable of judging of its merits. Will the House consider these suggestions of the gentleman from Ohio—I cannot dignify them by the name of arguments—a sufficient justification for overturning this long-tried, well-established, fair, just, and equitable system, to supplant it by one which will work only mischief, injustice, and oppression?

Mr. PAINE. I rise to reply to some of the arguments presented yesterday and to-day by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER.] I have listened to those arguments closely, because I take great interest in the subject-matter of this bill. But I am not pledged to anything contained in the bill, as I am not a member of the committee that framed and reported it. Those who framed the bill, after having made up their minds that it is right and ought to be adopted, naturally come into this House pledged in advance to its support. It is a duty they owe to themselves, to their committee, and to the country to undertake to carry through this House a bill which they regard as calculated to promote the interest of the country.

But, sir, I address myself to the consideration of this bill, intending to oppose those provisions of it which do not commend themselves to my judgment, and to support those which do. And after listening carefully to the arguments which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] have respectively presented, I must say that unless stronger and more satisfactory reasons to the contrary can be presented I shall be constrained to vote for the leading features of this bill, insisting, as I shall insist, upon certain amendments, necessary, in my view, to render it complete and equal in its operation, for the reasons which they have given are not satisfactory to my mind, and if gentlemen will give me their attention I think I shall be able to show that those reasons are not entitled to great weight with the members of this House in making up their decision upon the question now before them.

I repeat that I am not pledged to anything in this bill. I undertake its consideration with no prejudice in favor of or against any of its provisions. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER,] or the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] can charge with truth that any members of this House are disposed here in their places unjustly to reproach officers who have been stationed on duty in Washington in the several bureaus of the War Department, they can bring no such charge as that against me. No word of complaint of that kind has ever escaped from my lips; on the contrary, I have nothing but good to speak of those officers of the Army who have been stationed at Washington, with whom I have happened to have personal communication, whether they have been engaged in the bureaus of the War Department or on other duty. I have never seen among them anything but fair dealing, zealous devotion to the service of the Government, and a determination to do all in their power to discharge the obligations they owe to our common country; and I take pleasure here in declaring my appreciation of their services. If anything has ever occurred in my intercourse with them of which I could possibly complain, it escapes my recollection now.

On the other hand, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] can justly charge any member of this House with a disposition to stand up in his place and defend these bureau officers, right or wrong, in any controversy which may arise between them and officers in the field, he certainly can make no such charge against me; for, sir, among my most intimate and highly valued friends are those who have, as officers of the regular Army, served in the field during the progress of this war, and I am bound to them by those strong ties which bind together men who have shared danger and disease and hardship and victory in common.

Sir, I declare here my belief that I enter upon the consideration of the question before the House without any prejudice either for or against the officers of the Army on duty in Washington; either for or against those gallant men who have borne our country's flag to victory on the field during the progress of the late war. I declare it to be my purpose to do justice, equal and exact justice, to these patriotic men, no matter where the fortunes of war may have cast their lot. But, sir, I am compelled to say at the outset, that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] seem to me utterly to misunderstand the law now in force on the subject which they have discussed, and I am amazed that they should have crowded into their argument so many mistakes upon points vital to the propositions which they have undertaken to maintain.

Mr. Speaker, they have, both of them, declared and attempted to show that the present system of pay is elastic, expansive in its nature, adaptable to the necessities of officers, in all the different portions of the United States; that the system adapts itself to cities and posts in the far West, as well as to cities and posts in the East, and makes the pay of officers of the Army as nearly as possible equal and just, while the plan before us is uniform, arbitrary, and unyielding, without adaptability to the changing circumstances of the officer, and tends to inequality and injustice. And, sir, they refer mainly in proof of this to that item of an officer's pay which is denominated "rations" or "commutation of rations." They refer, also, to fuel, quarters, forage, and to servants' pay, rations, and clothing; but they mainly base their arguments upon what they conceive to be the existing law relating to that item of an officer's pay which is called "rations," or "commutation of rations," as contrasted with the provisions of the bill before us on the same subject.

Now, sir, I wish to call the attention of these gentlemen, and of the House, to the mistake they have made in their statement of the law now in force. But in order that I may make no misrepresentation of their positions, I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read, their remarks upon this subject made yesterday, as reported in the Globe. I desire them read for the information of those members of the House who were not then present, and also to refresh the recollection of those who were present, and assure them that I do not misunderstand the honorable gentlemen to whom I refer. I ask the Clerk to read first from the remarks of Mr. BLAINE.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Let me state a case. I will suppose there are ten general officers in this city to-day to be ordered by General Grant to as many different points. Let us suppose the system of commutation of forage, rations, fuel, servants' clothing, quarters, &c., entirely abolished. You send one officer to a post in the Northeast, another to San Francisco, another to Fort Bridger, another to New Orleans, another to New Mexico, and so on, and then give them all the same arbitrary amount of pay as proposed in the pending bill, and I submit that you have imposed the grossest inequality of burden and responsibility upon them."

"Mr. GARFIELD. Does not the bill allow mileage?"

"Mr. BLAINE. I am not talking about mileage. I am talking about the expenses of living after the various posts of service shall have been reached. I was talking only yesterday with an officer who had served in the Rocky mountains and at Fort Bridger. The Government has had to contract there for wood at nearly one hundred dollars per cord and corn at twelve dollars a bushel and flour at seventy-five dollars a barrel. I submit that if you send a brigadier general out there under the pay provided in this bill and compel him to forego all the privileges of commutation he cannot feed two horses and keep two servants on his entire pay."

"The gentleman from Ohio says he does not draw his rations in kind but takes commutation. I know that is the case, but he draws it in commutation of value at the point where he is stationed."

Mr. PAINE. The Clerk will now please read from the remarks of Mr. THAYER.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Sir, it must be manifest that in a country including so large a space as that which is covered by the United States, embracing so many degrees of latitude and longitude, the expenses of living must differ vastly in different parts of the country. The price of subsistence is one thing at St. Louis; it is a totally different thing at Eastport. It is one thing at New Orleans; it is a different thing at Philadelphia. It is one thing at Carlisle, an interior town in my own State; it is quite another thing in Washington."

"Sir, an officer who is obliged to pay but a small price for his board in a town where the price of living is cheap, is, as any man must see, on an entirely different footing from an officer who is placed in another position where the expense of living is extremely high. The Government remedies this inequality by purchasing the subsistence and furnishing it in kind to both the officers.

"The Government can go into all the markets of the United States and purchase its provisions for the Army. It can purchase them at rates vastly below the prices which an individual officer would be obliged to pay for his individual subsistence. The Government, therefore, has hitherto thought it wise to purchase by contract the subsistence for the officer, and to deal out to him, whether he be situated in Arizona or in Boston, those provisions which it has purchased for the common benefit of the Army."

Mr. PAINE. Mr. Speaker, the pay and allowances of an officer of the Army who is not a mounted officer will embrace seven items only. There is, first, the pay proper, so called; second, commutation of rations; third, commutation of servants' wages; fourth, commutation of servants' rations; and fifth, commutation of clothing for servants. All of these five items are paid through the pay department of the Army. The sixth item is quarters or commutation of quarters; and the seventh is fuel or commutation of fuel. The mounted officer receives also forage as the eighth item of his pay and allowances, which can be commuted only when it cannot be furnished in kind.

Now, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] claim that the item of pay proper is different in one portion of the United States from what it is in another? Will he claim that an officer when in Washington receives a different amount of pay proper from what he receives at Fort Bridger, as the law now stands? Certainly it will be sufficient to meet a declaration of that kind with a simple, absolute denial.

Consider next the commutation of rations. This is one of the main items of an officer's pay, and upon this point the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] have made a most serious mistake. Both of those gentlemen evidently suppose that there exists legal authority for issuing to an officer rations in kind; that under the law as it now stands rations in kind are or may be issued to officers. They also entertain the opinion, disclosed in the extracts just read at the Clerk's desk, that in case rations are commuted, the rates of commutation are different in different localities of the country.

They manifestly suppose that when an officer chooses to receive commutation of rations and applies to the paymaster for that commutation on his pay account, he receives one rate at Fort Bridger, another at Washington, another in Pennsylvania, another in Maine, and still another in California or Oregon. They also imagine that if the officer does not choose to accept from the paymaster commutation of rations, he can at his pleasure present himself to the commissary of subsistence and demand rations in kind. And here we have the foundation on which rests the superstructure of their argument.

Sir, the gentlemen are utterly mistaken on both of these points. There is not now, there has not been since this war commenced, any provision or authority of law under which a commissary could issue rations in kind to an officer. There has been, there is now, no authority by which a paymaster could allow different rates of commutation of rations to officers at different points. I say again, sir, that upon these points the gentlemen have been most sadly misinformed, and yet upon these errors of fact rests almost the entire superstructure of the arguments which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] have made in opposition to this bill.

The provision of the law is this, and I ask the attention of those gentlemen to it: no officer of the commissary or subsistence department, or of any other department of this Government, can issue rations in kind to commissioned officers either for themselves or for their servants, not being soldiers. Nor is there any difference in the price of rations as computed by the pay department. The price of the ration is fixed at thirty cents, whether at Fort Bridger, in Washington, in Maine, or Oregon. The commutation price of the ration is thirty cents for officers everywhere, where subsistence is cheap and where it is dear, in all latitudes and longitudes, at all posts, and for every kind of duty. I will read from page 262 of the Army Regulations, reprinted in 1863:

"Subsistence stores will not be issued to officers or to their servants unless they are enlisted men, and are so reported on the officer's pay account or pay-roll."

On page 363 of the same book I also read as follows:

"Officers' subsistence is commuted at thirty cents per ration."

This, sir, is the law; and the practice of the Army has been in strict compliance therewith. If any officer of the subsistence department has issued rations in kind to officers, he has done so in violation of law. If any officer of the pay department has commuted officers' subsistence at any other rate than thirty cents per ration, he has done so in violation of law.

Mr. Speaker, the law does allow commissaries of subsistence to sell to officers of the Army rations at the cost price, exclusive of transportation, for cash on delivery, upon their certificates that these rations are for their own use or the use of their families. And the provision requiring payment in cash on delivery was necessarily modified during this war in certain cases. Only by such purchase can officers obtain subsistence stores from the Government. I will read from page 252 of the Army Regulations:

"An officer may purchase subsistence from the commissariat, paying cash for it on delivery, at cost prices, without including cost of transportation, on his certificate that it is for the use of himself and family."

Now, sir, the gentleman from Maine and the gentleman from Pennsylvania are very wide of the mark if they suppose that an officer stationed at Fort Bridger, where rations are high, could apply to the commissary department and insist upon rations being issued to him in kind. They are equally mistaken if they suppose that he could apply to the pay department and insist that his subsistence should be commuted at a price corresponding with the price of subsistence stores at that post.

Mr. BLAINE. Is the gentleman willing to be interrupted for a moment?

Mr. PAINE. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not at all dissent from the gentleman's statement of facts, nor do I understand that his statement differs essentially from that which I have made. I understand that the officer may under the present law buy rations from the Government at cost exclusive of transportation, or if the rations are not there to be bought or furnished, he is entitled to commutation at the price which it would cost to have the rations there. Am I not right in that?

Mr. PAINE. No, sir, I do not understand the gentleman to be right in that. I should be glad if the gentleman would point out to me a provision conferring such authority. There is no such provision in the law or in the Army Regulations.

Mr. BLAINE. How is it with regard to fuel and forage?

Mr. PAINE. I am considering these items separatim as they are arranged on the pay-table, and will soon come to fuel and forage.

That there may be no doubt on this subject, I will again read to the gentleman the law as it stands in the Army Regulations of 1861, revised and republished in 1863:

"An officer may purchase subsistence from the commissariat, paying cash for it on delivery, at cost prices, without including cost of transportation, on his certificate that it is for the use of himself and family."

And on page 262 of the Army Regulations it is stated that—

"Subsistence stores will not be issued to officers or to their servants unless they are enlisted men and are so reported on the officers' pay-account or pay-roll. An officer may purchase subsistence from the commissariat, paying cash for it on delivery, at cost prices, on his certificate that it is for the use of himself and family."

Now, sir, it appears from the extract which has been read from the speech of the gentleman from Maine made yesterday on this subject, that the Government has been obliged at Fort Bridger to contract for wood at nearly one hundred dollars per cord, corn at twelve dollars per bushel, and flour at seventy-five dollars per barrel. I ask the attention of those gentlemen who are so much in favor of the law as it now stands to the practical operation of that law as applied to the case at Fort Bridger. Suppose that an officer of the Army desires to purchase from the subsistence department a barrel of this flour; suppose that his necessities compel him to make the purchase. He is obliged under the law as it now stands to pay seventy-five dollars for the barrel of flour because it costs the Government seventy-five dollars. If the Government sees fit to purchase the flour elsewhere, in the St. Louis market or in any other market, the cost of transportation is deducted; but if the Government buys the flour there and does not afterward transport it, the officer, unless the law be violated, must pay seventy-five dollars for his barrel of flour.

Sir, I shall propose, before I sit down, an amendment which I think will obviate all such objections to the measure introduced by the committee as pertain to subsistence of officers. It will not permit an issue of rations in kind to officers, nor will it permit them to commute subsistence. It will banish them from their pay-accounts altogether. But it will authorize them to purchase subsistence henceforth as hitherto, at cost prices, if indeed there can be any possible doubt as to their authority to do so under the bill now before the House.

So far as subsistence is concerned, then, there is no more elasticity, no more adaptability to the varied circumstances of officers in the law now in force, than in the plan of the committee modified by the amendments to which I have referred.

The next item on the officers' pay-table is the pay of servants, or the commutation of servants' pay. Of course there is no pretense on the part of the gentleman from Maine or the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the system now in force can vary at different points in the country so far as the pay of servants is concerned. This is fixed at a uniform rate by the law for all parts of the country.

We pass next to the commutation of servants' rations. Precisely the same thing is true there which I have shown to be true of the rations of the officer himself. There is no adaptability to latitude or longitude or to localities more or less expensive so far as commutation of servants' rations is concerned. No man not insane can pretend there is any advantage in this respect in the law which these gentlemen now defend over the measure which they so strenuously oppose.

Next comes the item of commutation of servants' clothing. Is it pretended that this varies at different posts? Gentlemen must be profoundly ignorant of the law and of the Army regulations if they advance any claim like that. No, sir; this commutation is not a variable quantity in the officer's pay. Nor is the law now in force at all superior in this respect to the measure before the House.

We have now passed through the five items of pay received through the pay department, and we find that they are invariably fixed; that they furnish not the slightest foundation for the claim of superiority which gentlemen attempt to set up in favor of the existing law and against the bill under consideration.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin whether an officer who does not choose to commute his rations is not permitted to draw them in kind.

Mr. PAINE. I will repeat, for the fifth time, that an officer cannot draw his rations in kind, either for himself or even for his servant, unless that servant is an enlisted man of the Army.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I understand from this paper, which emanates from some of the military departments in this city, that it is optional, and the officer may commute his rations at thirty cents each or draw them in kind.

Mr. PAINE. I of course do not know what paper the gentleman has in his hand.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman from Vermont to refer to the date of that communication and he will find that it was made forty years ago. The other part is Brice's introduction to it.

Mr. PAINE. I know not what the gentleman has in his hands, but I know what authority I have read to the House. I have read from the Army Regulations issued by authority of the Secretary of War. I have read the provisions standing on pages 252, 262, and 363, and I declare these to be the regulations now in force. I know by experience that they have been rigidly enforced during this war, with the modification as to cash payments to which I have referred. I never heard of the case of an officer drawing rations in kind.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think this is an important feature of this discussion, and I think it should be understood. I have no information on the subject except what I have received here. I ask whether an officer who purchases a ration from a commissary of subsistence is not entitled to receive it at thirty cents.

Mr. PAINE. I will again read the law on page 252:

"An officer may purchase subsistence of the commissariat, paying cash for it on delivery, at cost prices, without including the cost of transportation, on his certificate that it is for the use of himself and family."

I declare that to be, and to have been, the law, with the sole modification often referred to which gave officers a short credit on these purchases when long delay in the payment of the troops had rendered it impossible for them to pay cash on delivery.

Mr. BLAINE. An officer at Fort Bridger is furnished with provisions at their cost in New York city. It is the cost of transportation which goes to swell up the price at the frontier posts. The gentleman's point, therefore, amounts to nothing.

Mr. PAINE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no dispute with the gentleman on that point. I have read the law over and over again. It provides that the officers shall purchase rations at cost, not including transportation. If the Government sees fit to purchase these rations at St. Louis or any other place, they will be sold to the officers without adding the transportation. So far as that is concerned, the gentleman is right at last; but I want to call his attention and the attention of the House to something else which he seems entirely to overlook. Does the gentleman believe that the bill before the House, with the proposed amendments, changes this feature of the law; that in consequence of any provision in this bill officers will not be allowed to purchase rations of the Government on precisely the same terms as heretofore? If he does, he is, I think, as much in error as he has been respecting the existing law on this subject.

The bill before the House provides that "instead of pay, allowances, and emoluments, of every kind except as hereinafter provided, the following shall be the yearly compensation of all officers of the Army," &c. It makes no provision affecting directly or indirectly the right of an officer to purchase from the Government. On the contrary, pass this bill—and on this point let me assure the House that I cannot be mistaken—pass this bill, and the officer has the right, stationed at Fort Bridger, to purchase subsistence of the commissary department at the cost price, not including transportation. I want to have the gentleman indicate, when his time comes to speak again, how the law now in force in this respect has any advantage over the bill which the committee ask us to pass.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I have in my hand a communication from the Paymaster General of the Army, and appended to it is an article which seems to have come from Paymaster General Towson in 1826. I do not know anything against this article except it be its age. I find the following:

"When the difficulty of procuring provisions does not exist the rations are commuted at twenty cents each, [they are now thirty, which amounts to the same as allowing a specific sum. The option to commute is with the officer.]"

That was the law in 1826. What I rose for was to ask the gentleman—for I desire information on this point—when the law was altered so as to take away from the officer the option of drawing rations or commuting them at the sum which the Government established.

Mr. PAINE. I never knew anything about the law regulating the subsistence department of the United States before the commencement of this war. I knew very little about it, of course, in 1826, and cannot therefore answer the gentleman's question. I can give the gentleman, however, a little second-hand information this moment received from the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUMONT,] who tells me that he served as an officer in the Mexican war and knows that the law was then, seventeen years ago, what it now is.

Now, I come to the subject of forage, which I will consider before fuel and quarters. Forage is required for mounted officers only. There is an amendment pending before this House which certainly should be incorporated into this bill giving mounted officers forage for their horses. I would be opposed to the passage of this bill without such an amendment as that. I cannot by any possibility differ with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] or the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] on that subject. But when those gentlemen say that in adopting an amendment of that kind as a portion of this bill you yield the whole principle which underlies it, I am compelled to deny the assertion. Why, Mr. Speaker, we could not conveniently embrace this subject of forage in a general provision for the whole Army because it concerns only mounted officers.

But, sir, there is one other item of the officer's pay which should go into the same category with subsistence, and be disposed of by a provision similar to that which now regulates the sale of commissary stores to officers. I now come to that. It is the item of fuel. The gentleman from Maine seems to me to have misunderstood the law now in force relating to this subject of fuel. He seems to me to be of the opinion that an officer stationed at Fort Bridger could, if he saw fit, draw commutation for fuel, at $100 per cord, and that this is a substantial reason for regarding the law now in force as preferable to the bill before the House.

Why, Mr. Speaker, an officer stationed at Fort Bridger can by no possibility draw commutation of fuel; the law permits no such thing. There is but one case in which an officer can, under these Army regulations, draw commutation of fuel. When an officer is separated from troops, when he is stationed at a post where he does not serve with troops, he can receive commutation for quarters, provided public quarters cannot be furnished him by the Government; but if he serves with troops, or if serving away from troops he can be furnished by the Government with public quarters, then he draws no commutation of quarters, and in precisely the same case he can draw commutation of fuel, and in no other case. If there be any doubt about it I can read the letter of the law. But I trust that my statement in this regard will be taken for true. If, however, any gentleman desires to hear the law read I will read it.

Now, no officers at Fort Bridger could, by any human possibility, draw commutation of fuel or quarters, and for this obvious reason, that no officers could be stationed at Fort Bridger without serving with troops. It is one of those posts where troops are necessarily used, and would be worthless without them.

Mr. Speaker, I think there should be a provision in this bill on the subject of fuel, and I have prepared an amendment on that subject which I shall submit to the House. I think it will remove every possible objection to the bill now before us growing out of this question of fuel. I ask the Clerk to read it now for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the amendment already adopted by the House in relation to forage, the following: "Officers may purchase from the quartermaster's department the amount of fuel prescribed in section ten hundred and sixty-eight, article forty-seven, of the Army Regulations of 1861, on their certificate that it is for their own use, paying cash therefor on delivery, at cost price, not including the cost of transportation incurred after purchase by the quartermaster's department; and nothing in this act contained shall affect the right of officers to use without charge public barracks, or quarters, or buildings hired for their use in accordance with the laws and regulations now in force."

Mr. PAINE. I will also send to the Clerk's desk to be read for the information of the House an amendment prepared by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WASHBURN] who is absent from the House, and has requested me to present it. It relates to the same subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the officers of the Army may purchase of quartermasters and commissaries of subsistence the same amount of rations and fuel to which they are now entitled by law at a uniform price fixed by the Secretary of War, not to exceed the average actual cost of the same to the Government, exclusive of transportation: Provided, That said officers shall at the time of the purchase certify that the same is for their own use.

Mr. PAINE. I have thus shown that so far as all the items of an officer's pay are concerned, under the law now in force, except only the items of fuel, quarters, and forage, that law is no better for the officer than is this bill, as originally introduced by the committee; that it is no more adaptable to the varying circumstances in which the officer may find himself placed than was this bill. On those points amendments are offered which, if adopted, will, I believe, make the proposed bill perfectly just and fair and equal in its operations throughout all the United States.

I now propose to call the attention of the House to the injustice of the measure which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] advocate so earnestly. They complain here to us that we are about to take away from our Army officers some rights which have become vested by long usage, by a long-existing law; they complain that we are about to do injustice to a portion of the Army. Now, it is a matter of amazement to me that those gentlemen have forgotten who it is that this bill aims to benefit. It is amazing to me that they should have forgotten so utterly, should have so utterly ignored those officers serving with troops in the field, who are entitled to the consideration of this House, I will not say more than, but I will say as much as, the officers who are on duty in the bureaus in this city or at posts in other cities.

The law as it now stands gives to a brigadier general serving with troops in the field, enduring all the hardships of a campaign, and braving all the dangers of the service, a compensation of $3,978 50, including everything, forage and all. But if he should be stationed in the city of Washington he would receive $5,355 50.

Now, we propose to raise the pay of those officers who are serving their country in the field, and gentlemen oppose it. Why do they oppose it? It is a matter of justice; I know it to be a simple matter of justice. I know that the officer who serves with troops in the field is and has been inadequately paid. I know that during this war, taking into consideration the depreciation in value of our currency, the pay of an officer in the field has been but a beggarly compensation. And yet gentlemen resist, with all their might, the passage of a bill which proposes to raise the pay of these poorly paid officers who serve in the field.

It is with colonels, lieutenant colonels, and majors, and all officers of the line, as with brigadier generals. For example, a colonel of infantry in the field receives for his compensation, including forage, only $2,520. And yet when on service in Washington a colonel of infantry receives $3,897. A lieutenant colonel of infantry in the field receives, including forage, $2,456; in Washington he receives $3,565 50. A major of infantry in the field receives $2,148; in Washington he receives $3,277 50.

Now, I want to know why it is that gentlemen have so violently opposed this bill which does an act of such manifest justice to these men who are serving their country in that hardest sphere of military duty, in the field itself. The only reason seems to be an apprehension that it will in some way reduce the pay of a certain other class of officers.

Now, I admit that it will have that effect. I admit that it will take off a small amount from the pay, for instance, of a brigadier general stationed in Washington. Instead of receiving $5,355, as now, he will, if this bill becomes a law, receive, exclusive of forage, $5,000; including forage, $5,384. A colonel's pay will be reduced from $3,897 to $3,192; a lieutenant colonel's pay from $3,565 50 to $2,792, and a major's pay from $3,277 50 to $2,692. And while I am sorry to see those officers, many of whom are among the very best in the Army, deprived of any emoluments to which they have been accustomed, I cannot resist the force of that argument by which it is maintained that the officers who serve in the field are entitled to at least equal pay with those who serve in bureaus and in cities. Nor can I for a moment doubt the policy of giving such encouragement to field service. The country and the Army must gain by the change. It is complained that if this bill goes into effect the pay of officers in Washington and at other expensive localities will be so reduced as to become inadequate. Mr. Speaker, the pay of a Senator in Washington is $3,000. A brigadier general now receives $5,355 50. A colonel of infantry receives $3,897; a lieutenant colonel of infantry, $3,565 50; a major of infantry, $3,277 50.

Sir, there will be but three grades of officers in the whole service, even after this bill is passed, who will receive compensation materially less than that of the members of this House. The general, the lieutenant general, the major general, the brigadier general, the colonels, the lieutenant colonels, and the majors will all receive either a greater compensation or a compensation in the cases of lieutenant colonel and major only two or three hundred dollars less than that of the members of this House or of the Senate. Sir, I see no good reason for complaining very bitterly of a bill which makes provisions like these.

But, sir, an order from the Secretary of the Navy has been introduced here by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and is expected to have a bearing upon the question now before the House. It appears from this order that the law which prohibited any allowance to officers in the Navy "for rent of quarters, or for pay rent for furniture, or for lights or fuel," &c., has been repealed. Now, what does the Secretary of the Navy, whose example is commended to us by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, do when this law is repealed? Does he issue an order corresponding substantially to the present regulations of the Army respecting fuel, forage, and quarters? Not at all. He condemns in express language the provisions which are observed in the Army, and refuses to adopt them. He says:

"The Department, in order to prevent a recurrence of the irregularities, abuses, and arbitrary allowances which occasioned the prohibition, deems it proper to establish a fixed rate of compensation in lieu of the extra allowances which were prohibited by the law now repealed."

Why, sir, the first thing that the Secretary of the Navy does, after the repeal of the law gives him power to do anything on the subject, is to sweep away this expanding and contracting system which these gentlemen seem so much to admire, and to fix a uniform rate of compensation in lieu of allowances, to wit, thirty-three and a third per cent. on the pay of the officers, a rate of compensation for all latitudes and all longitudes. I have nothing to say as to the propriety of this arrangement; I have nothing here to say as to the propriety of the repeal of that law, except that I heartily rejoice that justice has at last been done to these noble sailors; but I do say that the example of the Secretary of the Navy, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania commends to us as worthy of our imitation, condemns, in language which cannot be mistaken, the very provision which he so strenuously advocates. The Secretary in this order adopts the principle of the bill before us. He allows a fixed compensation in lieu of commutation of quarters, fuel, &c. His order is a singular argument to urge against the measure proposed by the committee.

Now, sir, there are reasons very palpable to my mind why this pay system so unequal and so unjust has so long continued the law of the country; and the reason is by no means that which has been suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Sir, the fact that a system, a law has continued in existence for a long period of time is no proof to me that it is wise or just. Sir, flagrant abuses sometimes exist for long periods of time. In the history of the world it has been no less common for burdensome, unjust, and oppressive laws to exist un repealed through generations and centuries, than for wholesome, righteous, equal laws to continue long in force.

I believe that any fair and candid man will be able to see, in the circumstances of the case, the reason why this law has stood un repealed so long. Those reasons have been indicated by the gentleman from Ohio. The very men who have been interested in the permanence of this system have been the men who have every day had the ear of Senators and Representatives in this Capitol. Whenever the interests of officers stationed at Washington are to be touched by any proposed measure, we see honorable gentlemen prompt to rise to vindicate those officers and defend them from all assaults.

Sir, in former times instead of a half dozen of the members rising as now, a hundred were always ready to spring to their feet in this House when any measure was proposed which might possibly affect the interests of officers stationed in Washington. In saying this I make no complaint against these officers, for as I have already said I entertain for them the highest respect. They have not acted dishonorably in this. They were on the ground. They were connected with the executive government, and much of its patronage was dispensed through their hands. They knew every move in this House and in the Senate. They knew what appliances to bring to bear. They knew what to say and do on this floor and in the lobby.

But, sir, officers in the field and at distant posts have not been heard here. They could not be heard. If they came into our lobbies they would have no dispensing power in the executive government to give weight to their words and wishes. I see very clearly a reason for the long continuance of this system of pay for the Army. If this war had not broken out; if there had not been a large increase of the Army; if after the war gentlemen had not come into this House who by practical experience were cognizant of the inequalities in this system the committee might never have brought forward the measure before us. But for this, there might have been a hundred like the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the gentleman from Maine, and the gentleman from Vermont springing up in every part of this House to protest against the infliction of a wrong upon these worthy officers. Sir, they have no warmer friend than I am. There is no man less disposed to do them harm; but I think it high time that the men who met the bayonets and bullets of the enemy had advocates and defenders on this floor.

I am sorry to hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Maine speak in condemnation of this law which proposes to give to them the justice so long withheld. I trust, tardy though it be, it will come at last. I declare my opinion that the bill now before the House is in its provisions more nearly just than the one it proposes to replace. It proposes to do equal and exact justice to all. It is just to those who serve with troops. It is not unjust to those who serve without them. I hope it may be amended as I have proposed, and become a part of the law of the land.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE obtained the floor.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 208) to protect American citizens engaged in lumbering on the St. Croix river, in the State of Maine; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 92) authorizing the appointment of examiners to examine a site for a fresh-water basin for iron-clad vessels of the United States Navy.

Mr. SCHENCK moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And then (at ten minutes to four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday next.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. DAWES: The remonstrance of Samuel Fay, and others, of Massachusetts, against the extension of the burring-machine patent.

By Mr. HALE: The petition of James Smith, and 91 others, citizens of Willsboro, Essex county, New York, for protection to American wool-growers.

By Mr. JULIAN: The petition of Major George H. Bonebrake, praying relief for money stolen from him while in the military service of the United States.

By Mr. MOORHEAD: The petition of citizens of Alleghany county, Pennsylvania, asking for protection to home against foreign labor.

By Mr. MOULTON: The petition of 50 citizens of Pana, Illinois, praying that Congress will enact just and equal laws for the regulation of inter-State insurances of all kinds.

By Mr. MYERS: The petition of Lewis Ladamus and William P. Ellison, of Philadelphia, representing the estate of John Moore, deceased, owners of square No. 760 East Capitol street, between Second and Third streets, Washington, District of Columbia, occupied by the Government since 1831, asking Congress for the passage of an act to pay them rent for the same.

By Mr. UPSON: The petition of Drusilla Churchill, and others, of St. Joseph county, Michigan, praying for an increase of the pensions to the widows, mothers, and orphans of soldiers who have fallen in defense of their country.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, June 4, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication of the Postmaster General, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 23d of February last, information relative to the establishment of a telegraph in connection with the postal system; which, on motion of Mr. SHERMAN, was referred to the select committee on that subject and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN presented a petition of merchants, underwriters, and others, of New York city, praying for the passage of an act making an appropriation to defray the expense of building suitable warehouses in the port of New York for the reception of infected goods and merchandise; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Rufus H. King, and others, bankers of the city of Albany, New York, praying for the repeal or extension of the act of Congress, imposing a tax of ten per cent. on State bank circulation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the boot and shoe makers of the city of New York, praying for the abolition of the tax on their trade; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of Charleston, South Carolina, remonstrating against the passage of the bankrupt bill lately passed by the House of Representatives, as such a bill, in the opinion of the petitioners, if passed into a law will be highly detrimental to the interests of the people of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOWE. I present a memorial very largely signed by citizens and corporators of Georgetown, in this District, remonstrating against the passage of "A bill in addition to the several acts establishing the temporary and permanent seat of the Government of the United States, and to resume the legislative powers delegated to the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and the levy court of the District of Columbia." I believe that bill has been reported; I move, therefore, that the memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a memorial of the executive board of the Western Freedmen's Aid Commission, praying for an appropriation to aid in the construction of school-houses, &c., for the education of the freedmen. As this subject is now pending in the Committee on Finance, I move its reference to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY presented the memorial of William J. Sibley and others, trustees for a certain lot in square seventy, in the city of Washington, conveyed to them by J. H. McBlair, for the purpose of erecting thereon a house of worship, praying for the passage of an act authorizing them to sell the same and invest the proceeds in the improvement of their present place of worship; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRIS. I present the petition of the Commercial Navigation Company of the State of New York, a corporation chartered by special law of that State, praying for the passage of an act to provide for the conveyance of foreign and European mails to the United States of America between New York and Liverpool, touching at Queenstown, by steamships constructed, owned, and officered by American citizens. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COWAN presented the petition of William Varum, R. H. Ray, and others, praying that Congress will promptly pass such a tariff as will protect national industry, replenish the national Treasury, and develop our vast national resources; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer a petition numerously signed by citizens of Massachusetts in which they ask Congress to enact the following:

Resolved, That throughout the United States and its Territories the right of suffrage and all other equalities and humanities shall henceforth be extended alike to those of all races and complexions; or denied only to those who would usurp the rights and liberties of others.

As this subject is now under discussion, I move that this petition lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the petition of Myles Doran, of the fourteenth regiment Michigan volunteers, praying that he may be allowed the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant from the 3d day of February, 1865, to the 18th day of July, 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 273) to authorize the President to convey to William P. Rogers and his associates the island of Yerba Buena, or Goat Island, in the harbor of San Francisco, have directed me to report adversely thereon. I move its indefinite postponement.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, also, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 287) to provide for the construction of a wagon road from Boise City, in the Territory of Idaho, to Sasanville, in California, reported it without amendment.

PATENT EXAMINERS.

Mr. COWAN. I beg leave to report, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, a bill (S. No. 350) to authorize the Commissioner of Patents to pay those employed as examiners and assistant examiners the salary fixed by law for the duties performed by them; and I ask that it be put on its passage. I do not know that it will lead to any debate or difficulty. It is a matter of some consequence to those concerned.

There being no objection, the bill was read twice and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Commissioner of Patents to pay those employed in the Patent Office from April 1, 1861, until August 1, 1865, as examiners and assistant examiners of patents, at the rates fixed by law for those respective grades. The money is to be paid out of the Patent Office fund, and the compensation thus paid is not to exceed that received by those duly enrolled as examiners and assistant examiners of patents for the same period.

Mr. COWAN. I have simply a word to say by way of explanation of the bill. It appears that in 1861 the Commissioner of Patents found it necessary, as he supposed, to reduce the salary of the examiners and the assistant examiners, owing to the pressure upon the funds of the Department at that time. Those funds, however, have now accumulated, owing to the increased business of the office, and I think he has perhaps $75,000 of a surplus on hand.

Mr. WILSON. Over $100,000.

Mr. COWAN. Perhaps it may be. I understood it was $75,000. It is now proposed to pay the examiners and assistant examiners the salaries which had been before fixed by law to be paid them, and that the amount be paid out of this fund. I think it is eminently just.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does it increase the salaries?

Mr. COWAN. Their salaries were reduced in 1861, and they are now to be paid the sum they would have got if there had been no reduction.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does it go back?

Mr. COWAN. It goes back to 1861. I think it is eminently just and proper, and the committee were of that opinion and reported this bill, and I hope there will be no objection to it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RAILROADS TO THE WEST.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a memorial of citizens of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of a law authorizing the Cleveland and Mahoning Railroad Company to extend its road from the west line of the State of Pennsylvania to the city of Pittsburg, have directed me to report it back and ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and to move its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations, who have now the charge of that subject.

Mr. COWAN. I think that is a very singular reference—to refer a railroad matter to the Committee on Foreign Relations! I am afraid my friend from Michigan is jesting.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am merely following the precedent set by the Senate on Thursday last.

Mr. COWAN. If the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations desires to take cognizance of such things, though utterly foreign to the institution itself, I have no objection, of course.

Mr. SUMNER. I am not aware of the subject to which the Senator refers. I did not hear the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COWAN. It was to refer a matter relative to the construction of a railroad from the Cleveland and Mahoning railroad to the city of Pittsburg, in Pennsylvania, to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SUMNER. I must protest against that being referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I think it would be a great enlargement and expansion of the jurisdiction of that committee.

Mr. COWAN. I move that the memorial be laid upon the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. These railroad matters ought to be referred to some committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. A bill from the House of Representatives on this very subject was last week referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I supposed that in making this motion I was simply following that precedent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion now is that this memorial be laid on the table. That motion is not debatable.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the other bills were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is not now in order, the pending motion being to lay this memorial on the table, and that motion is not debatable.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move to reconsider the reference of these railroad bills to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SUMNER. What were the bills?

Mr. SHERMAN. The two bills which passed the House of Representatives providing for the construction of railroads, and which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SUMNER. Railroads between what points?

Mr. SHERMAN. One bill was for a railroad between Pittsburg and Cleveland, and the other to secure railroad communication between here and Pittsburg and the Northwest. They were probably referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations under a misapprehension. I move to reconsider that reference, so that they may go to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion now is to reconsider the vote of the Senate by which the bill (H. R. No. 527) to promote the construction of a line of railroads between the city of Washington and the Northwest for national purposes, and the bill (H. R. No. 537) to promote the construction of a line of railroad from Pittsburg, in Pennsylvania, to Cleveland, in Ohio, were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Chair will put the question on both bills together if there be no objection.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move that those two bills be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

LIEUTENANT COMMANDER R. L. LAW.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Lieutenant Commander Richard L. Law, praying to be restored to the active list of his rank, have directed a resolution to be reported for his relief, and as it is a formal matter, I ask for its consideration now.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 100) for the restoration of Lieutenant Commander Richard L. Law, United States Navy, to the active list from the reserved list was read twice, and by unanimous consent considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the President to nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint, Lieutenant Commander Richard L. Law to the active list of the Navy.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs suggests to me that I ought to add the words "and to restore him to his original rank." I move this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 101) directing the removal of certain obstructions from the public square known as Market square in the city of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

APPROVAL OF BILLS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. COOPER, his Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed, on the 2d instant, the following acts and joint resolutions:

An act (S. No. 167) to incorporate the Women's Hospital Association of the District of Columbia;

An act (S. No. 184) to define more clearly the jurisdiction and powers of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

An act (S. No. 208) to protect American citizens engaged in lumbering on the St. Croix river, in the State of Maine; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 92) authorizing the appointment of examiners to examine a site for a fresh-water basin for iron-clad vessels of the United States Navy.

CLERKS OF INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In behalf of the special committee, to whom was referred the subject-matter of the reorganization of the clerical force of the Department of the Interior, I am instructed to ask the Senate to take up that bill for consideration at the present time. It is Senate bill No. 282; I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 282) to reorganize the clerical force of the Department of the Interior, and for other purposes, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that from and after the commencement of the next fiscal year the clerical force in the office of the Secretary of the Interior and in the several bureaus of the Department of the Interior shall be as follows:

In the office of the Secretary: one chief clerk, one disbursing agent, who is to be ex officio superintendent of the Patent Office building, at a compensation of $2,500 per annum; one clerk on public lands, one clerk on Indian affairs, one clerk on pensions, one clerk on the judiciary, at a compensation of $2,000 each per annum; three clerks, at $1,800 each per annum; four clerks, at $1,600 each per annum; and four clerks, at $1,400 each per annum.

In the General Land Office: one chief clerk, ten clerks in charge of divisions, at $2,000 each per annum; ten assistants to such clerks, at $1,800 each per annum; forty clerks, at $1,600 each per annum; fifty clerks, at $1,400 each per annum; thirty clerks, at $1,200 each per annum.

In the Indian Office: one chief clerk, three clerks in charge of divisions, at an annual compensation of $2,000 each; six clerks, at an annual compensation of $1,800 each; eleven clerks, at an annual compensation of $1,600 each; eight clerks, at an annual compensation of $1,400 each; and five clerks, at an annual compensation of $1,200 each.

In the Pension Office: one chief clerk, three clerks in charge of divisions, at an annual compensation of $2,000 each; twenty clerks, at an annual compensation of $1,800 each; fifty clerks at an annual compensation of $1,600 each; fifty-two clerks, at an annual compensation of $1,400 each; and twenty-two clerks, at an annual compensation of $1,200 each.

In the Patent Office: In addition to the clerks and employes authorized by existing laws, four primary, four first assistant, and four second assistant examiners; and the annual salaries of the first assistant examiners shall, from and after the commencement of the next fiscal year, be $2,000 each; the salary of the librarian, $2,500 per annum, which shall be in full for all his services as librarian and translator.

The compensation of the messengers, assistant messengers, laborers, and watchmen in the Department of the Interior and its several bureaus and offices is to be the same as it now is under the operation of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1865, and for other purposes," approved June 25, 1864.

The Secretary of the Interior is to appoint all the clerks and other employes mentioned in this act, except such as are by law appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. In the temporary absence of the head of either of the bureaus, his duties are to devolve upon and be performed by the chief clerk, unless the President shall see proper to appoint another person for that purpose.

From and after the commencement of the next fiscal year, the compensation of the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, and that of the heads of the bureaus of the Department of the Interior is to be the same as that now allowed by law to the Commissioner of Patents; that of the chief clerk of the Department of the Interior $2,500 per annum, and that of the chief clerks of the bureaus each $2,250 per annum.

The sums which may be necessary to carry into effect the several provisions of this act during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, are to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, except so far as they relate to the Patent Office, in which case they are to be paid from the patent fund.

The select committee to whom the bill was referred reported it with several amendments. The first amendment was in section one, lines thirty-three and thirty-four, to strike out the words "three clerks in charge of divisions at an annual compensation of $2,000 each" and to insert "there shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, for the Pension Office, five heads of divisions, each of whom shall be allowed a salary of $2,000 per annum; twenty clerks at an annual compensation of $1,800 each, &c."

In the Pension Office: one chief clerk; there shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior for the Pension Office five heads of divisions, each of whom shall be allowed a salary of $2,000 per annum; twenty clerks at an annual compensation of $1,800 each, &c.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. By striking out the word "three" in line thirty-three and inserting the word "five" in the bill as it stood originally, the effect would be the same, and it would be more in harmony with the other sections of the bill. It would then read, "one chief clerk and five clerks in charge of divisions, at an annual compensation of $2,000 each," instead of three, as reported in the original bill. I will state that the special committee appointed on this subject had before them the heads of these several bureaus; and on consultation with them and ascertaining the condition of affairs in the Pension Office we became satisfied that there are five important divisions in the Pension Office, at the head of which there ought to be a man of sufficient capacity to take charge of the division, instead of three. The Commissioner of Pensions was decidedly of that opinion, and certainly we were, after hearing him at length on that subject. We have no doubt that it is one of the most important bureaus in the Government. It has charge of all questions relating to pensions, deciding who shall have them and who are not entitled to them. I will state that on the subject of the salaries mentioned in this bill there is a printed statement accompanying the bill, giving a comparison of the salaries as they now stand, and as they will be under this bill. Some of the salaries are raised, but the whole amount of expenditure is no greater.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment reported by the committee as amended.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The amendment that I proposed was an amendment to the original bill as it stood, waiving the amendment proposed by the committee. The effect is precisely the same by inserting "five" instead of "three" in line thirty-three in the bill as it stood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the amendment reported by the committee will be considered as disagreed to; and the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the bill, instead of to the amendment, will be considered as adopted.

The next amendment was to strike out after the enacting clause of the second section the following:

That the compensation of the messengers, assistant messengers, laborers and watchmen in the Department of the Interior and the several bureaus and offices thereof shall be the same as it now is under the operation of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1865, and for other purposes," approved June 25, 1864.

And to insert in lieu thereof—

That there shall be authorized to be employed in the Department of the Interior in the several bureaus thereof the following named employes, namely: In the General Land Office: one messenger at $1,000 per annum; four messengers at $840 each per annum; eight watchmen at $720 each per annum; nine laborers at $720 each per annum; and two packers at $720 each per annum. In the Pension Bureau: one chief messenger at $1,000 per annum; five assistant messengers at $840 each per annum; six laborers at $720 each per annum; and one watchman at $720 per annum. In the Indian Bureau: one messenger-in-chief at $1,000 per annum; two watchmen at $720 each per annum; and two laborers at $720 each per annum.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This amendment does not change the law as it now stands. The idea of the committee was that as this was a bill to reorganize the Department of the Interior, we should specify in it the number of messengers that are now provided by law and their salaries, so that it should all appear in the same bill, and then there would be no difficulty in turning to the bill to ascertain precisely what they are without looking at other statutes on the subject. This morning the Assistant Secretary of the Interior called on me in relation to this amendment, and stated the fact that in specifying these officers in the amendment the committee had omitted to specify the messengers of the Department proper. The messengers, laborers, &c., here specified are the messengers and laborers of the various bureaus. I therefore move, in order to supply the deficiency, to insert after line twelve in the amendment on the fourth page, the following:

In the Secretary's office: one chief messenger at $1,000 per annum; two assistant messengers at $840 per annum; three laborers and thirteen watchmen at $720 each per annum.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There are one or two verbal amendments necessary. In the present stage of the session the bill may not pass the other House before the 30th of June. It is necessary to make it apply to the coming fiscal year. I move in line three of the first section on the first page to strike out "next" before the words "fiscal year" and insert after the word "year" the words "ending June 30, 1867."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that all the amendments reported by the committee are not yet acted upon. Perhaps it would be better to conclude them before offering other amendments.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Very well. I supposed those amendments were through with.

The next amendment reported by the committee was in section four, lines four, five, and six, to strike out "shall be the same as that now allowed by law to the Commissioner of Patents," and to insert "namely, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the Commissioner of Pensions, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall be $4,000 each per annum;" so that the clause will read:

That from and after the commencement of the next fiscal year, the compensation of the Assistant Secretary of the Interior and that of the heads of the bureaus of the Department of the Interior, namely, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the Commissioner of Pensions, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall be $4,000 each per annum.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This is the amendment which raises the salaries of the heads of these bureaus. The committee were unanimously of opinion that it ought to be done. The head of the General Land Office is one of the most important officers in the Government. He is constantly passing upon legal questions, deciding titles to land, and is as important an officer as one of the judges, I may say, of the Supreme Court. Then the Commissioner of Pensions is one of the most important officers also, and very great and grave questions are constantly coming before him; and I think to a man who is capable of properly discharging that duty we ought to give at least $4,000 a year; and the same may be said also of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs: the amount of business which is thrown upon the head of that bureau is very great, especially in the development of the western Territories which have brought us into contact with all the Indian tribes. The business of the bureau proper has increased at least threefold within the last six years.

Mr. President, I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate in arguing the question, but it was the unanimous judgment of the committee that we ought to put the salaries at this amount.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not object to raising these salaries to that amount, if that is the judgment of the Senate, and I do not rise for that purpose; but I want to notify my friend that the inevitable result will be to raise the salaries of all the heads of bureaus and all the Assistant Secretaries.

Mr. WILSON. What are they now?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Three thousand five hundred dollars, I think.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Three thousand dollars in the Interior Department.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin, if it is so necessary to raise the salaries of these gentlemen who are now getting $3,000 to $4,000, why is it that you propose in this bill for poor men who are provided for salaries of $720, men who have families to support as well as these high-salaried officers, whose services are important to the Government, I take it, or else we should not employ them? It seems to me there is rather too great a disparity between the lower class of officers and the higher class.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The truth is that to men who are capable of discharging these high duties, if the Government would retain them in its employ, it must pay them sufficient for them to live respectably with their families. We know that in the case of watchmen and laborers there is a sufficiently large compensation paid to them compared with what is paid to the same class of persons in other employments throughout the country. In answer to my friend from Maine, I say most distinctly that in reference to all the heads of bureaus in all the Departments, I have no objection, indeed I would favor putting their salaries at $4,000 a year. I think it ought to be done. On the subject of the salaries of the clerks which are provided for in this bill, I will say that the salaries of some of the heads of divisions are raised. The head of the Department told the committee that he supposed that in the Land Office, since the present Commissioner has been there, there has been an almost entire change of the clerical force three times, because when a man got into the Department and got sufficiently accustomed to its duties in the Land Office, he was a man who could command a much higher salary outside of the Department; he had only to resign in the Department and go into other employment; and the best clerks, the most efficient clerks, were being taken constantly out of the Department, and therefore the necessity of giving some higher compensation to the chiefs of divisions. While the bill does this, the whole compensation paid to the clerical force of the Department of the Interior, as will appear by the printed statement before the Senate, is not increased, but it is lessened by some twelve thousand dollars. In the Department proper, the number actually employed or authorized by law now is seventeen, with an aggregate compensation of $25,900. The number proposed is sixteen, at an aggregate compensation of $27,900. There is an increase. In the General Land Office there are one hundred and fifty-five actually employed or authorized by law, at an aggregate compensation of $208,600. The number proposed to be employed is one hundred and forty, with an aggregate compensation of $208,000—a decrease of $600. In the Indian Office the number actually employed or authorized by law is thirty-three, with an aggregate compensation of $45,500. The number proposed is thirty-three, with an aggregate compensation of $51,600. There is an increase. In the Pension Office the number actually employed or authorized by law is one hundred and seventy-seven, with an aggregate compensation of $242,000. The number proposed is one hundred and forty-seven, with an aggregate compensation of $221,200—a decrease of nearly twenty-one thousand dollars. The number is decreased and the Commissioner of Pensions is enabled to employ men of greater capacity at higher salaries and competent to perform more service.

Mr. GRIMES. Will he not employ the same men he does now?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. He will employ some of the same men undoubtedly; but he employs now one hundred and seventy-seven, and the bill proposes to allow him to employ but one hundred and forty-seven. Some men are capable of performing more services than three other men. There is this difficulty: if a man not accustomed to the business in the Land Office or the Pension Office makes a mistake, a blunder, it costs two or three clerks of capacity a long time before they can correct it; therefore the necessity of keeping experienced clerks in these offices. This was the reason which was urged upon us by the head of the Department, and I have no doubt it is well founded.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think there is a very considerable degree of correctness in what has been said by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin. My experience and observation have shown me that there are faults in the system which if they could be corrected we should get along very much better and cheaper. I think it is a great mistake that we expect to get valuable services from able men in places where we ought to have able men for a compensation that will not support them comfortably well in this city. I know that in the Treasury Department it has been exceedingly difficult to keep men who were competent to render the services required. In the position of fourth-class clerks services are demanded that require the ability of men who can command out of the Department a salary of $3,000 readily, and while I was there men of that description were resigning at the rate of six or seven a week. As soon as they got well taught, well understood their duties, and showed their capacity and their integrity, some national bank or some other institution would take them out of our hands by an offer of a much larger salary. That ought to be remedied, in my judgment, in all the Departments. I cannot undertake to say how much ought to be given, but there is no reason why the Government requiring the services of such men in considerable numbers—for they are absolutely requisite—should not pay what others pay elsewhere for the same kind of services. Otherwise we shall not have the men; they will leave.

There is no sort of difficulty in getting any number of first-class clerks; and, perhaps, of second-class clerks in the Departments at the rates that we pay. There are thousands of young men always standing ready to take positions of that description, and the services that are required of them being mostly copying, being services which require but a small degree of ability, comparatively, are such as almost anybody tolerably well educated can render. But it is not so with the higher classes of clerks, the heads of divisions, the chief clerks, the book-keepers. In the Internal Revenue Bureau, for example, a very high order of ability is required of these officers for many purposes; and so in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency. And in several other offices it is exceedingly difficult to get along for the want of sufficient salaries for that class of men.

Now, sir, I have no doubt that if you would give any Secretary at the head of a Department in this city, who was an honest and capable man, two thirds of the amount that you appropriate annually for the payment of clerks in his Department, and tell him to expend it at his own discretion and carry on the business, he would be able to do the business better for that amount of money than he does it now, because you would then leave the selection of the men to him, and he would pay them according to their merits, what they earned and what the necessities of the case required. But there is one thing that stands directly in the way of all this; and that is that Congress undertakes to regulate this matter. In the first place, we said, and the President said, "You must appoint soldiers." Soldiers are very well if they are capable, and if they have been disabled they are men who ought to have the preference, perhaps, over others, in being appointed clerks; but in the anxiety to get disabled soldiers in the Departments, and in the anxiety of members to have them appointed, following out what seems to be the public sentiment, the result has been that the business of the Departments has been embarrassed by having a good many incompetent clerks; and still it is insisted, and loudly insisted, in the newspapers and elsewhere, that trained clerks, who understand the business of the Departments, should be turned out for the purpose of giving their places to those who have been fighting our battles. The principle is well enough; but the practice, to the extent to which it is claimed that it ought to be carried, would be utterly destructive to the business of the Departments.

Another thing: every member of Congress solicits the Departments for appointments, or pretty much every one; there may be exceptions. I know that I have been obliged to do it, and other members have felt obliged to do it; and having been in a Department, I know that the public interests suffer from it. A clerk is removed for incompetency or some other cause; somebody comes and says, "It will not do to remove that man; he is a very important man in my district; he makes capital speeches; we cannot dispense with him; he has a great many connections, and important connections; and he must be put back again;" and he is put back. When I was in the Department I made it a rule in reference to soldiers, that if a man came in with one leg or one arm, that should be a sufficient recommendation, provided he could get along at all; I appointed him and gave him time to learn; but it created very considerable embarrassment. That, however, is a trifle compared to the solicitations that come from Senators and Representatives and their interference with the business of the Departments. The result is that we get more than are necessary, or more than would be necessary if attention was paid to the ability and capacity of those employed in the different grades.

If we have these difficulties they are owing to ourselves in a very great degree, more than to the heads of Departments or to anybody connected with the Departments. I do not know of anybody in Congress who is free from the objection I have stated, to a certain extent. I know members are not always willing to do it, but they are compelled to do it, or think they are.

Mr. GRIMES. I have not done it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There may be gentlemen whose backs are stiff enough to enable them to refuse to interfere in this matter, but the number is not great. Of course I shall not insist against the disclaimer by any gentleman of what may be his own particular practice; but I think the practice is very general, and perhaps it is unavoidable. It has grown up in the course of time, as a matter, perhaps, of necessity, from the disposition of the Departments to divide their appointments among the States so far as they could possibly do so, and to accommodate members by having all the districts represented in the Departments. It seems to be no more than fair and right that it should be so; but the difficulty is that it is carried too far. One day I removed a man in the Treasury Department because he was utterly unfit; he could not write without blotting his paper all over, and he could not make up accounts at all. He was a very clever old gentleman, but utterly useless for any purpose in the Department. In the course of three or four days after his removal I had a petition signed by twenty members of Congress to put him back again.

Mr. SUMNER. What did you do about it?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I refused. I would not put him back again although I could not help feeling for him. He was a clever old gentleman who did not seem to be fit to do anything; he could not get a living anyhow unless he got it there; but I could not see why he should have it out of the Government when he could not render any service. This is but an illustration.

I take as much blame to myself as anybody can for this interference by members of Congress. I do not impute anything to anybody else that I am not willing to take my share of. If we kept our hands off these matters, and paid competent salaries to competent men, leaving the Departments free to act as they thought proper, we should get along much better than we do; I believe we should save money and have the affairs of the Government better conducted. In fact it would not require so many hands as it does now.

We need not talk so much about this high salary business. These salaries are, as the times go, very low. Men are hardly able to scratch along with the salaries they get, under the expenses they are subjected to in this city; and although some of them are paid very low, yet, of course, in all times and in all places and in all business, men are paid according to the nature of the services required of them and what they can earn elsewhere. That must be the rule, and although many of the messengers in the Departments receive but $720 a year, and it is hard to get along on that, yet you can get plenty of others who will perform the services just as well for that sum, and who would be glad to do it; but with regard to the higher classes of clerks, you cannot get them on the salaries now paid, or if you do, when they stay long enough to show their capacity you will lose them. Something has to be done in reference to this matter or we shall not be able to get along.

Mr. HOWARD. I call for the special order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of Thursday, which is House joint resolution No. 127.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I hope the honorable Senator from Michigan will let us come to a vote on the bill before the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. I judge from the character of the bill that it will lead to considerable debate, and I therefore must insist upon calling up the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of Thursday is regularly before the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 216) for the relief of Cordelia Murray;

A bill (H. R. No. 345) for the relief of Christina Elder;

A bill (H. R. No. 363) supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions;

A bill (H. R. No. 462) granting a pension to Mrs. Sally Andrews;

A bill (H. R. No. 493) granting a pension to Mrs. Joanna Winans; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 142) authorizing the Postmaster General to pay additional salary to letter carriers in San Francisco.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 127) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. HOWARD, to insert the following after section three of the proposed article of constitutional amendment:

SEC. 4. The obligations of the United States, incurred in suppressing insurrection, or in defense of the Union, or for payment of bounties or pensions incident thereto, shall remain inviolate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, nothing but a sense of imperative duty induces me to address the Senate upon this occasion. The Constitution is to be changed; the foundations of the Government are to be disturbed; some of the old oak timbers are to be removed, and timber of recent growth is to be substituted. Upon the foundations fixed by the fathers our institutions have rested firmly and securely for three quarters of a century. They have stood unmoved by the contests of ambitious leaders, the angry strife of parties, and the rolling waves of war. In peace and in war; in the turbulence of times of financial embarrassment, and the corruptions attendant upon the accumulation of great wealth; in every possible state and condition of our society, the Constitution has borne the test; and the fact now stands conceded that it established a system of government entirely adapted to our wants and condition as a people. This is proven beyond cavil and question by the prosperity and individual happiness that attended our growth, and the greatness and power to which we attained. The prosperity of the citizen, his security and happiness, and the might and grandeur of the nation attest the excellence of our form of government. The blessings of the past are our guarantee for the future if we but maintain our institutions as they are.

And now, sir, in this the most unsafe period of our history; when the passions excited by the war are yet fierce; when sectional controversies run high, and party strife is raging; when eleven States are absent from this Chamber, and other sections, seizing the opportunity, seek to aggrandize their power, and to fasten upon the country a partial and unequal policy; when the lust for power and gain carries men beyond the restraints of justice and right; at such a time I cannot remain wholly silent when I see the hand of the partisan and the self-constituted reformer laid upon the sacred work of the fathers. In such a case to speak is a man's duty, though none may heed. But, Mr. President, it is hard work to speak when one knows in advance that no argument, however just and forcible, and no appeal, however patriotic, can influence a single vote; that the authority and law of a political party is over every Senator of the majority; and that it remains now only to register the decree of the secret caucus.

At the meeting of Congress, but before the President had delivered his message, and before his views had been officially communicated, the Republican members, in caucus, determined to raise a committee of fifteen to "inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called confederate States of America, and report whether they or any of them are entitled to be represented in either House of Congress." In most indecent haste the resolution passed both branches, and the committee became fastened upon Congress and the country. Because of its party origin, the work it had to do, and the secret character of its proceedings, that committee came to be known in the country as the "revolutionary tribunal," the "directory," and the "star chamber." Its first report was made some months since, in which it was proposed to reduce the representation of the southern States, but by the aid of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] who submits to party restraints upon his judgment with impatience, that measure was defeated. Its second report is now upon our desks. It passed the House, but when it came under discussion in the Senate, and had to bear the test of the independent judgment of Senators, it was found wanting, and its defeat became almost certain. A second defeat of a party programme could not be borne; its effect upon the fall elections would be disastrous. A caucus was called, and we witnessed the astounding spectacle of the withdrawal, for the time, of a great legislative measure, touching the Constitution itself, from the Senate, that it might be decided in the secret councils of a party. For three days the Senate Chamber was silent, but the discussions were transferred to another room of the Capitol, with closed doors and darkened windows, where party leaders might safely contend for a political and party policy.

When Senators returned to their seats I was curious to observe who had won and who lost in the party lottery. The dark brow of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] was lighted with a gleam of pleasure. His proposed substitute for the third section was the marked feature of the measure. But upon the lofty brow of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] there rested a cloud of disappointment and grief. His bantering, which he had named universal amnesty and universal suffrage, which he had so often dressed and undressed in the presence of the Senate, the darling offspring of his brain, was dead; it had died in the caucus; and it was left to the sad Senator only to hope that it might not be his last. Upon the serene countenance of the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the fifteen, there rested the composure of the highest satisfaction; a plausible political platform had been devised, and there was yet hope for his party.

Mr. President, I recognize the propriety and necessity of conventions and caucuses to regulate all questions of organization and political policy; but I have never felt myself authorized to subordinate my judgment as a representative of the people to the decision of any body of men other than those I represent. To me it seems clear that each Senator owes it to the country to vote upon every important measure and every proposed modification thereof according to the dictates of his own judgment and conscience. The Constitution requires that two thirds of the Senators, each answering for himself, shall agree to a proposed amendment before it can be submitted to the States. In this weighty business now before us what are the facts? The House sent us four propositions to change the Constitution in one bill. Upon discussion it was found that probably no one of the propositions, nor any proposed modification thereof, could receive the required vote. Two thirds of the Senators, belonging to one political party, retired from the Senate to consider and agree upon a bill. Each Senator, by going into the secret caucus, agreed and became bound to vote for whatever the majority of the caucus should adopt. A section of an entire bill may be adopted by a bare majority of the caucus, much less than one half the Senate, but the entire two thirds must vote for it in the Senate, not because it is right, but because the majority of the caucus has said so; and thus an amendment of the Constitution may be adopted by the Senate when a majority of the body would vote against it if no party obligation rested upon them. What Senator would dare propose to shut these doors against the people, that we in secret might take steps to change their great charter of liberty? The people would not endure it, but in congregating thousands would burst them open and demand to know all that was said and done upon a matter of such interest to them. The present proposed amendment has been decided upon in a conclave more secret than has ever been known in this country.

So carefully has the obligation of secrecy been observed that no outside Senators, not even the sharp-eyed men of the press, have been able to learn one word that was spoken, or one vote given. An Egyptian darkness covers the proceeding. The secret could not be more profound had the conclave assembled down in the deep and dark caverns of the earth. If you change the Constitution have the people not the right to know how and why it is done, what was proposed and said, and how each Senator voted? Is it not their business? Or indeed have they masters, party chieftains, who may say to them "We govern, you obey?" Is it not a fact that shall arrest attention that since this measure was reported from the caucus scarce an explanation has been conceded, and not one amendment offered or voted for by a single Senator who was in the caucus, so exacting and imperative is the obligation, and so literally is party authority obeyed. Sir, if the people can only come to know how this thing has been done, I believe they will refuse their indorsement.

I now propose a brief examination of the measure as it came from the caucus. It proposes an additional article of five sections, making that number of amendments or additions to the Constitution.

For the first section the virtue is claimed that it defines citizenship of the United States and of the States. I will read that part of the section:

All persons born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

What citizenship is, what are its rights and duties, its obligations and liabilities, are not defined or attempted to be defined; but these vexed questions are left as unsettled as during all the course of our history, when they have occupied the attention and taxed the learning of the departments of Government. But this is certain, that the section will add many millions to the class of persons who are citizens. We have been justly proud of the rank and title of our citizenship, for we understood it to belong to the inhabitants of the United States who were descended from the great races of people who inhabit the countries of Europe, and such emigrants from those countries as have been admitted under our laws. The rank and title conferred honor at home and secured kindness, respect, and safety everywhere abroad; but if this amendment be adopted we will then carry the title and enjoy its advantages in common with the negroes, the coolies, and the Indians. When the Senator from Wisconsin proposed an amendment excluding the savage Indians of the forest I believe every Senator who had been in the caucus voted against it. No one was authorized to change a word that the caucus had used, but I am not quite sure that the people of Minnesota will regard the obligation to a caucus as a sufficient reason why the Senator from that State [Mr. Ramsey] should seek to confer the rank, privileges, and immunities of citizenship upon the cruel savages who destroyed their peaceful settlements and massacred the people with circumstances of atrocity too horrible to relate. How our citizenship will be esteemed at home and abroad should this amendment be adopted we may judge by consulting the sentiments with which we regard Mexican citizenship. We feel that it defines a mixed population, made up of races that ought not to mingle—whites, negroes, and Indians—of whom twenty thousand could not cope with four thousand soldiers of the United States of pure white blood on the field of Buena Vista. It was the work of many generations to place the name and fame of our citizenship so high that it ranked with the proudest titles on earth; but the mad fanaticism and partisan fury of a single year may so degrade it as there shall be

"None so poor to do it reverence."

The second section now demands our attention. The intent and effect of that section is to take away representation in Congress in all the States in which the right of voting is not given to the negroes. The purpose is to constrain every State to confer the right of voting upon the negroes; and in case of refusal, the penalty is loss of representation. The section does not rest upon the proposition that those whom the States treat as unfit to vote shall not be represented, for it is so framed as to continue to the northern and eastern States their twenty Representatives that are based upon a non-voting population. It is so framed, also, as to continue to the States of Maryland, Tennessee, West Virginia, and Missouri their full representation, although during the war the military power was so used in those States as to place the political power in the hands of a few, who so exercised it as to exclude the residue of the people from the ballot-box. You say that if the States treat the negroes as unfit to vote, then they shall not be voted for; that no representation shall be allowed for them; then, I ask, if in some of the northern States the foreigner is denied a vote for five years, why shall he be voted for? If in Maryland, West Virginia, Tennessee, and Missouri the majority are treated as unfit to vote, why shall the minority vote for them and be represented for them? Come, now, let candor and truth have full sway, and answer me, is it not because you believe that the few in these States now allowed to vote will send radicals to Congress, and therefore you allow them to send full delegations that it may add to your political party power? And I now submit to your patriotism, to your love of our country, if we have not come upon most dangerous times, when our Constitution is to be torn up and remodeled that a political party may make its power more secure, that it may hold on to the offices, and shape and control sectional policies.

Mr. President, I now venture the prediction that this thing cannot succeed; that in this land of intelligence and love of liberty and right permanent power cannot be built upon inequality, injustice, and wrong. If the principle be right that none but voters ought to be represented, why do you not say so? If you think the negro ought to have the right of voting; if you are in favor of it, and intend it shall be given, why do you not in plain words confer it upon them? It is much fairer than to seek it by indirection, and the people will distinctly understand you when you propose such a change of the Constitution. I am not for it directly, nor will I coerce the States to its allowance. If conferred by the free action of the States, I am content. Within the limits of constitutional right and power I will support all measures necessary and proper for the protection and elevation of the colored race; measures safe and just to both races; but I do not believe that it is for the good of either race that they should be brought into close social and political relations. God has marked the peculiarities of each. He has put them asunder, and it is not the right, much less the duty, of man to join them together. Our institutions rest for their support upon the intelligence and virtue of the people, and who may say that the untaught negroes, so lately manu-mitted, are qualified to exercise the privileges and discharge the duties of an American citizen? Why then coerce the States to their enfranchisement?

Mr. President, it is my duty to call attention to the peculiar and involved form of expression adopted in this section. Instead of excluding from the enumeration the class to whom the elective franchise is denied, which would be easily understood, it is provided that "the basis of representation in such State shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age in such State." Why the abandonment of that which is of plain meaning for that which is involved and difficult? This measure is to go to the people for their judgment, and should have been clothed in plain, honest language. As a party platform, it may serve a purpose that the meaning is covered; but as a part of the people's Constitution its obscurity is a vice. One needs to be a mathematician to be sure that he comprehends the full force of the proposition. But I will again venture the opinion that it means as if it read thus: no State shall be allowed a representation on a colored population unless the right of voting is given to the negroes—presenting to the States the alternative of loss of representation or the enfranchisement of the negroes, and their political equality. In Indiana there are many thousands of the colored race, the number having greatly increased during the past five years because the constitution and laws of the State have not been executed. The policy of the State has been to discourage their immigration, and that policy has been dictated by the desire to protect the white labor. The presence of negroes in large numbers tends to degrade and cheapen labor, and the people have been unwilling that the white laborer shall be compelled to compete for employment with the negro. To confer the right of voting is to encourage their immigration into the State and to defeat what experience has shown to be a wise policy. Now, is that State to be denied a representation upon that population because she will not make the negro a voter, while New York continues to hold the four members in Congress to which she is entitled because of a white population to which she denies the right of voting? We could not with patience agree to that. The colored population of New England is so small that she is not perceptibly affected, whether she allows or disallows to them the elective franchise, but in the agricultural regions of the West and South they are numbered by thousands and millions, and in many localities they are so numerous that to give them the elective franchise is to throw public affairs into their hands. That is impossible, and the adoption of this amendment is to strip agriculture of its proper voice and influence in Congress and in the election of the President and relatively to add to the already swollen power of New England. Were a blow aimed at the representation of Illinois, would I not raise my arm to avert it? And why, sir? Because it is her right under the compact of the fathers, and also because the interests of Indiana and Illinois are identical; they are both agricultural States, and the members of Congress who guard and protect the rights and interests of either State cannot neglect those of the other. The same is true of all the agricultural States of the West and the South. Discussing this question at an earlier day of the session, I had occasion to say:

"The States and country that rest upon the Ohio and Mississippi rivers and their tributaries have a common interest. They cannot cease to be agricultural States. The plow must turn wealth up to the men of the West."

"Shall we so permanently arrange the representation of the country that agriculture cannot hold up its head? Shall we so permanently adjust representation as that the spindle and the loom shall always be more productive and honorable than the plow and the harrow? Sir, I do not consent to it; and without any reference to sectional feelings and sentiments, I ask for the West simply equality in the legislation of Congress."

"Now, Mr. President, if it is right to change the representation in the House of Representatives, that is, to disturb the foundations of the Government so as to readjust representation, and as Senators claim, to make it equal and just, why is it not equally right to disturb the representation in the Senate? I know very well the reply will be that the Constitution itself forbids an amendment of that instrument in respect to representation in the Senate; but, sir, the power that made that provision can unmake it; the power to amend the Constitution can reach that very provision and change the representation in the Senate. I know it is said that representation in the Senate is one of the Federal features of the Government; but that argument has lost its force when we are taught in these latter times that State rights are not to be respected, and that all power is now in the Federal Government. Suppose we undertake to make representation in the Senate equal, how would it stand? The six New England States, with a population of 3,135,253, have twelve Senators in this body, while the six great agricultural States of the West—Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, Iowa, Kentucky, and Missouri—have a population of 8,414,525, with a representation of twelve Senators. With nearly three times the population of New England, we have the same representation. If those States have this advantage in this body, is it fair to try to cut off the representation of agriculture in the other end of this Capitol? While Indiana has a population of 1,350,423, Rhode Island—a glorious, gallant little State—has a population of 174,620. So far as representation in the Senate is concerned, one man in Rhode Island has a voice and power in the legislation of this country equal to eight men in Indiana. Taking the entire New England States, one man in New England has the voice and power in legislation in the Senate of nearly three men in the West. Is that right, is that just, when you are talking about equality of representation? I do not want to change that feature in our Government. I wish to stand by the State representation as our fathers established it. I do not want to take any of the political power from New England that our fathers agreed she might have. I will stand by their representation as firmly as they will, but I do not like that they shall ask to reduce the representation of the West and Southwest."

Mr. President, I am aware of the plausible argument that by the results of the war the slaves have been made free, and as the Constitution now stands will all be counted, and thus by the rebellion the representation of the South, so far as it rests upon the colored population, will be increased two fifths. Perhaps a sufficient answer is found in the fact that the slaves were not made free by the voice of the South, but by the constitutional amendment which was demanded by the North; and that the North cannot well complain of a consequence of her own act. But, sir, in any view, is this a sufficient reason why we should not only deny to the southern States the increased representation caused by the freedom of the slaves, but also take from them the three fifths representation which they have always enjoyed under the Constitution? But, sir, if you will amend the Constitution at this most unfortunate time, and while the States most to be affected are unrepresented, I will meet you upon a ground you cannot question, and will propose that the southern States shall have no increase of representation by reason of the freedom of the slaves; and to that end I offer the following amendment, so that the section shall read:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within the Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed, and excluding, also, two fifths of such persons as have been discharged from involuntary service by any proclamation of the President of the United States or by the amendment of the Constitution of the United States since the year 1861, and to whom the elective franchise may be denied.

If, now, the objection is made in good faith that the evil you would avoid is the increase of southern representation by the freedom of the slaves, then this amendment is agreeable to you and will be accepted. But it will not be accepted if the purpose really is to reduce the representation of the agricultural sections and thus relatively increase the power of the manufacturing interests, and perpetuate a policy that enriches the capital of one section and bears heavily upon the capital and labor of another. For five years no opportunity has been lost to build up the interests of the eastern States. With that end in view tariff and internal tax laws and drafts have been adjusted, and banking capital distributed; so that now almost every investment of capital in that section yields from fifteen to one hundred per cent. profit, while in Indiana and Illinois the bushel of corn that ought to be worth to the farmer fifty cents, being manufactured into whisky is taxed eight dollars; the bushel yielding four gallons. Mr. President, I rejoice in the prosperity of any section when it is the result of legitimate trade; under equal laws, for then it is the prosperity of the whole country; but I call upon western Senators to hesitate before they surrender a representation that is a reliable support to our great interest, agriculture.

The third section provides that no person shall ever hold any office under the United States, or under any State, who, having at any time taken the oath prescribed by the Constitution as an officer of the United States or of any State, shall engage in rebellion or give aid and comfort to the public enemies. The proposition to exempt from the operations of the section those who against their will were compelled to participate in the rebellion, was voted down; and the section now stands excluding from all offices every person of the described class who either voluntarily or involuntarily became connected with the rebellion; and that, too, notwithstanding the party may be under the shield of the President's pardon. This harsh and sweeping measure will include many excellent men whose services now in the work of reconciliation would be of the greatest value to the country—men who displayed heroic courage in standing out against the secession movement, but who afterward yielded obedience to and served the established government de facto. This measure is in the spirit that pursued the supporters of Cromwell and the Parliament after the Restoration. It is in the spirit of vengeance after men are beaten and have surrendered, and cannot bring a blessing to our country. Senators say that the measure is not penal in its character. Why not? When pardoned are not these men eligible to State and Federal offices? And do you not propose to strip them of their eligibility because of their crime? I suppose the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] by referring to the criminal code of his own State will find it prescribed as a punishment for crime that parties shall be "disfranchised and rendered incapable of holding any office of trust or profit." That is as much a punishment as the fine or the imprisonment, and is found in the criminal codes of many of the States. It is a penalty when the court and jury strip the accused of his right to hold office. What is it, then, when done by Congress?

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WILEY] says that it is a measure of safety for the future—a precaution. So the judge tells the convicted criminal the law esteems him unfit to hold office, and as a precaution the right is taken from him. As a penalty for crime this measure is ex post facto; and if it were a measure of ordinary legislation would therefore be unconstitutional. Mr. President, do you think there will enough good come of this to justify us in departing from the principle which is found in the Constitution of the United States and of every State in the Union, that a man shall be punished only according to the law in force at the time the act is done?

The fourth section provides that the public debt shall remain inviolate. Who has asked us to change the Constitution for the benefit of the bond-holders? Are they so much more meritorious than all other classes that they must be specially provided for in the Constitution? Or, indeed, do we distrust ourselves, and fear that we will all become repudiators? A provision like this, I should think, would excite distrust, and cast a shade on public credit. But perhaps the real purpose is so to hedge in the bond-holders by constitutional provision as that they never may be taxed; that Congress can never assent to their taxation, and so that three billions of capital may bear no portion of the public burdens. Such would be the effect of this amendment. Who has attacked public credit, or questions the obligation to pay the public debt? Are the bond-holders not receiving their interest, even in advance, and in gold? Why then do they ask this extraordinary guarantee? They trusted the good faith of the people, and there is no breach of that faith. When things entirely unusual are asked, it is well for the people to inquire, why it is, what is the purpose, and how far will it carry us? The provision about bounties and pensions is but a blind. The man who wrote the section knew that pensions and bounties need no guarantee; that their payment is secured not only by law, but there is also the pledge of the honor and the hearts of the people.

Mr. President, I stand by the public credit, which is public honor and individual safety. But, sir, how shall we uphold our credit and secure our creditors? By just laws, by equal taxation, by distributing equally over the entire nation the burdens of Government, that they may rest upon the shoulders of all sections and interests. Then there will be no discontent, no grumbling, but a satisfied people, in their strength, will carry every obligation of the Government until discharged, and public credit will then be as firm as the solid foundations of this Capitol.

The fifth section declares the debts contracted in aid of the rebellion illegal, and prohibits their payment. Mr. President, who is so stupid as to have supposed these debts legal, or that they had any valid existence for one hour after the de facto government of the confederate States ceased to exist? Who is so silly as to fear their payment? It was amusing to observe that the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] in making an argument for this section, showed that it was wholly unnecessary, for he read one of the confederate notes, and upon its face it appeared that it was not to become due and payable until six months after the independence of the confederate States should be recognized by the United States. Will that note now in the Senator's pocket ever become due? The Senator laughed at the suggestion. The debtor has ceased to exist; the debt, according to its own provisions, can never become due, and each of the southern States has by constitutional provision repudiated it and prohibited the payment of any portion thereof. If there ever was a defunct and buried debt, without legal or moral force, the recognition and payment of which is in every way impossible, it is the debt, the continued existence of which it is now proposed to recognize by a prohibition of payment in the Constitution. The least that may be said of this section is that it would be harmless, but I would regret to see the face of the Constitution marred by a provision so unnecessary and trifling.

The sixth and last section provides that Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of the article. When these words were used in the amendment abolishing slavery they were thought to be harmless, but during this session there has been claimed for them such force and scope of meaning as that Congress might invade the jurisdiction of the States, rob them of their reserved rights, and crown the Federal Government with absolute and despotic power. As construed this provision is most dangerous. Without it the Constitution possesses the vitality and vigor for its own enforcement through the appropriate departments.

Mr. President, I have now briefly examined the provisions of this article, and cannot resist the conviction that some of them are useless, while others are vicious and dangerous. Nor can I resist the conviction that this measure is pressed, not because of an exigency in our affairs, but to carry out a party programme. The President has his policy. You oppose him. You charge him with usurpation, while at the same time you are straining every brace and timber in the Constitution to secure to yourselves absolute control; indeed, you reach out beyond the Constitution, and by amendment—a proceeding to be resorted to only upon rare and solemn occasions—you grasp after, and, with the avidity of hunger, clutch power. Why this reaching after power on your part? Is it not enough that for five years you have held all the offices of the country, and through the favoritism of the Departments your partisans and followers have grown rich and powerful? Or is it so sweet to govern men that the possession of power is indispensable to your happiness? Upon what fact may you charge the President with usurpation? When he came into office he found eleven great States and eight million people under his absolute sway and government. His authority was as absolute and supreme as is that of the Czar of Russia over his extended dominions. The persons and property of the people were under his control. In his hands there seemed to be the issues of life and death. Did he like you clutch this power and seek to extend it? Did he say it is sweet to govern. No, Senators; laying down absolute power, he said to the people, "Place your States again in practical relations with the United States, and govern yourselves; I will be the President, exercising only those powers with which the Constitution has clothed me." I submit to the candid judgment of men if this was not an exhibition of sublime and heroic devotion to principle and renunciation of power? And when you handed him the Freedmen's Bureau bill, and authorized him to appoint an army of officeholders to fill the whole country with his partisans, when you offered to give him a patronage such as no man had ever before held, he refused it all; but in accordance with his convictions of duty vetoed the bill. Twice he refused the crown of power, not, like Cæsar, pushing it gently from him with the back of his hand, but firmly and in the face of most formidable opposition. The position of the President and those who support his Administration upon the great question now agitating the country is so well and accurately expressed by an eloquent friend, that I will borrow his words:

"1. That no State has the legal right to sever its connection with the Federal Government.

"2. Failing in such an attempt they remain in their ancient places, fixed, immovable, and shorn of none of their attributes as States.

"3. The right to immediate representation in Congress as living, lawful, and legitimate members of the Government.

"4. That the American Union is restored, and stands unbroken, without flaw or blemish, and with domestic tranquillity in all her borders in the presence of the nations of the earth."

Mr. President, upon this great question of a restored Union we go to the country. The Army has done all its work, there is nothing more for it to do, and the sons of the Republic have returned to their homes. All opposition to the authority of the Government of the United States has ceased, and peace reigns throughout our borders. Shall the Union in all respects stand restored, and we be again a united and powerful people? Shall trade and commerce return again to their ancient channels, and prosperity attend all the pursuits of the people? You may throw yourselves across the pathway of the people, and by shouting copperhead and sympathizer hope to frighten the timid, but you will not be able to check or turn them in their onward progress, because they now follow a banner upon which is written in letters of light "reconciliation and Union."

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to insert an additional section as section four.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of Mr. HOWARD was in section [four] five, line forty-six, to strike out the word "already" before the word "incurred;" in line forty-seven to strike out the words "or which may hereafter be incurred;" in line forty-eight to strike out the words "of war" and insert the word "rebellion;" in line forty-nine to strike out the words "loss of involuntary service or labor" and to insert "the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be forever held illegal and void;" so that the section will read:

SEC. [4] 5. Neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for compensation for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be forever held illegal and void.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not notice that the fourth section was agreed to. Was it agreed to?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I shall move a reconsideration, as I propose to offer an amendment to it.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to amend the amendment to the [fourth] fifth section, in line forty-nine, by striking out the words "for compensation for" and inserting the words "on account of," so as to prevent the repetition of the word "for."

Mr. HARRIS. I do not see that that improves it at all. I think it is quite well enough as it is. I would not change it.

Mr. HOWARD. The object is merely to prevent the repetition of the word "for." It now reads, "any claim for compensation for the loss," &c.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It will make better phraseology.

Mr. HOWARD. I propose simply to make it read, "or any claim on account of the loss or emancipation of any slave." It makes it more harmonious.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. HOWARD. There is one other amendment that escaped my attention. In line thirty the word "that," at the beginning of section three, should be stricken out. It is entirely superfluous. The section will then read:

No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be made if there be no objection, being a verbal amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is a little obscurity, or, at any rate, the expression in section four might be construed to go further than was intended, and I have rather come to the conclusion that it was best to put sections four and five in one single section; and I ask the Chair, as section four has been adopted and also the amendments to section five, if it will be at any time in order to strike out both and insert a substitute for the two sections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK.) It is in order now, in the opinion of the Chair, to strike out those sections and insert a substitute, and it will also be in order when the joint resolution is reported to the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But section four has been agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been agreed to, but it will be in order to strike that out with something else, and insert a substitute.

Mr. FESSENDEN. These amendments will come up in the Senate in their regular order, as I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They will.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will omit offering my amendment, then, until the resolution is reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All the amendments proposed by the Senator from Michigan have now been disposed of.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I offer the following amendment to come in as a new section:

SEC. — Every person not mentioned or described in section three of this article who shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States and against whom no prosecution for treason has been instituted before the expiration of — years from the termination or suppression of such insurrection or rebellion, who shall thereafter before a court of record make oath to support the Constitution of the United States, shall thereupon be forever acquitted and discharged of and from all pains, penalties, liabilities, disabilities, and disqualifications incurred under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or of any State, by participation in such insurrection or rebellion, and if previously a citizen of the United States shall be thereby restored to all rights, privileges, and immunities of citizenship. But nothing in this section contained shall prevent the Congress passing a general or special act of amnesty as to any or all persons included in its provisions before the expiration of the said — years.

I do not propose, Mr. President, to detain the Senate for a moment, by advocating the provisions of this amendment. If they do not commend themselves to Senators I am sure that nothing I could say would help the case. The object is easily perceived. It is, if we can, to make a finality of this matter; that while we have excluded certain persons from representation and from participation in the Government, the large class of persons who will still remain shall at some time—and I have left the number of years blank—be released from the pains and penalties they have incurred, or are supposed to have incurred, for it is exceedingly doubtful, I presume, what disabilities the mere fact of having engaged in the rebellion imposed upon them without a trial and conviction of treason. I have framed the amendment with a view, of course, as it is proposed to go into the Constitution, of applying to the future as well as to the present case; and I think if our attention could be drawn to this point, and all the amendments that are proposed here were considered in that light, we should be more able to separate ourselves from the feelings and prejudices of the moment and to act understandingly upon the subject.

I propose by this amendment that all those persons who are not embraced in the third section, which section, I take it, will include the most of those who were the instigators and fomenters of the rebellion, and all against whom no prosecution for treason shall be commenced within a certain number of years, shall upon the expiration of that time, by taking an oath thereafter to support the Constitution, in the usual form, be exonerated from all pains and penalties in consequence of their action. I need not say that there is something due to these people, even when their delinquency is fully admitted. They are now in a situation where they know not what will be their future, and I think it is due to the business of the country and to the more early resumption of the former friendly relations that existed between us and the people of those States, that something of this nature should at this time and in this connection be ingrafted upon the Constitution, or should accompany the section which excludes certain descriptions of persons.

I trust, sir, at any rate, that this amendment, or the spirit of it—for I am not anxious about the words—may receive such consideration from the Senators in the majority as will induce them to give it a fair hearing. It is offered in good faith. I have not shown it or named it to a single person. If there is any responsibility attending it, it is wholly my own. I am certain, from my own knowledge and from the interviews I have had with many of the southern people since I have been here, and from my knowledge and interviews with such persons in my own State, that it is more important to them that some time should be fixed when their disabilities shall terminate than that the time should be either early or late. I have left in blank the time to be fixed. If it was an open question, if it related only to the future, I should be inclined to fix the time at not exceeding three years; but taking into consideration the circumstances under which we are placed it may be fixed at a longer period if such be the judgment of the Senate. I do not know, at this moment, at what time this rebellion terminated or was suppressed in a legal point of view. I know that in case of foreign war peace is generally made by treaty, and that treaty is not in force until it is proclaimed to be in force by the President, and by that treaty notice is generally given where and when hostilities shall cease; that is to say, in reference to vessels that are in foreign seas and in different parts of the world. There has been, I believe, a proclamation by the President, in which he stated that the rebellion was at an end, but the State of Texas was omitted from that category. Whether that would be the proper time to fix as the time when the war or rebellion terminated or was suppressed I cannot say, but I think that this is an endeavor, at least, to afford a means by which the constitutional amendments now pending may be made a finality. You exclude by a section already adopted certain persons from being members of this body and from holding other offices. In the next place it is left open to you by the amendment I have proposed until the expiration of whatever number of years may be fixed, to institute proceedings against any others whom you think ought to be proceeded against. Having made the election, then, to exclude one class entirely and to prosecute another class, the residue are those whom I propose to declare freed from the pains and penalties and disabilities and disqualifications they have incurred. It is to meet that case, to make, if I can, a finality of this matter, that I have proposed the amendment, and my own judgment is that the requisite number of States are more likely to adopt the amendment in gross with some provision of this character, at least, accompanying it; that is to say, that the mass of the people South, including a great many who were misled by those upon whom they usually depended for information as to the proper conduct they should pursue, and who were forced into the service under other circumstances, wherein they cannot be said to have been morally blamable, should be relieved and released at once. At present they do not know what is to be their fate, and that uncertainty is preventing things settling down in quiet in the southern States. I ask Senators again to give this proposition a fair consideration before they reject it.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. I do not see any propriety in incorporating into the Constitution any provision relating to amnesty or pardon—a subject which is already provided for by the act of 1862 and by the Constitution itself. There is full power already in the hands of the President of the United States, under that act of Congress, to pardon every rebel who has participated in the civil war, conditionally or unconditionally, as he may see fit. He has, besides that special clause in the act of 1862, the general pardoning power given by the Constitution of the United States, which he can exercise even before conviction if he sees fit to do so. I therefore look upon this amendment as entirely unnecessary and not productive of any beneficial result. Besides, it looks to me like a deformity incorporated in the Constitution of the United States. We are now settling the fundamental principles upon which our Government is to be conducted hereafter, and I think we should omit any reference to that subject.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. In addition to what the Senator from Michigan has said, it seems to me that this is a subject for legislation, not for constitutional amendment. We have already provided that the President of the United States may do precisely what would be done by this proposed amendment; and if more liberal legislation is required hereafter, and the President fails to extend amnesty so broadly as it should be, Congress has always power to relieve, by a general act or special act, from the penalties of crime, and may provide for a general amnesty by law. I therefore submit to the Senator from West Virginia whether, although his proposition seems to be a reasonable and proper one, it is worth while to put it in a constitutional amendment, when it is of so temporary a character, and the matter may be regulated by law.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The amendment, it will be seen, removes disqualifications and disabilities, and from what I have heard and read, nobody believes that the amnesty granted by the President will have that effect. At any rate, there is a difference of opinion; it is a moot point as to what effect that amnesty will have; and, again, it is a moot point and has been debated here upon the floor of the Senate, I think, within a few weeks, as to the right of the President to pardon before conviction. These points have both been denied, and denied by those to whose opinions some weight is attached. My reason, therefore, for proposing that this proposition should accompany these amendments to the Constitution is that everybody may know, as it were, in advance, what is likely to be his fate.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 8, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Riddle, Van Winkle, and Willey—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Creswell, Dixon, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Norton, Saulsbury, Sprague, Trumbull, and Wright—15.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I now offer the amendment which I before suggested to the second section. It is to strike out all after the word "taxed," in that section, in these words:

"But whenever in any State the elective franchise shall be denied to any portion of its male inhabitants being citizens of the United States not less than twenty-one years of age, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation in such State shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age in such State."

And in lieu thereof to insert these words:

"And excluding also two fifths of such persons as have been discharged from involuntary servitude by any proclamation of the President of the United States or by the amendment to the Constitution of the United States since the year 1861, and to whom the elective franchise may be denied."

I will make a very brief explanation of this amendment. The effect of it will be to leave the representation of the southern States just where it was before the war. It is objected and urged as a reason for a constitutional amendment that the slaves, having been made free, are now all counted in the basis of representation, and that the effect of that is to increase the southern representation. To avoid this objection this amendment is proposed, so that the representation from the southern States shall be upon precisely the same basis that it was before the war.

I desire to explain one portion of the amendment. It speaks of persons made free by any proclamation of the President or by the amendment of the Constitution. I do not myself believe that the proclamation of the President had the effect in law of emancipating the slaves; I believe that that work was done by the constitutional amendment; but as other Senators hold that the proclamation had the effect to make the slaves free, out of deference to their views I have used that expression.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If I correctly understand the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, it is that until the elective franchise is extended to the colored men of the South they are to be counted in the basis of representation just as they have heretofore been counted; that is, three fifths of them are to be counted, and no more. I am inclined to vote for this amendment, because I believe it would be more likely to be adopted both by the States South and by the States North. The effect of it is to count the colored population of the South as they have heretofore been counted until they shall be enfranchised; and of course when enfranchised they will all be counted. The southern States, in my judgment, would vote for that proposition sooner than for the pending proposition as reported by the committee, because it does not decrease their representation. The northern States would vote for it because it secures them in their proportion of political power against any increase on the part of the southern States by virtue of the emancipation of the slaves at the South, while it tends in the same direction with the amendment reported by the committee as it now stands. That amendment as it now stands excludes five fifths until they are enfranchised. This amendment excludes two fifths until they are enfranchised. For my part, one of the greatest anxieties I have about constitutional amendments, if they are to be submitted, is, that they be submitted in such a shape that the States will ratify them, so as to close up this matter and have an end of it. For this reason I am inclined to vote for the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire now to move some amendments to this second section. I propose to offer as a substitute for it the following:

After the census to be taken in the year 1870, and each succeeding census, Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to the number in each State of male electors over twenty-one years of age qualified by the laws thereof to choose members of the most numerous branch of its Legislature; and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States according to the value of the real and personal taxable property situated in each State, not belonging to the State or to the United States.

I shall not go into any lengthy argument on the subject of this amendment, but simply state in the briefest words possible the grounds upon which I offer it. In the first place, I am in favor of it upon the ground of principle. I believe that in the House of Representatives the voting population of the country should be represented; that a voter in Wisconsin should have precisely the same voice in the House of Representatives as a voter in Massachusetts or a voter in Kentucky or a voter in South Carolina; that if twenty thousand voters in Wisconsin are permitted to speak one voice or cast one vote in the House of Representatives, twenty thousand voters in South Carolina should not be permitted to cast any more than one voice or one vote. I believe that a constitutional amendment based upon this principle, the principle of the representation of voters, is more likely to be acceptable to the States than the proposition which is reported by the committee and pending before the Senate. You may say that the effect of it may be very much the same, that if the States at the South do not choose to make voters of their colored population that population will not be represented in the House of Representatives, and you may say that is the effect under the pending amendment; but the principle upon which it is based is very different, and when you are asked to vote for a measure upon one principle it is a very different thing from what it is when you are asked to vote for what may perhaps be the same in effect upon another principle.

I am for this, because it is no new conviction with me. It has been the conviction upon which I have acted during the whole of this struggle. It is the ground upon which my political associates in Wisconsin, and I believe the men of all parties in the State of Wisconsin, stand fully committed, in favor of the proposition to let representation be based upon the voters of the several States. If you say to the States of the South, "You must be deprived of one half of your representation or let your negroes vote," that is one thing; but if you say to the States of the South, "As a principle, it is but just that the men who vote shall be represented in the House of Representatives," they may yield to your principle when they may not be prepared to yield to it in the form in which you present it.

Mr. President, I have looked a little into this subject to see what the effect will be. A friend of mine has prepared a table showing how this proposition will operate in the several States. This table shows the number of Representatives to which the States are now entitled, the number to which each would be entitled on the voting basis, and the number to which they will be entitled by the reconstruction amendment as proposed by the committee. The estimate is made upon the figures of 1860. The State of Maine has five Representatives under the present apportionment. She had 100,718 voters in 1860, and upon the voting basis which requires 20,400 voters to be entitled to one Representative in the other House, she would have five Representatives. A Senator asks me how the voters can be ascertained. Their number can be ascertained when you take the census, like any other fact.

Mr. GRIMES. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin provides for the voting basis, not the basis of citizenship. In Wisconsin a man can vote who has been on this continent only six months. Does the Senator intend to include such persons as those in his basis in the State of Wisconsin?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. According to my amendment they would be embraced.

Mr. GRIMES. They would be embraced in Wisconsin; but would they be embraced in Massachusetts?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It depends on what Massachusetts decides on that question.

Mr. GRIMES. On the State law.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly.

Mr. GRIMES. Then the purpose and object, or at any rate the legitimate result of this amendment, would be to degrade the elective franchise so as to allow every man to vote on the same platform, on the same basis.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Not at all. Your amendment proposes to allow the States to say who shall vote. Upon that subject I propose to take the sense of the Senate in both forms, both on the question of "male electors" and "male citizens of the United States." I wish certainly to accommodate myself to the judgment of the honorable Senator from Iowa, for I desire to secure his support, if it is possible, though I have some doubts about that.

Now, Mr. President, to come back to this table, the State of Maine had 100,718 voters in 1860, and she has five Representatives on the basis of population. On the voting basis she would still be entitled to five Representatives; but upon the reconstruction basis as reported by the committee Maine would gain one Representative and have six. So under this reconstruction amendment Maine gains one. How is it with New Hampshire? She had in 1860 65,028 voters, and she has three Representatives on the present basis. New Hampshire would also have three Representatives upon the basis of the reconstruction amendment as reported by the committee. So New Hampshire is not affected, whichever way the thing stands, if it stands on the Constitution as it is, if it stands on the Constitution as the committee propose to amend it, or if it stands on the Constitution as it is proposed to be amended by the amendment which I have just offered.

We now come to Vermont. Vermont upon the present apportionment has three Representatives. In 1860 she cast 44,644 votes. Vermont would have but two Representatives upon the voting basis, because the fraction would not be large enough to give her three, but under this reconstruction amendment Vermont would still retain three Representatives. Next we come to Massachusetts. Massachusetts upon the present apportionment has ten Representatives. She had in 1860 169,175 voters. Upon the voting basis Massachusetts would have eight Representatives, so that my amendment would reduce her representation by two; but upon the reconstruction amendment as offered by the committee Massachusetts would have eleven, gaining one. Thus we see that Maine would gain one and Massachusetts would gain one, while Vermont and New Hampshire remain the same under the committee's amendment. Connecticut has four Representatives upon the present apportionment. She had 79,246 voters in 1860, so that she would have four Representatives upon the voting basis. Connecticut would also have four Representatives under the proposition of the committee. So Connecticut is not affected; she stands indifferent so far as the number of her representation is concerned. Rhode Island has two Representatives under the present apportionment. In 1860 she had 19,951 voters, so that the voting basis would give her but one Representative, whereas under the reconstruction amendment as reported by the committee she would have two. Thus it appears that upon the voting basis New England would lose four Representatives, whereas under the reconstruction amendment as proposed by the committee she would gain two Representatives. How does it stand with New York? New York now has thirty-one Representatives. She had in 1860 675,176 voters. Upon the voting basis New York would gain three and her representation would be thirty-four. So upon the reconstruction basis as reported by the committee New York would also gain three. New Jersey has five Representatives under the present apportionment. Upon the voting basis, as New Jersey had 121,125 votes in 1860, she would have six, or a gain of one; and according to the reconstruction amendment as proposed by the committee, New Jersey would gain one.

How is it with Pennsylvania? Pennsylvania has now twenty-four Representatives. The number of her voters in 1860 was 476,442. Upon the voting basis, Pennsylvania would have the same number, twenty-four Representatives, her fraction being very large. Upon the reconstruction amendment as reported by the committee she would gain one.

Mr. COWAN. Oh, no. We have one hundred thousand negroes in Pennsylvania, and under that proposition we should lose one.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Perhaps that may be so. Ohio has under the present apportionment nineteen Representatives. She had in 1860 442,441 voters. Upon the voting basis Ohio would have twenty-two Representatives, a gain of three, whereas, under the reconstruction amendment, she would have twenty, a gain of only one. Indiana, under the present apportionment, has eleven Representatives. She has 272,143 voters. Upon the voting basis Indiana would have thirteen Representatives, a gain of two, whereas upon the proposed amendment of the committee, Indiana would have twelve Representatives, a gain of one. Illinois has fourteen Representatives under the present apportionment, with 339,698 voters. Illinois would have seventeen Representatives upon the voting basis, a gain of three, whereas, according to the proposition of the committee, Illinois would have but fifteen, a gain of only one. Michigan has under the present apportionment six Representatives, with 153,537 voters. Upon the voting basis Michigan would have eight Representatives, a gain of two, while upon the proposition of the committee she would have seven, a gain of one. Wisconsin has six Representatives, with 152,180 voters. Wisconsin, like Michigan, would have eight Representatives on the voting basis, a gain of two, whereas, upon the proposition of the committee, she would have but seven, a gain of one. Iowa now has six Representatives, but she has one of her Representatives upon a fraction. She had but 128,331 voters, so that according to this table her representation would remain the same on the voting basis.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. How does the Senator arrive at the number of voters in 1860?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. By the number of votes cast in the presidential election of 1860. I am speaking on that basis. Perhaps there are still more voters that did not vote, and you might be entitled to more if you counted them all. It would make it still better for you.

Mr. CRAGIN. With the permission of the Senator from Wisconsin I desire to ask him a question.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly.

Mr. CRAGIN. Suppose there are more voters, would it not change his whole calculation?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CRAGIN. Take, for instance, the State of Vermont, adjoining New Hampshire. The population of the two States is about the same, but in New Hampshire the contests are always close, and we bring out almost the last vote.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. You do not lend them any of your voters. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAGIN. In Vermont, according to the Senator's table, the number actually voting was 40,000 and over, and the Senator reduces her representation from three to two; but if the actual number of votes were counted Vermont would have the same as New Hampshire. It spoils his whole calculation.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That may be so, but my amendment provides for the representation being based on the voters as returned by the census, so that there will be no mistake about that. If Vermont has the voters she will not lose representation. Every voter in Vermont has just as much right to be represented as a voter in Wisconsin. The calculation on which I am relying is based upon the actual vote cast in 1860.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is based also, I suppose, on the idea that the southern States will not enlarge their voters but that they will remain as they are now.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am taking the actual votes cast in 1860, and supposing that the laws remain the same on that subject. The State of Minnesota is now entitled to two Representatives. She cast 34,799 votes in 1860. Upon the voting basis she would be entitled to two Representatives, the same that she has now, for she has one upon a large fraction at present. California has now three Representatives. She cast in 1860 118,840 votes, which would entitle her at the rate of twenty thousand voters to a Representative, to six Representatives, giving her an increase in her representation of three members. Oregon has one Representative and will have but one, because the voters in Oregon in 1860 amounted to 14,410 who cast their votes in the election that year, and the population of Oregon probably is not such as to entitle her to more than one Representative, and may not be for some time to come. So also of Nevada.

Now, Mr. President, if we look to the late slave States, the State of Delaware under the present apportionment has one Representative. She had 16,039 voters in 1860, and upon the voting basis or any other basis the State of Delaware will have but one Representative. Maryland has under the present apportionment five Representatives. Maryland had 92,502 voters in 1860, and if you give to her the benefit of a large fraction, a fraction of twelve thousand out of twenty thousand which entitles to a vote, Maryland would still have, on the voting basis, five Representatives; and under this reconstruction amendment she would have the same.

West Virginia has three Representatives under the present apportionment. Her voters in 1860 are computed to be about 50,000—the accuracy of that calculation I cannot vouch for—which would give her the same number of Representatives which she now has. Virginia, the remaining part of Virginia, is entitled to eight Representatives under the present apportionment. On the voting basis of 117,223, she would be entitled to but six Representatives, which would be a reduction upon the State of Virginia of two, and the same reduction follows under the apportionment which is proposed by the committee.

Kentucky has now nine Representatives under the present apportionment. Kentucky had 145,258 voters in 1860, which would make her entitled to seven Representatives on the voting basis, and a large fraction, almost entitled to eight; but upon the voting basis Kentucky would lose two, and upon the proposition of the committee Kentucky will lose two of her Representatives. The effect upon her, therefore, is the same. Missouri is entitled to nine Representatives under the present apportionment. Missouri had 165,518 voters in 1860, which would entitle her to eight Representatives, which would be a loss of one when she is reduced to the voting basis. North Carolina is entitled to seven Representatives under the present apportionment. Upon the voting basis, as she had 96,230 voters in 1860, she would be entitled to but five, receiving one upon the large fraction of 16,000. South Carolina, under the present apportionment, is entitled to four Representatives. I have here an estimate as to the amount of votes that were cast in the State of South Carolina, as her Legislature elects the presidential electors, and therefore no accurate computation could be made as to the voters of South Carolina; but her voters were estimated at about 50,000. It is calculated that upon the voting basis, therefore, South Carolina would have three Representatives, and she will have the same under the proposition of the committee. Georgia is entitled to seven Representatives under the present apportionment. In 1860 Georgia had 106,365 voters, which would entitle her upon the voting basis to six Representatives. Florida had but 14,347 voters in 1860. She is entitled to but one Representative under the present apportionment, and cannot, under any circumstances, at present at least, be entitled to more than one. Alabama has six Representatives under the present apportionment. She had 90,357 voters in 1860, which, upon the fraction of ten thousand and upwards, would entitle her to five Representatives upon the voting basis, and she would be entitled to the same number under the reconstruction amendment proposed by the committee. Mississippi is entitled to five Representatives under the present apportionment. She cast 69,120 votes in 1860, which would entitle her to four Representatives upon the voting basis, which would be a loss of one. Louisiana is entitled to five Representatives under the present apportionment. She had 50,510 votes in 1860, which would entitle her to but three Representatives on the voting basis.

Of course this is based upon the assumption that the colored people of the South are not yet permitted to cast votes. When they become enfranchised these States will be entitled to increased representation. Texas is entitled to four Representatives under the present apportionment. She cast 60,986 votes in 1860, which would entitle her, on the voting basis, to three Representatives, or a loss of one. Arkansas is entitled to three Representatives under the present apportionment. She cast 54,053 votes in 1860, which would entitle her to three Representatives upon the voting basis, which is the same as upon this report of the committee. Tennessee is entitled to eight Representatives under the present apportionment. She had 145,333 votes in 1860, which would entitle her to seven Representatives, and a large fraction, but she would lose one if placed upon the voting basis, and the same upon the report of the committee.

Mr. President, if we recapitulate the whole according to the computation of this table, under the present apportionment the North or the old free States have one hundred and fifty-seven Representatives, the South or the late slave States eighty-five, making a majority in favor of the North or the old free States of seventy-two in the House of Representatives. Upon the voting basis, the North or the old free States will have one hundred and seventy-two Representatives, while the South or the old slave States will have but seventy, and thus give to the old free States a majority in the Electoral College of one hundred and two. Thus it will be seen that this proposition to base representation upon the voting basis is three in favor of the old free States; and while New England, which, with her comparatively small population, has twelve Senators in this body, loses but four, and the great agricultural States of the Northwest, one of which I represent, will gain twelve in the House of Representatives, while such are the results, it seems to me it does not militate at all against the proposition which I have introduced. California, which now has three, would be entitled to six Representatives. I desire not to dwell at any great length on this subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the Senator leaves that part of his argument, I should like to ask him a question with his permission. Representation is now based upon population, and it is estimated, and I suppose there is not much doubt about the correctness of the estimate, that there are in the State of New York four hundred thousand foreigners not naturalized. Those foreigners give to the State of New York at this time three Representatives in the House of Representatives. The Senator proposes, by adopting voters as the basis of representation, to strike out those four hundred thousand foreigners, and at the same time he says New York will gain three in her representation. I should like to have an explanation of that difference.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, there were cast in 1860 4,731,193 votes, which, according to that estimate, would give 20,400 voters to each Representative elected. The State of New York cast in 1860, 675,156 votes, which, divided by 24,400, gives New York thirty-four Representatives.

I think these tables will be found, upon calculation, to be sufficiently accurate to illustrate all that is necessary to be shown upon this subject. The principle that voters should have an equal voice in the choice of Representatives in the House of Representatives, the popular branch of the Government, is a principle upon which we can stand and contend. We can ask men, even when it disfranchises the States of the South, to vote for that, when you cannot so well go to them and say, "Gentlemen, you must consent to lose one third, one fourth, or one half of your representation unless you will allow the colored population to vote." That is a different question. You may say the effect produced is the same; but when you are arguing for a principle, that is to say, that the voice of the voter is what is to be heard in the House of Representatives, they will yield to the principle and accept it and vote for it when they would not vote for it presented in its present form. I ask for the yeas and nays upon this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am satisfied that my friend from Wisconsin is entirely in error in respect to the number of voters in the State of Vermont. He bases himself merely upon the election returns of the election of 1860, if I understand him. The population of Vermont is more than 315,000; and if my recollection is not very much out of joint, in times gone by, when contests were approximately close there, we cast more than 60,000 votes; and I have no doubt to-day that the number of male citizens of the State of Vermont, of that population of 315,000 and upward, is more than 60,000; so that in the particular instance that he recites as to that State there is an undoubted error in his figures of more than 16,000 voters; and if, as it often happens in States where the contest is not close, similar differences exist, the value of his tables is of course totally destroyed. Mathematics is one of the sciences where, if you leave out one link or make one error, the result flows through the whole problem, and therefore it will undoubtedly turn out that there is no reliance whatever to be placed upon the figures which my friend from Wisconsin has so ingeniously framed.

But, Mr. President, the question is broader and deeper than the mere selfish one of gain to this State or to that State. It is a question which enters into the profoundest philosophy of government, whether it is a true principle that the mere accident of the right to vote is to determine the representation of a community. The fathers who founded this Government acted upon the idea not only that the representation, as a principle, in general was to be based upon population, independent of the franchise, independent of citizenship, but there was also always to go with it, for the security of every part of the country, that other principle, that direct taxation, the involuntary burdens which the citizen must bear, must stand always guarded by the right of representation; and therefore it was provided that representation and direct taxation should always go hand in hand in the same ratio.

Now, the proposition of my friend from Wisconsin is that we shall discard this time-honored principle, which in my judgment is an impregnable one, that we shall discard the original principle that all society in some form is to be represented in a republican Government, and select a particular few, who are themselves always to decide how that few shall be made up, who are not only to exercise all the powers and privileges of Government, but to exercise that other power and privilege of imposing the burdens upon some other section or some other class of the community; that is to say, if the East happens to be numerous in men and short of money, the eastern men may vote the taxes upon the western property, or the reverse.

I know how impatient the Senate is, and without entering at large upon this interesting and profound topic, in my judgment, the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin is one which is full of inherent error, both in principle and practice, and I shall vote against it.

Mr. POLAND. I had prepared some remarks with reference to these amendments generally, and in the course of those remarks I had attempted to discuss the question that is raised upon this particular amendment. Perhaps it may be appropriate that I should deliver them now, although all that I might say is not perfectly germane to this amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Does the Senator from Vermont desire to go on this afternoon, or would he prefer to go on to-morrow?

Mr. POLAND. I am not particular.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator will give way I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. POLAND. It is immaterial to me.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope that motion will not be agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are quite a number of amendments to be offered, and I think we might as well proceed with them now, and the Senator from Vermont, if he desires it, can have the floor to-morrow.

Mr. POLAND. It is quite immaterial to me whether I proceed to-night or to-morrow morning. I give way to the motion for an executive session.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understood the Senator from Vermont to say that he rather preferred to submit his general remarks on the subject of reconstruction upon this amendment, and he desired to do it before the amendment was acted on by the Senate. It was with that view that I rose to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. POLAND. I yield to your motion.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in the consideration of executive business, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 4, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

BILLS ON LEAVE.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be the call of States and Territories for bills on leave for reference and not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider; commencing with the State of Maine.

GUARDIANS OF LUNATICS, ETC.

Mr. PATTERSON introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to enable guardians and committees of lunatics appointed in the several States to act within the District of Columbia;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT.

Mr. JENCKES introduced a bill to alter the places of holding the circuit court for the Rhode Island district; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. JENCKES also introduced a bill in addition to an act entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States and the acts in addition to and amendatory thereof;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FRESH-WATER BASIN FOR IRON-CLADS.

Mr. WRIGHT introduced a joint resolution relative to a fresh-water basin for iron-clads at Tappan bay, on the Hudson river; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

STEAM-TUG T. W. NOTTER.

Mr. SPALDING introduced a bill to change the name of the steam-tug T. W. Notter, of Cleveland, Ohio; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

FRANK LYNCH.

Mr. SPALDING introduced a bill for the relief of Lieutenant Colonel Frank Lynch, late of the twenty-seventh Ohio volunteers; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

TERRITORY OF LINCOLN.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, introduced a bill to provide a temporary government over the Territory of Lincoln; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on Territories.

UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. FARNSWORTH introduced a bill to amend the practice in the United States courts; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TENURE OF OFFICE.

Mr. PRICE introduced a bill regulating the tenure of certain offices; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY OF NEBRASKA.

Mr. HITCHCOCK introduced a bill to provide for the geological survey of the Territory of Nebraska; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. HITCHCOCK introduced a bill to provide for the erection at Nebraska City, in the Territory of Nebraska, of a building for a post office, internal revenue offices, and for the holding of United States courts; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The call of the States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions having been completed, the Speaker stated, as the next business in order, the calling of the States and Territories for resolutions, commencing with the State of Nevada, where the call rested on Monday last.

PAYMENT TO INDIAN TRIBES.

Mr. BURLEIGH submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish this House with a full statement of all moneys on hand on the 10th day of July, 1865, applicable to the support of the various Indian tribes and for all the purposes connected with the Indian service; also, the entire amount which has been expended since that time and up to the 20th day of April, 1866, and the objects for which such expenditures have been made, together with the amount now on hand applicable to said service under the following heads, also, the amount which has been expended over and above the appropriations already made, namely, pay of superintendents and agents, pay of sub-agents, pay of temporary clerks by superintendents, pay of interpreters, pay for presents to Indians, pay for Indian buildings and repairs, for contingent expenses of Indian department, for making treaties with Indian tribes, for transportation of Indian annuity goods, support of refugee Indians in the southern and middle superintendencies, and amount expended for support of refugee and other Indians over and above the amount heretofore appropriated.

PUBLIC HONORS TO TRAITORS.

The call of the States and Territories for resolutions having been concluded, the Speaker stated, as the next business in order, the consideration of resolutions lying over for one day, the first in order being the preamble and resolution offered last Monday by Mr. WILLIAMS.

The Clerk read the preamble and resolution, as follows:

Whereas it has been publicly declared by the supreme executive authority of this nation, in accordance with the dictates of sound wisdom, the just instincts of humanity, and the undoubted sentiment of the people of the loyal States, that treason should be made odious and traitors not only disgraced but impoverished; and whereas it is represented that while no traitor who has survived the chances of the battle-field and escaped the retribution due to his crimes at the hands of the loyal soldiers of the North has been otherwise punished than by the award of public honors or the remission of disabilities to qualify him for the enjoyment thereof, the memories of the traitor dead have been hallowed and consecrated by local public entertainments and treasonable utterances in honor of their crime, which have not only been tolerated by the national authorities, but in some instances approved by closing the public offices on the occasion of floral processions to their graves, while the privilege of paying like honors to the martyred dead of the armies of the Union who perished in the holy work of punishing the treason of those who are thus honored and restoring the Union of our fathers has been denied to the loyal people of those communities by the local authorities, with the connivance or consent of the military or civil agents of this Government; and whereas the encouragement or toleration of such enormities is of pernicious and dangerous example, insulting to the living soldiers of the Republic as well as to the memories of the dead, and calculated to make loyalty odious and treason honorable, and to obstruct, if not entirely prevent, the growth of such a feeling as is essential to any cordial or permanent reunion of these States: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform this House whether any of the military or civil employes of this Government, within the State of Georgia or any of the other rebel States, have in any way countenanced or assisted in the rendition of public honors to any of the traitors, either living or dead, who have been waging a partricial war against this Government, in commemoration of their great crime, either by closing their offices on such occasions or making other favorable public demonstrations in connection therewith; and further, whether the privilege of doing like honors to loyalty at the graves of the Union soldiers who have perished far from their homes and kindred has been in any instance obstructed or denied by the rebel authorities with the concurrence or acquiescence of the officers of this Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. On that resolution I demand the previous question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is it in order to call for a division on this preamble and resolution, and have a separate vote on each?

The SPEAKER. It must be taken separately on the preamble by the rule to be found on page 137 of the Digest.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] would specify precisely what he would like to have done in order to make treason odious in his estimation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would do precisely what the gentleman from Wisconsin would not.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. What is that, pray?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suggest that the preamble is merely a recital of facts represented to have taken place.

The SPEAKER. The previous question applies first to the resolution, and exhausts itself thereon. It must be separately moved on the preamble.

Mr. RAYMOND. I rise to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that inasmuch as the preamble and resolution embrace what he has just stated to be the recital of alleged facts, perhaps it will be wise to allow some debate upon them in order to know upon what evidence those facts rest. As far as I am concerned I am entirely ignorant of any facts upon which to base my action upon the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will merely say to the gentleman that it is a question of representation and not of proof. The resolution has been spread upon your records, and has been read by the members of the House during the past week. Debate cannot throw any additional light upon it.

Mr. RAYMOND. I should like to know who the persons making these representations are. I have never heard of any warrant for these statements except in newspaper paragraphs.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will merely answer the suggestion of the gentleman from New York by remarking that the facts stated in the preamble were derived from a newspaper published in the city of Augusta, Georgia.

Mr. RAYMOND. I desire simply to ask, inasmuch as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated on what authority these facts stated are alleged to rest, if it would not be fair to allow some remarks to the credibility of that authority or to cite authorities upon the other side.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman may state that these facts are represented by myself as the author of the resolution if he chooses.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he personally is prepared to represent the facts as stated in the preamble.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am prepared to say that the facts are so represented upon authority which I believe to be good. In the absence of other evidence, I am prepared to indorse the statements in the way of a recital in this preamble. I renew the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 59, noes 29.

The main question was ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS demanded the previous question on agreeing to the preamble.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays on agreeing to the preamble.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 74, nays 30, not voting 79; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Brandegee, Brownwell, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cullom, Duffess, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Jencks, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Ketchum, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, McClurg, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Price, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Seefeldt, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spaulding, Stevens, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Ward, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—74.

NAYS—Messrs. Aneona, Baker, Boyer, Coffroth, Dawson, Eldridge, Finck, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Harris, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Kuykendall, Latham, LeBlond, Marshall, McCullough, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Rogers, Rousseau, Thornton, Trimble, and Wright—30.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Barker, Benjamin, Bergen, Blow, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Chandler, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Delano, Denning, Denison, Dodge, Dumont, Farguhar, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Griswold, Hart, Hill, Hogan, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jones, Kasson, Kerr, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McIndoo, McKee, Morrill, Morris, Noel, Paine, Plants, Pomeroy, Radford, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Smith, Starr, Stillwell, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, Burt Van Horn, Robert F. Van Horn, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, and Winfield—73.

So the preamble was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. ALLISON said: Upon these questions I am paired with Mr. Strouse. I should vote in the affirmative and he would vote in the negative.

Mr. BAKER said: Not being sufficiently advised of the truth of all the averments in the preamble, I vote "no."

Mr. ANCONA said: My colleague, Mr. Strouse, is absent on leave and is paired with Mr. Allison.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT RAILROAD PROPERTY.

The next resolution was the following, submitted by Mr. KELLEY on the 28th of May, and laid over one day under the rule:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish to the House of Representatives a schedule of all railroad property which was in the possession of the Government on May 1, 1865, whether held by right of capture or by purchase, and if by purchase, stating the cost. Also, what disposition has been made of such property; if sold, whether for cash or credit; and if for credit, under what law or authority, and whether the purchase money has been paid, or what steps have been taken to recover it.

Mr. KELLEY called the previous question upon agreeing to the resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. KELLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PURCHASE AND SALE OF GOLD AND BONDS.

The next resolution lying over under the rule was the following, submitted by Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, on the 28th of May:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House how much gold belonging to the Government of the United States has been sold since the 1st day of January, 1866, the date and amount, by whom sold, the compensation allowed for such sales, and the premium received; also, whether any gold has been bought for the Treasury since that date, and if so, the amounts and dates of such purchases, the amount of premium paid, and who acted as agents in making such purchases; also, whether any bonds of the United States have been bought for the Treasury since that date, the dates and amounts of such purchases, the amounts paid for the same, and the character and denomination of said bonds.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to modify the resolution. I therefore move to amend the resolution by striking out after the word "also" the following:

Whether any bonds of the United States have been bought for the Treasury since that date, the dates and amounts of such purchases, the amounts paid for the same, and the character and denomination of said bonds.

And inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Whether any bonds of the United States have been bought or sold for the Treasury since that date, the dates and amounts of such purchases or sales, the amounts paid or received for the same, and the character and denomination of said bonds.

And upon the resolution and amendment I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GUARANTYING MEXICAN BONDS.

The next business was the consideration of the following series of resolutions, submitted by Mr. DAWSON on the 19th of March, and lying over under the rule:

Resolved, That the United States cannot guaranty the bonds of the Mexican or any other Government without impairing her own credit and imposing new burdens upon her people.

Resolved, That the sacred faith of the American people is pledged to the payment of our public debt, and that it is unwise to complicate our financial affairs by the assumption of the obligations of other countries.

Resolved, That the true policy of the United States is, in the language of Mr. Jefferson, "peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations; entangling alliances with none."

Mr. DAWSON. I call the previous question.

Mr. ORTH. I would suggest to my colleague on the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. Dawson] that these resolutions better be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. DAWSON. I think it is a very plain proposition, and therefore must insist upon my call for the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope my colleague will let those resolutions lie over for one week. There does not seem to be any necessity for their passage at this time.

Mr. DAWSON. I would be very willing to have these resolutions lay over were it not that I am anxious to test the sense of the House upon them. If they go over they will very likely be postponed till the close of the session, and we would have no vote upon them at all. I must therefore insist upon the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I hope the previous question will not be seconded.

The question was taken upon seconding the call for the previous question; and upon a division, there were—ayes 30, noes 57; no quorum voting.

Mr. DAWSON. It being manifest that a majority of the House are opposed to voting upon these resolutions without some discussion, I will yield to that feeling, and withdraw the call for the previous question upon the adoption of the resolutions, and move now to refer the resolutions to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; and upon that motion I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, which was on agreeing to the motion to refer.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to refer the resolutions to the Committee on Foreign Affairs was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL REPORTS OF 1864.

The next resolution lying over under the rule was the following, submitted by Mr. MILLER on the 19th of March:

Whereas it is alleged that twenty-five thousand less copies of the Agricultural Reports of 1864 have been printed than those of previous years; and whereas the type has not yet been distributed: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be, and are hereby, authorized and required to inquire into the expediency of ordering twenty-five thousand copies of the Agricultural Reports of 1864, and report accordingly.

Mr. LAFLIN. If I understand this resolution it is simply a resolution of inquiry. I see no objection to its adoption.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TRANSIT FROM THE WEST TO THE ATLANTIC.

The next resolution was the following, submitted on the 2d of April by Mr. RAYMOND, which, debate arising thereon, had been laid over under the rules:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That a commission of five persons be appointed by the President of the United States to consider and report to Congress at its next session upon the necessity of some more speedy, cheap, and reliable means of transportation between the western States and the Atlantic seaboard; and to submit some plan, whether by law or treaty, whereby the national Government can aid in providing for said necessity if it shall be found to exist: Provided, That said commissioners shall receive no compensation for their services, and no payment of any kind except for such traveling expenses as they may actually incur in discharging the duties imposed upon them by this resolution.

Mr. RAYMOND. I suggest that this resolution be laid over informally under the rules.

The SPEAKER. That will be done if there be no objection. The resolution will again be reached when the call of States and Territories has been concluded.

There being no objection, the resolution was laid over informally.

FRAUDS UPON THE REVENUE.

The next resolution was the following, submitted on the 23d of April by Mr. HIGBY; which, debate arising thereon, had been laid over under the rules:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Expenditures be instructed to investigate the compromises of frauds upon the revenue which are alleged to have taken place in connection with the custom-house at Boston and to ascertain what disposition has been made of the moneys paid under such compromises; also, to investigate such other alleged frauds upon the customs or internal revenue as they may deem advisable, and whether any vexatious suits have been commenced against importers and others brought or instigated by any person or persons connected with the customs or internal revenue service in the cities of Boston or New York; and that the committee be authorized to send for persons and papers; and if, in their judgment, it shall be necessary and most economical to take testimony in Boston or New York by such members of the committee as they may designate, not exceeding five in number, such designated members of the committee may have leave to sit during the recess of Congress for the purpose of such investigation, and with the aforesaid powers and authority.

The SPEAKER. Another resolution covering the same object as this was subsequently introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] under a suspension of the rules, and was adopted. If there is no objection, this resolution will be considered as laid upon the table.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER announced as the next business in order the call of States and Territories in inverse order for the introduction of resolutions and bills on leave.

NEW EXECUTIVE MANSION.

Mr. NIBLACK submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be instructed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of making provision for the erection of a new Executive Mansion for the use of the President of the United States, and in case it shall be so found proper and expedient, then that said committee be further instructed to inquire into the expediency of setting apart the present Executive Mansion for the use of the State Department, and to report by bill or otherwise.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. NIBLACK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM H. RICKHART.

Mr. DEFREES introduced a bill authorizing the payment of bounty due to Sergeant William H. Rickhart, a discharged soldier of the twentieth Indiana Veteran volunteers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RECOGNITION OF FENIAN BELLIGERENCY.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio, submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That whereas the recent successes which have attended the demonstrations of the Fenian organization, with the avowed purpose of liberating Ireland from the oppressive rule of Great Britain, according to the laws of nations as interpreted by the British authorities, entitle said Fenian organization to be regarded with respect and as entitled to the rights of belligerents, [laughter,] that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be requested to inquire into the propriety of recommending such action as may be proper to secure that object.

Mr. ROGERS. Is this resolution debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The gentleman from Ohio has demanded the previous question.

Mr. ROGERS. Well, I hope the resolution will be adopted.

The previous question was not seconded; there being—ayes fifteen, noes not counted.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Debate arising, the resolution goes over under the rule.

CLERK TO A COMMITTEE.

Mr. PHELPS submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the resolution of this House providing for the employment of a clerk by the Committee on the Militia be, and the same is hereby rescinded.

MEMPHIS RIOT.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, moved that the usual number of copies of the report of Major General Stoneman in reference to the Memphis riot be printed for the use of the House; which, under the law, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

MILEAGE.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted the following preamble and resolutions, on which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas the compensation to members of Congress for mileage was fixed at a time when the distance of those residing farthest from the capital was not half so great as that of a very large portion of the members at the present day, and when, too, travel was often on horseback, or at least in coaches, thus involving great delays and expense as compared with the present mode of travel by rail and free tickets, and those more remote from the capital are enabled to draw more money in mileage than in their whole salary and daily pay, to the great disparagement of those who reside near the capital, and are alike subjected to the largely increased cost of living as compared with what it was at the time such salary and daily pay were fixed: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be instructed to bring in a bill so regulating and equalizing the mileage and pay of members of Congress as will distribute among all of them the aggregate now paid in just proportion to the expenses necessarily incurred while at the capital and in traveling to and from the same: Provided, That the whole amount to be so paid shall not exceed the whole amount now paid for salary and mileage.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House the respective amounts drawn by the several members of both branches of the Thirty-Eighth Congress as salary and as mileage separately, together with the number of miles for which each one was paid.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I suggest to the gentleman to refer the resolutions to the Committee on Mileage. The law now fixes the pay of members of Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON. I propose to have the law remedied. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 37; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rules, ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. FARNSWORTH and BOYER.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 44.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

The preamble and resolutions were adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The morning hour having expired, the House, agreeably to order, resumed the consideration of House bill No. 543, to restore to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights, on which Mr. HART was entitled to the floor.

Mr. HART. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, it is apparent that this House is not prepared to seize upon the full measure of the opportunity now presented for a full, just, and final settlement of the grave questions involved in the restoration of the insurgent States to their practical relations with the Government of the United States. I fear that that comprehensive statesmanship which cares for posterity as well as for itself will not leave its impress upon the measure we are now considering. My fear does not arise from any apprehension that we are likely to go too far and make our legislation too searching and far-reaching. Such a result is rarely accomplished by men. Radical ideas are always, in a greater or less degree, weighed down and impeded in their onward march by the possessors of that element of timidity which we are accustomed to call conservatism. No great reform is ever accomplished with the aid of those who, for the time being, denominate themselves conservatives. Such persons always insist upon having things as they are, and continuing them in that state forever. There is not enough of this element in this Congress to prevent a change in the existing state of affairs; but there is sufficient to prevent such a change being made as would secure to this Republic a future of rest. We will stop short of the point of absolute safety; but we nevertheless will accomplish a great work, which time will carry on and complete.

This Government needs the active support in the insurgent States of all its true friends. Every man in those States who is a friend to the Government of the United States ought to be intrusted with the ballot in its defense. A majority of the people of those States who engaged in the rebellion are as hostile to the Government now as they were at any period of the war. The Union men are in a hopeless minority in most of those States, and will so remain for many years unless some means are devised to reënforce them by extending the right of suffrage to the great column of loyal citizens ready at any moment to act with the white Unionists in a common political defense of themselves and of the Government. Many of the loyal whites of the South are anxious to be thus reënforced. Some of them have told me that they hoped Congress would put something into its legislation for the restoration of the insurgent States which would enable them to raise the issue of impartial suffrage in their several States. Upon being so informed I proposed the following amendment to the bill now under consideration:

That whenever the above-recited amendment shall have become part of the Constitution of the United States, and any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the same, and shall have modified its constitution and laws in conformity therewith, the Senators and Representatives from such State, if found duly elected and qualified, may, after having taken the required oaths of office, be admitted into Congress as such: Provided, That if any State, after ratifying said amendment and conforming its constitution and laws therewith, shall establish an equal and just system of suffrage for all male citizens within its jurisdiction who are not less than twenty-one years of age, the Senators and Representatives from such State shall be admitted as aforesaid, without being required to await the action of other States on said amendment: And provided further, That nothing in this section contained shall be so construed as to require the disfranchisement of any loyal person who is now entitled to vote.

This amendment has been examined by several of the earnest Union men of the South now in this city, and has received their approval. They assert that it will afford them an opportunity to raise the issue of impartial suffrage, with a fair prospect of success, in several of the insurrectionary States, and avow that a failure to secure such suffrage will seal the doom of the true loyalists of the southern States. Hence I urge that if the pleadings of justice are not sufficient to secure the adoption of this amendment let us at least yield to the promptings of expediency, and give this means of defense to those who desire it.

But, sir, not only do the white loyalists of the South need the aid of the votes of every loyal man in the South, but the Republic also needs them. The destructive doctrine of secession is not dead, nor is it even sleeping. It is as firmly rooted in the minds of those who waged war to enforce it as it was before the first gun was fired in the late great civil war. They have not yielded one iota of the claim they made of the right of a State to secede, and we need votes as well as theories to overcome and crush out the life of this mischievous heresy. The doctrine of the unity of the Republic needs the vote of every friend in the southern States. Why, sir, even the President himself does not regard this question as finally decided by the conflict of arms. In his last annual message the following singular passage occurs:

"It is manifest that treason, most flagrant in its character, has been committed. Persons who are charged with its commission should have fair and impartial trials in the highest civil tribunals of the country, in order that the Constitution and the laws may be fully vindicated: the truth clearly established and affirmed that treason is a crime, that traitors should be punished and the offense made infamous; and, at the same time, that the question may be judicially settled, finally and forever, that no State of its own will has the right to renounce its place in the Union."

This suggestion is enough to cause every secessionist in the country to rejoice, for it merely changes the venue from "sovereign conventions" of the States to the courts. In so far as this passage affirms the existence of the crime of treason and pronounces in favor of its punishment, it is well enough, but when it follows this with the declaration that treason trials are desirable not alone for the punishment of traitors but also "that the question may be judicially settled, finally and forever, that no State of its own will has the right to renounce its place in the Union," it becomes freighted with an amount of mischief which never should have found place in a President's message. The right of a State to renounce its place in the Union never had any existence, and is, therefore, not a question for judicial determination. The power of a State to renounce its place in the Union was a question for armies to decide. Finally and forever it has been decided by the tribunal to which it was referred unless it be unsettled by casting it into the jurisdiction of the courts, as is suggested in the passage which I have quoted from the message of the President.

If a State has a right to "renounce its place in the Union" the citizens of the State have a right to accept its decision and follow its fortunes. This hypothetical proposition involves the very life of the nation, the unity of the Republic. If it may be determined judicially disaster must result, no matter on which side the decision may stand. If the "right to renounce" be affirmed, then there is no treason and the Union is dissolved. If it be denied, another trial may reverse the judgment, so that certainty of result would have disunion alone for a handmaid, for a decree of dissolution would be the only one not subject to reversal.

The unity of this Republic needs not to be judicially pronounced. It is the Republic. Courts have nothing to do with it. It would be a crime against the people for judges to permit its discussion, and judicial treason for them to assume jurisdiction over it. Armies alone can discuss it. Battles alone can decide it. All other tribunals must accept the unity of the nation as a fact about which hangs no uncertainty, and concerning which there must be no disputation. The people settled this question when they ordained the Government, and left no pretense for President or judge or legislator to meddle with it. From "we, the people of the United States," comes the high command to Executive, court, and Congress to accept without doubting, to defend without flinching, to enforce by all the powers embodied in the Constitution, including the grand and unlimited powers of the right of self-preservation, the sovereign unity which constitutes us a nation.

All true friends of the country must regret that the President permitted this serpent to nestle itself in his message. The certainty of a proper determination of the question by the Supreme Court of the United States as now constituted is no apology for the presence of the mischievous thing. The death of judges and the mutations of parties are unsafe preservers of judicial decrees. The tenure of office of a judge, although it be for life, is too short wherewith to measure the life of a nation. The purity and patriotism of particular judges are no sure guarantees that the same bright qualities will always abide with the court, for judges die but courts do not. Patriots of today may be succeeded by conspirators to-morrow; but the court remains. Treason lurked in this Hall. It may at some time be enrobed on the bench of the Supreme Court. These considerations all show how grave would be the blunder of submitting as a question for the decision of any court the "right of a State to renounce its place in the Union," and that the question cannot be "settled finally and forever" by casting it into the ever-changing stream of judicial opinion.

Perhaps the convention of Georgia believed the "right of a State to renounce its place in the Union" a question for judicial decision, and therefore repealed the ordinance of secession which plunged that State into war instead of declaring it null and void. Doubtless Jeff. Davis, should he ever be brought to trial, would like to have his case crowned with a judicial affirmation of the right of a State to renounce its place in the Union, and thereby win for himself and for the South that which armies and battle and all the woes of war could not secure for them—the disintegration of this Republic.

Courts can be changed, destroyed, and created by Congress and the President. The future may find an outgoing Congress and a retiring President turning in the last few months of their power upon the Supreme Court, and changing its organization or adding to the number of its members, and in this way securing a majority to pronounce the right of the States to retire from the Union. Under cover of this decision the southern States may again pass their ordinances of secession, organize a provisional government, and elect the retiring President of the United States president of the rebel government. Let the treacherous Congress go one step further, and allow the people of this District to decide with which government they will cast their lot. Let the traitorous court make one more decision in a manufactured case and declare this action of Congress and the people of this District valid. This done, and you find before the arrival of the day for the inauguration of the President-elect of the United States the Republic dissolved by decree of court, a new Government in possession of your capital, and ruin and anarchy apportioned to your people.

This is disunion made easy; and yet it is not more unlikely to happen, if you once acknowledge the right of the courts to pass upon the great question of national unity, than was the recent gigantic rebellion. Once admit that the right of a State to secede from the Union is a debatable question to be determined by the courts, and you will have done more toward the destruction of this Government than was ever done by armed treason on the field of battle. Let this power be conceded to the courts, and to them will traitors hereafter direct their corps of sappers and miners for the destruction of the Government. No need of armies will traitors feel if judges can do this work. In the solemn stillness of the hall of the Supreme Court may that dread work then be done which could not be accomplished amid the most terrific thunders of the recent awful struggle between treason and the Republic. The black gown may be more potent than the gray uniform. The manuscript of a judge may most fearfully demonstrate the saying that the pen is mightier than the sword.

Mr. Speaker, I do not charge the President with a purpose to bring upon the nation the evils which must inevitably follow a practical application of the doctrine of his message to the affairs of the country. He evidently expects but one result, a denial of the right of a State of its own will to renounce its place in the Union. The danger does not lie in the intention of the President but in the doctrine itself. Calhoun did not regard his theory of State rights as one which would end in war whenever a State should attempt to put it in practice. We know how fearfully he was mistaken. Four years of desolating war, three hundred thousand graves of loyal men, hundreds of thousands of widows and orphans, untold numbers of desolate hearth circles, sorrows and heart pangs which can only be made known by the unfoldings of that day which shall number the crimes and woes of the human race, all stand as witnesses now, or will, in the coming times, of the wickedness which lurked in the theory of Calhoun. His theory provided the rallying point for that band of conspirators and array of traitors which covered this land with the woes of war. His criminality is measured by the direful results of his teachings, and not by his intentions. His theory was that a State possessed the right to peacefully retire from the Union. He asserted the right and did not seem to realize that if it should be disputed the issue joined could only be tried by the tribunal of war. His disciples affirmed it. It was disputed. The issue was tried by armies and resolved in favor of the indissoluble unity of the Republic. Shall we now permit an appeal from this decision to the courts of the nation? Is not the question settled? Where is this thing to end? When shall we know that we are a nation?

Sir, in the suggestion of the President, that this question can go to the courts, lurks all of the mischief which resulted from the theory of Calhoun. It will form the central idea around which defeated rebels will rally in the future. However pure the President's intentions may have been when he penned the passage to which I have referred, he has officially announced an idea which portends a troublous future unless we now erect barriers which it will not be able to surmount.

I have indicated the avenues through which this mischievous idea may wend its way to national disaster. It is not in our power to destroy the idea, but we may strip it of its power to accomplish evil. How shall we do this? Simply by extending the protective rebel power of the ballot to all citizens of the States who sympathized with and fought for the cause of the Republic. Give to all such the throbbing power of the ballot and you blast the hopes of secessionists, whether they rest on the power of arms or the subtle decisions of courts. Reinforce the Republic with the votes of those who wish it well, and it may laugh at the efforts of those who purpose evil. Have we courage to do this? I fear not. But that I am willing to do it and accept the consequences, whatever they may be to myself, I desire to have entered upon the records of this Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I very well know that strong men dwarf in the presence of the proposition which I advocate. I know that many look forward to the fall elections and shiver in the presence of impartial suffrage. That iron-cased prejudice which frowns upon those who stand by the right in political action and even-handed justice in national conduct will, I fear, prove too strong for the plea which I make. But in the face of this fact, I must assert that the political future of any number of members of this House is of small consequence when compared with the triumph of correct principles in the contest in which we are now engaged and the security of the Republic. It is better for us to suffer individual defeat than national disaster.

Sir, I beg the members of this House to remember that we are not acting for ourselves alone, but that on our action rests also the weal or woe of posterity. To us are committed the treasures of those who are to come after us; for what we possess we are indebted to those who have preceded us. We have discovered wherein they were at fault. The experience which we have, had it been possessed by them, would have saved us from the bitter trials through which we have passed. Whatever adjustment we may make of the great questions with which we are now dealing should be weighed in the balance of that impartial justice which preserves a just division between thought for ourselves and of care for those who in future time are to pass judgment on our action in the light of the experience it will provide for them. We will be recreant to our duty if we leave any of the work which we should complete to pass from our hands unfinished to trouble posterity. We now have the power to break the last hope of the enemies of this Republic. Divide the political power of the insurgent States between those who carried them into rebellion and the race which the rebellion emancipated, and we will have broken the last link in that chain of ambition and prejudice which bound the possessors of political power in the South into a common mass of hostility to the Government of the United States. This once accomplished and the people of those States will divide into parties so nearly equally balanced on all issues that there will be no longer danger to be feared from the doctrine of secession in whatsoever form it may be presented, whether by State action or by judicial decree. We will be safe and posterity will be safe; and here, in the language of J. Stuart Mill,

"I beg very strongly indeed to press upon the House the duty of taking these things into serious consideration in the name of that dutiful concern for posterity which has been very strong in every nation that ever did anything great, and which has never left the minds of any such nation until, as in the case of the Romans under the empire, it was already falling into decrepitude and ceasing to be a nation."

"Whatever has been done for mankind by the idea of posterity; whatever has been done for mankind by philanthropic concern for posterity; by a conscientious sense of duty for posterity—even by the less pure but still noble ambition of being honored by them—all this we owe to posterity, and all this it is our duty, to the best of our limited ability, to repay. All of the great deeds of the founders of nations, and of those second founders of nations, the great reformers; all that has been done for us by the authors of those laws and institutions to which free countries are indebted for their freedom, and well-governed countries for their good governments; all the heroic lives that have been led and the deaths which have been died in defense of liberty and law, against despotism and tyranny, from Marathon and Salamis down to Leipsic and Waterloo; all those traditions of wisdom and of virtue which are enshrined in the history and literature of the past; all the schools and universities by which the culture of a former time has been brought down to us, and all that culture itself—all that we owe to the great masters of human thought, to the great masters of human emotion—all this is ours because those who preceded us have taken thought for posterity."

Sir, these golden sentences are worthy of England's great thinker. They present to us a rule of conduct which, if followed, cannot lead to disaster. They breathe the spirit of the American people of the days when our Constitution was formed, when it was declared:

"We, the people of the United States, in order * * * to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

Mindful of posterity were they who made our Constitution; mistaken in some things, it is true; but in none which we may not now correct, in none which we do not know needs correction. If we will but do our duty as well as we know it, banishing those things from our deliberations which are but personal to ourselves or our party, we will leave to posterity little ground to complain of us. We know that impartial suffrage in the insurgent States would leave but little for posterity to quarrel over; but the fall elections lie between us and posterity, and some fear the result of the former more than they consider the welfare of the latter. If we were posterity and posterity us, our duty relative to our present action would doubtless be modified, and the result would be greater wisdom than we are likely to manifest. We will stop short of what most of us know we ought to do. I do not expect my amendment to be adopted, and even it stops short of what ought to be done. Loyal men, of whatever color, have more right to the ballot than have disloyal men, however white they may be. The Government needs friends at the polls rather than enemies, but the latter are more likely to get there in the rebel States than the former. If this be wisdom, the most made of it will be but little.

Mr. Speaker, I will vote for the best thing we can get as evidenced by the last thing upon which we may be called to vote; but I hope this may not be the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.] I look upon that as the embodiment of our greatest danger. The President is opposed to the reconstruction policy of Congress. He is opposed to the execution of any other conditions precedent to the full representation of the rebel States in Congress than those which he has already imposed. Adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] and the door is thrown wide open to the full representation of the rebel States in Congress without the least change having been made in the Constitution of the United States other than that abolishing slavery. Every rebel State may adopt the present proposed amendment of the Constitution, and thus become entitled to representation, and meet us with full delegations at the next session of this Congress, without a single change having in the mean time been made in the Constitution. The power which defeated the election of a Senator in New Jersey may defeat the proposed amendment of the Constitution in enough of the northern States to prevent it becoming a part of the organic law of the Republic. In view of this possible result I beg this House not to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio. Better keep these grave questions within our own control than to turn them over to the tender mercies of executive influence and patronage; there may be more shovels in the land.

Mr. Speaker, I have passed beyond the limits of the time contemplated by me when I commenced these remarks. I can but hope that our present action will be as wise as I feel assured the ultimate result will be. We may determine these issues now or leave them to the future. We may be wise or foolish as we will, but the end will be what justice demands. We may advance or obstruct the solution of our national difficulties, but we cannot change the decrees of Him who of one blood made all of the nations of the earth. "Equal and exact justice to all men" is the short road out of all our national troubles. We may take this or some more circuitous route; both will end at the same point. We have our election between a short journey and a long one. We may reach the end by the former fresh and vigorous and strong, or we may arrive at it by the latter wearied and worn and ruined. I prefer the former; let those take the latter who choose; and if such there be, and I must be dragged along with them, I will go, but I shall enter my protest at the starting-point and hurry through as well as I may. And now, Mr. Speaker, that my views are upon the records of this Congress, I leave them to the judgment of the future, content to abide by the decree whatever it may be.

Mr. ROUSSEAU obtained the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. I move, with the permission of the gentleman from Kentucky, that this subject be postponed until Wednesday next.

Mr. LE BLOND. I ask the learned chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary one question in reference to the position he has taken. If I understood him aright, he said that it would be judicial treason for the Supreme Court of the United States to decide whether a State had the right to go out of the Union under the Constitution. I ask the gentleman the question: suppose Mr. Davis was on his trial and his counsel were to contend, under the Constitution, the State had a right to go out of the Union, the counsel for the Government denying it, what becomes of the duty of the Supreme Court under the law?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will state to the gentleman what I think to be the duty of the Supreme Court. It is simply to say to Mr. Davis's attorney and to the attorneys of the Government if they should join any such issue, "This is an issue which cannot be tried in this court."

Mr. LE BLOND. I ask the gentleman if it is not a judicial question, or a question with reference to the construction of the Constitution itself, and if it does not come within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. My answer to that is, it is not a judicial question in any sense of the term. It is a political question which the people of this country decided when they made the Constitution, and they have never, by constitutional or other means, conferred upon the Supreme Court of the United States any right whatever to entertain an issue of that kind, namely, to determine upon the question as to whether this is a Government or not.

Mr. LE BLOND. I ask the gentleman if it is not a question of construction of the Constitution purely, which the Supreme Court, above all others, is the proper tribunal to determine.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I answer that it is not a question of construction. And I would like to ask the gentleman whether he believes it is a question which should go to the courts for adjudication.

Mr. LE BLOND. Why certainly I do. I believe it is a question that belongs to the Supreme Court as well as to the whole American people. I do not believe, for one, that a State can ever go out of this Union. I have repeatedly put myself on the record on that question; a State once in the Union, always in the Union. But when that question is once presented, as it must be if Jefferson Davis is put upon his trial, it must be decided. Because it is one ground of defense that he would make. If the States have not that constitutional power he is guilty of treason, but if they have it he is not guilty of it. Hence it is a judicial question, and must be determined by the Supreme Court.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. As the gentleman has answered one question, I desire now to ask him another. Does he believe that Jefferson Davis has committed the crime of treason against this Government?

Mr. LE BLOND. Why, sir, I have repeatedly said I believe it. I believe that all those men who have taken up arms against the Federal Government are guilty of treason.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will state in reply to the gentleman that he has given a direct answer to the question which he first propounded to me. If Jefferson Davis has committed treason then of course the State of Mississippi had no right to go out of this Union. Now, he proposes to have Jefferson Davis indicted for the crime of treason, to have that indictment presented to the courts of the United States, and then to ask the judge to determine first whether there is such a thing as the crime of treason by proceeding to trial.

Mr. LE BLOND. Will the gentleman allow a moment? It is the gentleman's opinion that a State has not the right to go out of the Union. That is my opinion. But Salmon P. Chase, and quite a number of distinguished statesmen both North and South, have in days gone by held differently, namely, that a State had a right to go out of the Union. So that it is a question, and being a question, if presented to the Supreme Court it must be decided by that tribunal, the gentleman's opinion to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not know whether Chief Justice Chase ever expressed such an opinion or not. I do not believe he did, although, doubtless, the gentleman believes his own assertion, and has a reason for desiring this question to go to the Supreme Court. If Chief Justice Chase has already made up an opinion that a State has a right to secede, and should carry it out in the decision which the gentleman desires he should make on this question, of course Jefferson Davis must be acquitted.

Mr. LE BLOND. I say to the gentleman that I desire no such thing. I do not desire the Supreme Court to make any such decision, nor do I believe they will.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then the gentleman certainly does not believe that Chief Justice Chase, who will probably preside in the court which will try Jefferson Davis, primarily entertains the opinion which the gentleman attributed to him; because it is presumed if he does honestly hold that this question should be entertained by him in the court, he will decide in accordance with that opinion.

Mr. LE BLOND. I hope that the Chief Justice by this time has changed his opinions and become a much better man than he used to be.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am glad that the gentleman is increasing in his respect for the Chief Justice. Now, just a word more. I wish it to be distinctly understood that the doctrines which are contained in the remarks which I submitted this morning I believe to be not only good law but absolutely necessary for the safety and perpetuity of this Government. If we, as I then remarked, throw this question into the courts—a question which was decided originally by the people and subsequently by arms—we are unsettling the foundations of the Government, and we may find at some period in the future that courts made up by those who may have possession of the Government, in sympathy with this theory, will dissolve this Government by a decree of the court, or at least cast it into anarchy universal. Now, I do not want any such result, and therefore I did say, and I repeat it, that for any judge of the United States to entertain this question, decided at the commencement of the Government and since affirmed by the armies, would be judicial treason against the Government of the United States.

Mr. MORRILL. I now move to postpone the special order until Wednesday next after the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 493) granting a pension to Mrs. Joanna Winans;

An act (H. R. No. 216) for the relief of Cordelia Murray;

An act (H. R. No. 363) supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions;

An act (H. R. No. 345) for the relief of Christina Elder;

An act (H. R. No. 462) granting a pension to Mrs. Sally Andrews; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 142) authorizing the Postmaster General to pay additional salary to letter carriers in San Francisco.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HOLMES. I ask indefinite leave of absence for my colleague from New York, Mr. HUBBARD.

No objection was made, and the leave of absence was granted.

Mr. BAKER. I ask leave of absence for three days for my colleague, Mr. Cook.

No objection was made, and the leave of absence was granted.

PENNSYLVANIA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. MARSHALL. I rise to a question of privilege. I present additional evidence in the case of Koontz against Coffroth, and move that it be referred to the Committee of Elections and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

REPRESENTATIVES FROM MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. MARSHALL. I wish to present the credentials of Hon. A. M. West, a member-elect from the State of Mississippi.

The credentials were referred, under the rule, to the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. MARSHALL. I also present the proclamation of the Governor of Mississippi in regard to the representatives-elect from that State.

The proclamation was referred to the joint committee on reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' UNION.

Mr. COBB, under leave heretofore granted to report at any time, reported back from the Committee for the District of Columbia, bill of the House No. 587, to incorporate the Soldiers' and Sailors' Union of Washington, District of Columbia, without amendment, and with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ANNA E. WARD.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon House bill No. 459, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 459) granting a pension to Anna E. Ward, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their amendment to said bill.

H. S. LANE,
JAMES GUTHRIE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
NELSON TAYLOR,
P. SAWYER,
A. HARDING,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR moved to reconsider the vote. by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF THE ARMY.

The House then resumed the consideration of the special order, being House bill No. 450, to reduce and establish the pay of the officers and to regulate the pay of the soldiers of the armies of the United States, upon which Mr. WOODBRIDGE was entitled to the floor.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I did not suppose that this bill would come before the House to-day. The reconstruction project was assigned for this time, and I supposed it would occupy at least until Wednesday. But as that has been laid aside I will briefly present the views I entertain respecting the bill which has been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Sir, while I am opposed to the bill both in its principles and details, I do not intend to cast any insinuations against the committee or against any conclusions to which they have arrived, upon the basis that they, or any of them, have been swayed either by passion or prejudice. The bill proposes to equalize the pay of the officers of the Army and to diminish the expense of the Army; or, in other words, to diminish, in the aggregate at least, the pay of the officers.

If it did equalize the pay of the officers of the Army, so far as that goes it would meet with my approval. But I expect to show, in the very brief remarks I shall make, that instead of equalizing the pay of officers it takes away the equalization which now exists. If the bill provides for diminishing the pay of the officers of the Army, as it doubtless does, I oppose it in that regard, because it is wrong.

Any gentleman who will look at the past or consider the present, will, in my judgment, acknowledge at once that the pay of officers of the Army is not greater than it ought to be. The past demonstrates that officers who have died have left nothing except pensions to their widows and the charity of friends for their children. Scarcely an officer in the Army, to my knowledge, has died leaving a competence to his family. They have left to them a good name—a name made sacred by heroic deeds and by adherence to the Constitution and laws of their country, and they have left nothing else. Among the living, what is true in fact? Take them in Washington, where it is claimed that increased and improper pay is allowed. There are no officers here below the grade of a general officer who can meet those amenities of life which are cast upon them by reason of their position in society. There are no officers here who can keep their carriage; there are no officers here who can entertain their friends. And in despite of the pay the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs complains of so much, they live in fear lest by the utmost economy they shall not be able to make the salaries which Government gives them meet the expenses of their families.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] who has looked into this subject may, as he says, have no prejudice against the regular Army, and I am quite sure that if he had it would not, if he knew it, influence his conscious judgment. If prejudices do exist in his mind against this or that branch of the regular service, I am sure they arise without his knowledge of their existence. But the mechanism of the mind is more complicated than the mechanism of a watch, and unawares to himself, here and there may crowd in a prejudice or a feeling which, in spite of himself, might influence his judgment on this great question.

The first argument which the gentleman [Mr. SCHENCK] advances is that it is desirable to have an equalization of pay, so that the country may know what an officer of the Army receives. Sir, there are but two particulars under the present law where the pay of officers without particular inquiry cannot be known; those particulars are in commutation for quarters and commutation for fuel. In different parts of the country the price for quarters and fuel varies so greatly that it cannot be known what the commutation is in such cases. It is to be determined by those who know, and who are presumed to be honorable gentlemen, that when commutation for quarters and fuel are allowed, they are to be furnished at the price which the officer is bound to pay in the locality where he is stationed.

Sir, independently of this, any one who takes it upon himself to inquire can know what the pay of an officer of the Army is. He can learn from the reports made yearly by the War Department that an officer of a certain rank is entitled to so many servants, so much allowance for servants and for servants' clothing, so many horses, so much allowance for the forage of those horses. Thus everything that relates to the pay is specified; and any one who takes the pains to inquire can ascertain what that pay is.

I am somewhat astonished that my friend from Ohio should make the complaint that the pay of Army officers cannot be ascertained. Why, sir, how is it with the civil officers of this Government? How many men in this country understand what is the pay of the Governors and secretaries of our Territories? How many men know the gross amount of the fees and emoluments of the collectors of the ports of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and the other great ports of the United States? Who can tell how much these and hundreds of other officers receive under the civil administration of the Government? Their compensation cannot be ascertained except by the most diligent inquiry, far more diligent than that demanded to ascertain the pay of any officer of the Army? Yet we do not hear any complaint that the people do not know what this or that civil officer is paid. The people have faith in Congress that it will enact proper laws, faith in the Executive that those laws will be properly administered, faith in the heads of the Departments that they will exercise properly and honestly the prerogatives given to them under the law. So far as the argument goes it seems to me that it amounts to nothing.

But, sir, the gentleman from Ohio says that he desires to put the pay of the Army upon a par with the pay of the Navy. In that position I agree with him. Both branches of the service should be equally paid, I admit. If the pay of the officers of the Navy is not enough, I am ready to give my vote to increase it. When the great war broke out each branch of the service proved itself faithful. The country demanded and expected that both the Army and the Navy would do their duty, and neither failed. One produced, as its exponent, the modest and heroic Farragut, and the other the reticent, indomitable, and unconquerable Grant. Sir, they have all done their duty. They all deserve well of Congress and the country; and so far as we can, with due regard to the finances of the nation, we should see that the officers and men, both of the Army and Navy, who have borne our flag through the bloodiest war in the history of the world, shall receive a compensation which will at least enable them to occupy a respectable position in society.

It is impossible to place the pay of the officers of the Army and the Navy upon the same basis. It has never been done in any nation on the face of the earth. England and France pay their naval officers by fixed salaries. Yet in regard to the pay of the Army, both England and France, after the experience of more than a century, have adopted and now pursue the same principle which we have adopted and which is embodied in the existing law of the land. Why, sir, you cannot have commutation for fuel and quarters for a naval officer. His home is on the sea; his ship is his home. His quarters and his fuel are furnished to him there. In view of the necessities incident to his vocation, when he leaves the shore of his country, he lays in a supply which costs him more than he will be obliged to pay in any foreign port.

And there is a sliding scale in the Navy. An officer in command of a vessel has not the same pay as an officer of the same rank in command of a squadron or a fleet. And officers of the Navy aboard ship have allowances which officers of the Army do not have. They are in mess and, as it were, one family aboard ship. The Government provides a steward for them, paid by the Government, who ministers to their wants and does all which a servant is supposed to do. When the officer goes ashore waiting orders he does not get the same pay. Even when on shore the pay of officers of the Navy varies. The pay of an officer of the same rank in the Navy is not the same at the navy-yards of Brooklyn, Portsmouth, Norfolk, and Charlestown. There is a difference of pay of officers of the same rank. Why? Because the expenses of living are greater at one place than at another.

The officers ashore at different places have different pay. When an officer is on shore duty he gets ordinarily his fuel and has his quarters. An officer waiting orders receives less pay than an officer doing duty, and simply because he is not in active service. He is supposed to hold himself in readiness for orders. The expenses of an officer waiting orders are greater than of an officer who has an indefinite leave of absence, and hence the pay of an officer waiting orders is larger than that of an officer who is on an indefinite leave of absence. The latter may take his family into the interior and live at such expense as he pleases.

But there is no waiting orders in the Army. An officer in the Navy arrives at port in command of a vessel which is laid up for repairs for a year or two has to wait for orders. He has to wait until the ship is put into commission again. During that time he is not actually in service. He is waiting orders. Now the officer of the Army has not that privilege. I think the leave of an officer of the Army is only sixty days, and if he stays beyond that his pay, or a portion of it, is stopped.

Mr. Speaker, the two branches of the service are entirely different. The officers of the Navy have prize money. The recent war is an exemplification of this benefit. More than a hundred thousand dollars—so the papers report, and I presume they never lie—have been given to officers of the Navy. If the Army capture cannon, arms, and material, no matter of what value, nothing is allowed either to the officer or soldier. The contrary is the case in England.

There when an officer of the army even loses his baggage in war he is allowed for it. The Duke of Wellington, in his Peninsular campaign, when he plucked the roses which Sir John Moore had planted, was allowed the sum of $5,000,000 for property captured. And, sir, I believe that an officer in the Navy will lay up more money at the end of twenty years than an officer of the Army. Hence, I think there is no analogy between a proposition to regulate and equalize the pay of the officers of the Army and the law in regard to the pay of officers of the Navy. In the one case foreign nations, by reason of the character of the naval service, have been doing just what we are doing. In the other, both England and France, by reason of the contingencies and condition of the service of the officers of the army, have imposed just such regulations as are now imposed upon our officers, and allow just such commutations as we allow.

Now, sir, let us examine the present system and see where the necessity is of changing it. It is far easier to tear down a beautiful temple with its tasteful pillars, its graceful architecture, wherein all parts are orderly and harmonious, and its magnificent dome, than to build a better one. It is far easier to destroy social, civil, moral, or political institutions that have had the sanction of centuries than to build out of their ruins a more perfect and more just system. It will be far easier for my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] with all his military experience and knowledge, to destroy the present system, which has been applied to the Army for half a century, than to build up a new one that will either be better for the Government or more just for the Army itself.

Now, sir, what is the present system? Let us see whether it is equal or not. Why, sir, the officers of the English army get so much pay proper and certain allowances. They are sent from one quarter of the world to another; for upon the British domains the sun never sets. When they are not in locations where quarters and fuel are furnished they draw commutation. The French system is the same, only when they send an officer to Paris, instead of confining him to additional allowances, on account of the increased expenses they give him an actual increase of pay.

Where is the want of equalization in the Army? Every man of the same rank and belonging to the same arm of the service receives the same pay. And now the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] denying this, proposes to make the pay certain according to the grade of service. It is indeed a Procrustean bed. It destroys that elasticity of the system which now exists, and which ought to exist in order to work justice.

Take the cavalry service. The pay proper of a cavalry officer is greater than that of the infantry or artillery. Why? Because the necessity of the service demands it, not because the cavalry is the favorite arm, but because the officers must furnish horses and their equipment from their own pocket. In view of this increased expense it has been determined that the pay of those officers should be greater than that of officers of the artillery or infantry.

Sir, at whatever point the officer is stationed the salary is the same. There is no difference between a colonel in Washington, Iowa, or California, except that there have been times when the pay has been increased in California on account of the very greatly increased expense of living. If two officers are similarly situated their compensation is the same. One colonel, for instance, is stationed in Milwaukee and another in Washington, both belonging to the infantry or artillery. Their pay is the same, and if they have been the same length of time in the service their rations are the same, and they are allowed the same number of horses and servants.

Officers must live. They are educated for the Army, they are supposed to maintain the dignity of our flag, and are called to mingle with and do their part in society, and in order to do so, wherever they are they are now obliged to exercise an economy unknown to men in the same social position who are in civil life.

For illustration, as to the present system, the price of quarters may be much higher in California than they are in Washington; fuel may be more or less expensive in the one place than in the other. What is the result? In each place the officer being detached and not allowed in kind, as the law provides, is allowed commutation according to the actual expense.

In California it may be one price and in Washington another, but whatever it is, the officer is allowed. Now, if an officer is ordered to Washington, there can be no favoritism shown him. He is allowed what quarters and fuel cost him in Washington. The officer stationed at San Francisco is allowed what quarters and fuel cost him there, so that an officer of the same rank in San Francisco and in Washington draws precisely the same pay. This is equitable; and I think I will be able to show before I get through that if this bill is passed it will destroy the equality of pay in a way that the gentleman, with his sense of justice, would not be willing to allow.

Now, this is not a new question. It is one that has from time to time been before Congress for the last fifty years. We have had at least three reports upon the subject from Paymasters General of the Army, and I do not suppose that an officer would so far forget his position, his integrity, and his rank as a gentleman as to make a false report. In 1826 we had the report of Paymaster General Towson, when this question was up, and he by a process of reasoning, which to my mind is unanswerable, proved that the only just, equitable, and equalizing system that could be adopted in the pay of officers was the system then and now in force.

In 1856 the question came up again, and Paymaster General Larned was called upon by the Secretary of War to express his opinion. He adopted the report of General Towson and coincided with it, giving his opinion that the present is the most equal and economical system.

Then we come to 1866, when we have the report of Paymaster General Brice, a gentleman who, I believe, is the personal friend of my distinguished friend from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] He coincides with the views of Generals Towson and Larned, and adds a few additional arguments in support of the present system, which is sanctioned by experience of our own and other countries as the most just and equitable that has been devised.

Now, sir, I do believe that here and there is an old system which may be good. It is a sensible motto that "the world is governed too much." And in these modern days, if there is anything outside of armed resistance which will weaken the foundations of our Government it is the excessive legislation which modern reform imposes upon the country.

Why, sir, we have had a hundred propositions to amend the Constitution. Should they all be adopted, that sacred instrument, which has come down to us from our fathers, will be covered over with patch-work.

Now, sir, I sometimes like things because they are old. I like those principles of law which have come to us through the centuries and become a part of the common law. I do not much believe that modern civilization can improve, by new enactments, the old law; and yet, sir, at the same time, I have favored amendments to the Constitution, as the votes which I have given in this House will show.

This bill, sir, is an innovation upon this long-settled and well-adjusted policy of the country, and if passed, another Congress will be called upon to legislate for the benefit of this or the other class of officers.

It overthrows a system which has the authority and sanction of time and the intelligent judgment of those who know what the requirements of the country and the Army are.

It is amusing to hear the gentleman say that he wants to equalize the pay of the officers of the Army. Why, sir, is that so? I know it is said that there is a centripetal and not a centrifugal force so far as offices at Washington are concerned; that they are all seeking to come here and perform the duties of officers in the various Departments of the Government. Sir, I do not believe it. They are educated men, educated to arms; and when the first alarm of war was given, many of them, to my knowledge, desired to join the forces in the field. They preferred the paths of glory, though they lead but to the grave. But an officer may be in Oregon or in California; the head at Washington deems him to be possessed of those peculiar and rare qualities which fit him for a position at Washington, and issues his command to him to repair to Washington for that purpose, and he must obey the order or be dismissed the service.

The officers come to Washington because they are ordered, and not because they desire it. Their labors during the war is their highest encomium. Look at your brave chief, the Secretary of War; a man whose head is full of active, thinking, well-balanced brain; and whose heart is as pure and as tender as a woman's. And, sir, when the history of this war is written, as it will not be in your day or mine, Edwin M. Stanton will have a place in the scroll of honor but one step below that of the martyred Lincoln. He and all those under him, in the Adjutant General's office, in the Quartermaster General's office, and the Commissary General's office, have so managed the affairs of the war that the nations of Europe, remembering how their troops in the Crimea were starved and frozen, have sent officers to our land to examine and ascertain how under the administration of such men in Washington we have been able to feed and clothe and arm a million and a half of men so that not one word of complaint has come from the length and breadth of this land. They gave to the soldier bravery and courage, for he knew that in due time, and when he required it, all that was necessary to his comfort would be at his hands; and that when he gave up his life for his country there would be some one there who would lay him in the pleasant shade and erect a little monument over his grave with his name upon it, so that when his friends should come there they could plant flowers upon and weep over his last resting-place. These are the gentlemen who it is said should no longer be allowed to remain in Washington.

Now, sir, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] ought to know that in England an officer cannot be assigned to the staff of the army until he has served in every branch and department of the army; and that in France where an officer is put upon staff duties he is obliged to serve one, two, or three years, or as long as may be necessary, in the different branches of the service in order to enable him to become acquainted with the various conditions and wants of the army.

Much has been said about officers in the field. No one has a higher appreciation than I have of the officer who, leaving behind him father, mother, wife, children, family, friends, and all, has taken his life in his hand and gone forth in defense of the flag of his country, and with a stout and resolute heart has stood up against the enemies of the country. I see one here who now bears upon him the honorable scars of battle; who went into the war from my own State, and came out with a record second to that of no one in the service of the country—suffering from a wound which almost proved fatal, going home to recover, and then returning, he was again wounded, and has lost his arm, but is still ready to do noble and fearless service for his country. He put his heart and his all upon the altar of freedom. And now, when such men have thus rendered faithful service, a bill is introduced to cut down their pay. Sir, I have no patience with such propositions.

But it is said that injustice has been done to officers in the field, and that too much has been done for officers of the staff. Let us see how this is. The officer in the field has had what the Government provides him to shelter his head; either a building or a tent. He has had such food as the Government allowed him. Does he complain? He has had all to which he is entitled. Does an officer stationed at Washington have more? He has enough more only to enable him to keep soul and body together. There has been no injustice to officers in the field.

But we hear much about the duty of officers in the field. Sir, the duty of an officer in the field in time of peace does not compare to the duty of an officer in Washington. The labor is not so great; the responsibility is not so great; the risk of life, taking all things into consideration, is not so great as it is in this pent up and dirty city.

Now, we will see how much the bill of my friend from Ohio equalizes the service. A colonel of infantry or a commander of a regiment gets in Washington or elsewhere $3,000 a year—nothing more. Does not the gentleman know that when a colonel is in the field he gets in addition to his $3,000 his quarters and his fuel, while the officer stationed in Washington does not by this bill? Take the case of a colonel in command of Fortress Monroe or Fort McHenry, or any other fort upon the seaboard or upon the lakes in the interior. What is the difference? Why, sir, he is at a post, and he gets $3,500. Besides, an officer at a post like Fortress Monroe gets his fuel and quarters from the Government for nothing. What is the cost of an officer's fuel and quarters in Washington?

The gentleman from Ohio, who is keeping house, knows something about what these expenses are, and so do I. He knows, as I do, that by the most rigid economy you cannot obtain quarters and fuel for less than $1,500 a year. What is the effect, then, of this equalization? The man at Fortress Monroe or Fort McHenry, indulging in all the pleasures of life, having his quarters and fuel furnished him, with his wife and children around him, and with comparatively nothing to do, will receive under the operation of this bill $2,000 a year more than an officer of the same rank on duty in Washington. The latter receives $3,000, out of which he is obliged to pay for his quarters and fuel, $1,500, so that he has $1,500 left to live upon; while an officer of the same rank at one of these forts receives $3,500, the whole of which he has for the support of himself and family.

Sir, go still further, and take the case of a second lieutenant of infantry. What is his pay under this bill? Sixteen hundred dollars. Take the case of the colonel. He is ordered to Washington. He is obliged to come. He must obey orders or be dismissed, though he may be about as willing to be dismissed as to obey.

A second lieutenant in the field gets $1,600. A colonel in Washington gets $3,000, of which $1,500 goes for house rent and fuel, leaving him $1,500 to pay for his living in this dirty and extortionate city. The colonel has only that amount to live on, whereas the second lieutenant of infantry or other branch of the service when in the field has quarters and fuel, and besides all these, which are furnished to him, he receives $1,600 to live on; in other words, the second lieutenant gets $100 a year more than the colonel who may have served in the field for twenty or thirty years and may happen to be stationed in Washington.

This is equalization with a vengeance. There is no equalization about it. The gentlemen admit the whole principle involved by the very amendments which they have offered. When they propose the amendments they give away the question, in the advocacy of which they have been so earnest. What do these amendments propose? First it is provided that a mounted officer at his post may draw forage. Instead of the longevity ration it is provided that there shall be a certain increase of pay at the end of every five years. And what does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] propose? That food shall be furnished to the officers wherever they may be stationed without adding the cost of transportation. When gentlemen offer these they give up the very proposition for which they have argued with so much zeal, cogency, and ability. They say impliedly that their proposed system will not do; that this Procrustes' bed will not do for our officers to sleep on.

With these amendments the bill is the same as the existing law with one or two exceptions, and those are in reference to servants, and servants' clothing, and commutation of quarters and fuel. And I have shown, I think, that these are eminently just. Now, sir, shall we say to an officer at San Francisco, who must obey you, that he must come to Washington with only $1,500 to support himself and family? Shall we say, although he has no commutation for fuel or quarters, he must come to a city where his expenses are largely increased and support himself on that sum? Is that the way to support this great and honored branch of the Government? Is it right toward officers who have imperiled their limbs and lives in defense of the country? Is it the way to treat men who have borne our flag through the storms of battle riddled with bullets and now placed in the War Department as the symbols of victory and the evidences of the safety of the nation and restoration of the Union? Is such the way to treat them? The gentleman has too great a sense of justice, if he agrees with me in my premises, to resist the conclusion to which they force him.

I do beg and implore gentlemen not to vote blindly on this question. Do not take my ipse dixit. Do not take as law whatever my friends or the committee may say. The bill itself does not come before the House with the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Military Affairs. It is a fair question of difference. It is a fair question of dispute. I ask gentlemen to inform themselves whether the bill works equity or not. Let them satisfy themselves whether if this bill be passed great injustice will not be done to valuable and worthy officers of our Army.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] used the following language:

"For example, a colonel of infantry in the field receives for his compensation, including forage, only $2,520. And yet when on service in Washington a colonel of infantry receives $3,897. A lieutenant colonel of infantry in the field receives, including forage, $2,436; in Washington he receives $3,565 50. A major of infantry in the field receives $2,148; in Washington he receives $3,277 50."

It is very evident that a colonel or major stationed in a city is at much more expense than when stationed in the field.

And yet the difference between the compensation of an officer stationed at Washington or in the field does not amount to what the officer has to pay for his quarters and fuel here, so that in point of fact an officer of the same rank comes out better at the end of the year in the field than at Washington.

And yet we are told with an air of triumph by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] that officers stationed in Washington get more than in the field, and that there are only three officers who in point of fact receive less compensation than a member of Congress, a lieutenant, captain, and major. Sir, it depends upon where a member of Congress lives, and what mileage he gets. If he lives in Baltimore he is allowed only thirty-two dollars mileage. But mileage is adjusted upon a sliding scale, however erroneous or unjust it may be in the estimate of many. The pay instead of being $3,000 is by reason of mileage greatly increased, so that the average pay of a member of Congress is better than that of an officer of the Army below the grade of general.

Take the case of a member from the Pacific coast, who receives the highest amount by this sliding scale. He receives for mileage six or seven thousand dollars, while the member from Vermont receives about four hundred dollars. It is a very elastic system, so much so that it was alleged two years ago in this House that of two members residing in the same county one drew $1,000 more than the other.

The gentleman knows, moreover, that an officer of the Army can engage in no private business; when he does it he is stricken from the roll. But as regards a member of Congress, everybody is aware that he is detained here at most only about eleven months in the two years, so that more than half his time can be devoted to his chosen profession or pursuit. He can return from the session of Congress to his farm, his counting-room, or his office, to those avocations in which he is supposed, at least, to have been successful in life.

Then, the gentleman's illustration is a poor one. Sir, I do not hesitate to say, coming, as I do, from a section that is supposed to understand what economy is, that the pay of a member of Congress is not enough. I come here with my family—for I like family influences, which keep a man pure—but I know that no man can live here on the pay of a member of Congress, except by the greatest economy. I am sure I cannot do it, and my economical friend, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. SCHENCK,] tells us that he cannot. And yet, because we get just enough to starve us, must we starve the heroes of our Army upon a like fixed compensation? Why, sir, the title of this bill ought to be amended so as to read, "A bill to provide for the gradual starvation of the officers of the Army."

But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] says that this bill will prevent officers from struggling and engineering for this, that, or the other post. Why, sir, under the existing law that cannot be done. Why? Because the pay of the officer of the same rank is the same, and hence it makes no difference to him in point of pay whether he goes to one quarter or another, whether he is stationed in Washington, New York, Boston, or Denver. His regular pay and allowances are the same wherever he is stationed, and if he is detached so that the Government does not supply quarters and fuel, then he is allowed simply the amount which he is obliged to pay for them.

But pass this bill and you will stir up the spirit of rivalry. The colonel who, when stationed here, has but $1,500 for the support of himself and family out of his $3,000, by going to Fortress Monroe or other post, can get $3,500, with his quarters and fuel found him. Then would come the trouble. Pass the bill and you starve the officers in Washington, New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and other detached stations. They cannot live there upon their pay.

Now, sir, I have gone through the provisions of this bill at much greater length than I intended. What is its necessity? The memory of officers who have been true, faithful, heroic, honorable, and honest, who have served their country and gone to paupers' graves cries against it. No officer has received more than was absolutely necessary for the expenses of his position. The present system of pay comes to us sanctioned by a number of decisions in Congress, and by at least the decisions of three Paymasters General, and by the experience of half a century, during which no evil has been wrought under it. It is drawn from England and France—military nations which for a century have adopted the same principle that we adopt now in the payment of the officers of our Army.

Sir, the pay is not too much. It was not too much when the expenses of living were half what they are now. And now, just after this terrible conflict; just after the dove has come back to the window bearing the olive-branch; just after the dread conflict of arms; just after these officers have clothed themselves with glory, as patriots and brave men; at such a time as this, when expenses are double what they were before the war, gentlemen insist that "as a reward of their heroism, as a reward of their patriotism, as a badge of their glory, we should take away a portion of their pay, and make it less than it was before the war."

Sir, for one I do not believe in such a policy. I believe in letting well enough alone. I believe in adhering to systems sanctioned by time, when I can see no objection and no evil to the Government.

I say, then, "Let well enough alone." Do not trust to tearing down and building upon the ruins of what you have torn down, for nine times out of ten where a system sanctioned by experience and time is ruthlessly destroyed, and a new one built upon its ruins, you will find that you have made a fatal and inevitable mistake.

Mr. DUMONT. Mr. Speaker, it was remarked the other day by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER,] who addressed the House upon the subject of this bill, and who took the same ground as the gentleman who has just taken his seat, [Mr. WOODBRIDGE,]—or rather such was the tone and tenor of his discourse—that this bill emanated from and had its origin in hostility to the regular Army. Sir, if any such motive as that actuated those who have brought forward this bill I do not know it. I am not a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and know nothing with regard to their feelings upon this subject, but so far as that charge would apply to me I would say that it has no application and does not fit. I favor the principle of the bill now under consideration, but I favor the principle of this bill out of no hostility to the officers of the Army.

The gentleman who has just taken his seat has been exceedingly eloquent in pronouncing their eulogy. I think he has said nothing in their favor to which many of them are not well entitled, that is to say, the great majority of them, and exceptions do not disprove a rule. The great majority of the officers of the regular Army are entitled to all the commendations bestowed upon them by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WOODBRIDGE.] I would not pluck one single laurel from their brow, for upon the tented field, where the din of battle raged, they have won all the encomiums which the gentleman is so able and willing to bestow. I would feel myself unworthy of the constituency I represent, if, in advocating this bill, I stood up to cast one single word of reproach upon these men, these scarred veterans, these battle-worn heroes, these men with mutilated limbs. In legal parlance, there is such a thing as suppressio veri as well as suggestio falsi; and when a gentleman makes a speech which leaves a certain impression behind it, although he may not make a single false statement straight out through his whole speech, it may partake a little of the suppressio veri style of eloquence. With all due respect to the gentleman from Vermont, let me suggest to him that that is slightly, but unintentionally, of course, the character of the speech just made. Any outsider, not familiar with the law as it now stands upon this subject and with the bill now before the House, would go away with the impression that the object of the bill or amendment was to cut down the salaries of officers to a starvation standard, invite the wolf to their door, make patriotism a crime, and the profession of arms disreputable. I say, God forbid!

Mr. Speaker, I support this bill of the Committee on Military Affairs. I desire to have some amendment made; but the general principles commend themselves to my judgment. And yet if I believed that it was open to the charges made against it by the honorable gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WOODBRIDGE,] and by the equally able and ingenious gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER,] I would, in the language of the country, "drop it like a hot potato;" it would receive no support from me. I do not want to pay officers of the Army extravagantly, but I do want them to have a respectable salary; I want them paid in a manner worthy of the country they serve; I would adopt no starvation standard, no penny-wise and pound-foolish policy.

Now, it delights me to listen to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER.] He is clear and forcible and logical in all that he says when not deluded or laboring under error, to which we are all more or less liable, in regard to the facts, and yet under such delusion he floundered terribly in his opposition to this bill. It is true that a stranger occupying a seat in the gallery, and not familiar with the Regulations of the Army, not familiar with the subject under consideration, would have gone away after listening to that speech and said that the gentleman had made a conclusive argument; and yet the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] knocked his earth-works all to pieces, pulled away the abatis, jumped over the ditch, got into the citadel, and went in generally on his muscle. There was nothing left of his argument, and the gentleman himself, I kind of fancied, felt ashamed of it. Now, I can make a pretty good speech—that is, if I had the talents of my eloquent colleague [Mr. ORTU] who now sits before me, kindly giving me countenance and by a benignant smile yielding assent to my words, feeble and crude as they are—if I could have the privilege of manufacturing and imagining my own facts, or letting somebody else, not as honest as I am, do it for me. [Laughter.] But when the facts are taken away, vanished, gone glimmering, when it is found that the superstructure has no foundation, what becomes of the argument?

I saw the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] go over and have a little private conversation with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] after the latter gentleman had concluded his remarks and taken his seat. I did not hear the conversation, nor did I ask anything about it. But I fancied, believing in the gentleman's generous frankness and willingness at all times to make the amende honorable, that it was a confession that he was vanquished. Such a confession, I know, would be honorable. I do not testify that he made it; it is all guess-work, and may be wide of the truth.

Now, how do you explain all this? How do you explain that one of the most intelligent members of this House gets up here and talks very sensibly and ably for an hour—that is to say, in view of his flimsy premises—and after he has spoken, another of great ability, it is true, but no abler than he, gets up and answers him, and it turns out that there is nothing in his speech at all? How do you explain it? I fancy I know exactly how it happens, and yet I do not know anything personally about it. Still I think I know how it was done, for I have been victimized in the same way, and sympathize with fellow-sufferers. "A burned child dreads the fire." I do not intend to be again.

I have had the honor, accidentally, on one or two occasions to be a member of the State Legislature; and sometimes I have been met by a friend in the lobby who has propounded to me such a question as this: "Did you notice such a bill introduced by such a member?" To which I would reply, "Oh, no, I did not notice it; it has not been brought to my attention." "Well, it is a great outrage, it is infamous, and you ought to oppose it." "Well, sir, if it is an outrage, if it is iniquitous, as you seem to suppose, I am entirely willing to oppose it. But I want you to post me in regard to it; to tell me in what its iniquity consists." An explanation would ensue, and I, believing him to be an honorable gentleman, who would not deceive or lead me astray, poor confiding man that I was, would give full credence to all he said; and acting on his information, make a speech corresponding therewith, all right on my part, so far as intention goes, but all wrong in point of fact.

But I soon found that I stood on a sandy foundation, that my facts were fallacies, and my argument of no value for want of something to stand on. I found myself riddled with bullets from every quarter, until, as the boys say, my hide would not hold corn-shucks. It taught me a lesson that I will not forget to the day of my death, that it is dangerous to be too confiding.

I fear the gentleman has fallen into just such hands, and that they have treated him no better than they did me, but of the two I must confess I was a little the worse sold. [Laughter.] Although an able lawyer—one of the ablest in the country, as all admit—yet he will pardon me for saying that he seemed to be not well posted on this particular subject. It was too plain he had given too willing an ear to some friend in whom he confided, and who had led him astray. Why, he did not seem to be conscious that an officer does not receive his rations in kind; and his own mistaken view on this point he gave as a reason why this whole system—a relic of barbarism, as I contend—ought not to be broken up. His argument was that officers ought still to be permitted to draw their rations in kind, as heretofore, and as he asserted the law now to be, because if that privilege was withheld, they could not live on the frontier where provisions are dear.

I forbear to dwell on this; it is cruel to criticize such delusions. It is enough to say that what he states as the existing law has not been the law for these many long years, but I am not prepared to say that it ought not to be the law. Much has been said of the venerable character of the present law, and that we ought to be careful how we innovate upon the wisdom of ages. Now, old things may be very good. I am told that cheese and whisky improve with age; and very likely this is the case with some other things. But when I am convinced that any system of laws is essentially vicious and demoralizing, not such as ought to exist upon the statute-book, I will give my vote to wipe it out, no matter how long it may have continued. Hoary-headed error has no charms for me. I am, perhaps, wanting in veneration. I do not venerate it a bit. The gentleman fancies that he can see hostility to the Army in all this. But it exists, I think, alone in his imagination. We read that

"The lunatic, the lover, and the poet,
Are of imagination all compact.
One sees more devils than vast hell can hold;
That is the madman."

So with the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He could find some evidence of hostility, some ear-marks of it in every one of these sections. Why? Because these were a very meritorious class of men, who had done good service to their country, had taken their lives in their hands and gone upon the tented field where battles are lost and won; therefore he wanted to see no wrong done nor injury inflicted. I cherish the same emotions of gratitude, entertain exactly the same feeling, but I come to a different conclusion in regard to the best interest of these men and as it respects my own duty as a Representative of the people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if these remarks of mine are not well founded; if they do injustice to the gentleman from Pennsylvania; if it should happen that he is right while I am wrong; if it should prove to be a fact that he has made no mistakes at all, while I say that every criticism he made was a mistake, it will be so understood by the country when his remarks and mine go forth. I may have spoken a little rough with no bad intent, but am consoled by the reflection that no one can be ultimately injured but him who is in the wrong, by letting truth and error grapple.

Why, sir, the gentleman says that this bill deprives officers of quarters; and there has been a terrible surge upon the subject of quarters. We are almost reminded of the old expression about Satan shearing swine—proceeds, more noise than wool. Yet this item of quarters is more restricted now than some suppose; I mean, of course, commutation of quarters. The gentlemen on the other side seem to be unwilling to let up on the subject of quarters. It seems to be a favorite theme, the harp of a thousand strings, the burden of their song. On that particular point they seem to be surcharged.

A case is cited of a colonel who has been on duty on the frontier or in the field, and is ordered to some duty at Washington city. He gets so much as an annual salary under this bill. He keeps his family here, and rents a house, not being permitted to commute quarters, which takes up half of his salary. In the first place, unless he is willing to foot the bill himself, he has no business to have his family tagging on his heels. He has no right to billet them on the Government. [Laughter.] They have no business with him, except as my family has with me at my own expense when away from their fixed home. You might as well say if a man took his family with him in an active campaign in face of the enemy, and bought a farm on which to settle that family where the fight was about to take place, that it would use up all his salary. Of course it would. It is presumed that a man who has been educated by the Government from boyhood to manhood, and who goes into the field, having adopted the profession of arms, has some fixed abode. That is a reasonable presumption. It occurs very much to me in that way. He is liable to be stationed, so to speak, at Washington to-day, at Boston to-morrow, and at San Francisco the next day. He is liable to be at one place one month on one duty and at another place next month on another duty, and so on; and if he rent a stately mansion at enormous rent at each place where his duty may take him, and bring his family to it, the gentlemen are not mistaken in supposing that it will eat up his salary, no matter what it is. We could hardly fix any salary that would meet such expenses, but it is a burlesque upon the profession of arms to suppose them legitimate.

In the field an officer is not now entitled to commutation of quarters. There is but a single case in which an officer is now entitled to commutation of quarters, and I will show presently that it is only paying his tavern bill. He is entitled to commutation of quarters in one predicament, and there is nothing in that one tried by the touch-stone of truth except paying his tavern bill. Whenever an officer of the Army is on duty with troops, the Government is bound to furnish him with quarters. If he gets the quarters in kind he is not entitled to commutation. It may be a tent. It may be rails sloped up against a fence, with a little straw thrown over them. It may be a thatched roof. It may be a manger. It may be a stable, or it may be a palace. Nothing is charged, one way or the other. The Government furnishes these quarters to the officer, and deducts nothing from his compensation, and will not, under this bill. This bill leaves it unchanged. In the case where an officer is entitled to commutation of quarters, let us investigate that to see whether I am right that it is nothing but paying his tavern bill.

The gentlemen who cling to this remnant of barbarism simply want the people to pay the tavern bill of these officers while they seem a little reluctant to let the people know it. I do not wonder at that; they might grumble. Suppose a colonel of cavalry or infantry or a colonel of the engineer arm of the service should be ordered to go from this city to Philadelphia to make an estimate of the cost of a certain fortification or to build one. He has no troops with him. He has no adjutant with him. He has no men with him. No military family as it is called. He does not even take a clerk with him. Why? He does not need these appendages. He goes to Philadelphia in the discharge of his duties. He goes to the best hotel and of course puts up there and applies himself to the duties for which he was sent. It takes him six months to perform them. At the end of six months he comes back here and enters upon another duty. Now, I ask, if you allow that officer commutation for quarters—not for office rent, for if an office is needed the Government is to furnish it—if you allow him commutation for quarters will you be doing anything more or less than paying his tavern bill? That is all there is in it.

Gentlemen seem to contend that every time an officer of the Government occupies a post, gets a room assigned to him by the Government by hook or crook, that it diminishes his compensation, that there is to be some kind of deduction on account of it. A greater error than that one could scarcely fall into. There is not a word of truth in it. The Government furnishes quarters, and an officer occupies them without charge or deduction one way or the other, under the law as it now stands, and that is just what he will do under this bill. In that regard there is no change where there is an actual occupancy of Government quarters, all we have heard to the contrary notwithstanding. Of an officer we might say, whenever he gets quarters he gets them; and when the Government gets any money of him for it it will do it good. But under certain contingencies that I have just named he gets commutation of quarters. It is very well indeed to make fine-spun theories in regard to this matter, but the better way is to come down to the regulations. What is written in black and white, what the law of the country is on the subject, will be found in sections ten hundred and eighty and ten hundred and eighty-four, page 161, of the Regulations of the Army:

"1090. When public quarters cannot be furnished to officers at stations without troops, or to enlisted men at general or department headquarters, quarters will be commuted at a rate fixed by the Secretary of War and fuel at the market price delivered. When fuel and quarters are commuted to an officer by reason of his employment on a civil work the commutation shall be charged to the appropriation for the work. No commutation of rooms or fuel is allowed to the officers or messes."

"1084. Officers and troops in the field are not entitled to commutation for quarters or fuel."

Why? Because they get the quarters and the fuel, and it is simply absurd to talk of commutation for a thing furnished in kind.

I desire to say a few words more in regard to fuel. From what gentlemen have been saying one would naturally infer, if we did not know better, that an officer always got commutation of fuel. Now, it is the rarest thing in the world that an officer gets any such thing. I have been near five years in the service of the United States myself as an officer, part of the time during the Mexican war and the rest of the time during the late rebellion. I have been stationed at posts and I have been in the field. I have commanded posts, brigades, and divisions. I have been in West Virginia, in Kentucky, in Tennessee, in Alabama, and in Mexico. I was stationed in command of Puebla, in Mexico, and at Nashville, in Tennessee. And yet I never drew a single dollar at any time, nor did I receive a dollar for commutation of quarters or of fuel, because I was not entitled to it, and because the Government always furnished it. Fuel is public property. If the Government delivers to me ten cords of wood and I use up one half of it and am then ordered to another duty I have no right to appropriate the remainder to my own use, but the Government has a right to come around and take what is left. I cite the following section of the regulations in regard to fuel:

"1073. Fuel issued to officers or troops is public property for their use. What they do not actually consume shall be returned to the quartermaster and taken up on his quarterly return."

We had read to us the other day a passage from a very interesting volume called "Across the Continent." The object of it was, I suppose, if it had any application at all, to show the enormous price of provisions at Denver and at other posts on the Pacific slope. But that fact is of no consequence at all unless the officers there stationed had a right to draw their rations in kind, a right which has not existed for many years. It is forty years since the letter of Paymaster General Towson was written. It seems that at that time rations might be drawn in kind.

To proceed with the argument, take a colonel stationed where the ration is worth two dollars instead of thirty cents. He has no right at all to draw that ration in kind and then deduct the thirty cents. What he had the right to do under the old law—and that this bill does not change at all—was to draw commutation for his rations and then go to the commissary and buy the subsistence necessary for the support of himself and his family, paying the Government the cost price, less the expense of transportation. The regulations declare in so many words that rations must be commuted at the price fixed by the Government. And then section twelve hundred and thirteen provides that an officer may draw subsistence stores, paying cash for them at contract or cost price, without including cost of transportation, on his certificate that they are for his own use and the use of his family.

Suppose his rations or subsistence are hauled from St. Louis to Denver, part of the way in wagons. An officer, as the law now stands and under the present bill, though he cannot draw commutations for his rations, can go to the commissary and buy them at the cost price to the Government, less the cost of transportation. The truth is, as regards nearly every one of the criticisms, the law will be exactly the same after this bill has passed as it was before.

I suppose that every one of the gentlemen who oppose this bill is willing to arrive at the truth in regard to the matter; and having heard so much about this thing of reducing the pay of the Army I concluded that I would institute a comparison; that I would lay the books down before me and see whether these charges were true, and if they were in any material and ruinous degree the bill should have no support from me. I have accordingly entered on the right-hand margin of this bill the compensation fixed by it and on the left-hand margin the compensation under the present law, and I propose to compare them in order to see how just the criticisms of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Woodbridge] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Thayer] are.

The Lieutenant General under this bill gets $12,000 per annum. Under the law as it now stands he gets $13,392. The gentleman from Vermont will bear in mind that I start out with what would seem to sustain his charge; and it does so so far as this officer is concerned. I am entirely willing to make the salary of the Lieutenant General $15,000, for that matter. I should be very reluctant to vote against any sum for his salary, seeing where it would go to.

A major-general, under the law as it now stands, receives, exclusive of fuel, commutation of quarters, and forage, $5,772, and under the law as provided by this bill he would get $7,000 in one contingency, $6,500 in another contingency, and $6,000 in a still further contingency; graduating the compensation according to the character of the service performed. A discrimination is made in the amount of salary in favor of the hardest kind of work and the most valuable service to the country. Does that bear out the charge of the gentleman from Vermont? Did he not "waste his sweetness on the desert air" when he expended so much eloquence on the reduction of salaries? A reduction from $5,000 and fuel, quarters, and forage, to $7,000! It seems to me that it was a waste of eloquence, and that I should be wasting eloquence—were I capable of it—if I were to take up time in replying very much at length to that part of his very able speech. The gentleman is from Vermont and will pardon me for repeating what his fellow-countryman said, that "he hated to kick at nothing, it wrenched him so." [Laughter.]

We come now to brigadier-generals. I have already adverted to lieutenant-generals and to major-generals, and we have seen that neither of them is turned out upon the cold charity of the world without house or home. I come now to the brigadier-general. He receives, under the law as it now stands, $3,918, with the other items mentioned, and under this bill, in one contingency he would receive $5,500, and in another contingency he would receive $5,000. Now, if that is ruining an officer of that grade, I imagine that he would like to be ruined every day of his life. [Laughter.] If that is such an enormous wrong that it cries to Heaven for vengeance, I suppose that he wishes all mankind to stand back and let him become its victim. [Laughter.]

We come down now to the office of colonel. Under the law as it now stands the colonel gets $3,180 and the other items named. And bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that in instituting this comparison I have taken the highest grade of compensation; that is to say, I have taken the pay of a colonel in the cavalry arm of the service. There is a very slight difference between the pay of officers in the cavalry arm of the service and those in the infantry arm of the service. In order to make the comparison most favorable to the gentleman from Vermont, I have taken the cavalry arm of the service. A colonel in that service receives now, under the present law, as I have stated, $3,180 and the items named. Under the bill now pending, this terrible bill, this bill that is going to starve these men, and turn their children out of house and home, subjecting them to the merciless peltings of the pitiless storm, gives a colonel $3,500, in one contingency, and $3,000 in another, according to the service he performs, a sort of ad valorem system.

We come now to lieutenant colonels. You will notice that I have mentioned lieutenant general, major generals, brigadier generals, and colonels, and the first officer we find whose pay is reduced, with the exception of the Lieutenant General—and everybody will consent to make that what anybody wants it made—is the lieutenant colonel. The diminution is very small. It is so small that it is hardly worth talking about. I know that the lieutenant colonels of the country would not regard it as a matter of any magnitude.

A lieutenant colonel of cavalry, under the law as it now stands, gets $2,940. Under this bill he gets $2,800 in one contingency, and $2,600 in another. A major, as the law now stands, gets $2,580; under this bill he gets $2,500. A captain, under the present law, gets $2,010; under this bill he gets $2,000. A first lieutenant gets $1,809, as the law now stands; and he gets $1,800 under this bill. A second lieutenant gets $1,770, as the law now stands; and under this bill he gets $1,600 the next day after he comes out of the West Point Academy, having been educated by the Government scot free. After having had a free ticket through his education; the first day he enters the service he gets the salary of $1,600 a year, and we see and hear gentlemen holding up their hands in holy horror and declaring that the poor boy will starve to death. I say that if he does, let him starve. The sooner the breed of such become extinct the better.

Why, sir, many of our circuit and of our supreme judges, who have devoted a life-time to the acquisition of the knowledge necessary to qualify them for those exalted positions, do not get more than is given to these young, beardless boys, who have been educated at the expense of the Government; that is, $1,600 a year. And yet if one of those second lieutenants should come here to Washington city, rent a palace, and put in it his wife and children, as the gentlemen have talked about—and he is likely to have about nineteen children, I fancy, judging from his tender years—[laughter.] it will take the whole of his $1,600 to pay for his house rent, and there will be nothing left for the support of himself and his family. Now, as we say out West, that kind of an argument will not bear a bead; it will not bear the touch-stone of truth; it has neither rhyme nor reason nor justice in it. And I trust the members of this House will not be led astray merely by fine talk when figures and facts, which are stubborn things, nail those arguments as spurious coin to the counter and fix upon them their proper weight and value.

I would be in favor of this bill if it did not make a single farthing's variation between the compensation these officers now receive and that which they would receive under this bill. I favor it because it is a fair, open-handed measure. What it does it does above-board. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] said that under the law as it now stood it was very difficult for the people, the uninitiated and uninformed in the affairs of the Army, to ascertain what was the compensation of an officer of the Army. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] replies, in substance, as I understood him, "Well, what of that? What if the people do not know? They do not have to pay any more on that account."

Now, this happens to be a Government of the people; the people here are the sovereigns, and if any man who may happen to get a little brief authority should set himself up above the people they will soon let him know who is master. The people of this country have to foot the bills, and any officer, whether he be a constable or President of the United States, is nothing under heaven but a servant whose duty it is to perform the behest of his master, the people, for which he will receive his compensation at their hands. I hope the gentleman will pardon me when I suggest that it is hardly right for a representative of the people to stand up and say that they have no right to be informed on these subjects. I say, in all sincerity, they have that right; and that he who stands between them and that right will repent before he gets through that kind of business. No man in the country can stand up against the torrent of indignation that would pour down upon him should he dare go before the people and make a declaration that it did not concern them what the compensations of their public servants were.

The force of the argument of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] was felt by members here, and that is the reason they have tried to bring it down into ridicule. They knew that it was the truth; they knew it could not be denied that a military officer now receives his compensation, not by any determinate salary, but by such various allowances and commutations and circumlocutions that it would require all the ingenuity of a Philadelphia lawyer to determine what compensation he actually did receive. That is the true secret of all this fight over this bill. The compensation of an officer of the Army consists of various items; it should consist of but one single item, as a general rule, with such exceptions only as the absolute necessities of the case may demand.

Now, I do not want to bring this subject into ridicule. But I am almost tempted to read a pay-roll; the kind of paper a military officer has to make out before the paymaster will pay him the money that is due. I am almost tempted to do it, in order to show the kind of humbug stuff which has come down to us from an age of barbarism, the hoary-headed error that does not belong to this enlightened age. Here is the pay-roll of a colonel made out for a month:

Now, it may be said that the above is the perfection of all reason not divine, but I confess it does not seem so to me. It will be seen from the above that a colonel gets one hundred and eighty rations per month for himself and sixty for his servants, and yet he is not permitted to draw a single one of them, but is bound to take the commutation or take nothing. Who is wise enough, then, to divine why it is put down as rations at all, instead of being added to his pay proper as so much money? Who can tell, unless it was to throw mystery around the matter and keep somebody in the dark? Then look at the private servants for the clothing of which and monthly wages and subsistence an officer draws pay. Why not add all of these items to the pay proper at once, and let it be an honest gross sum that all may understand? In pronouncing this system the perfection of human reason, I presume that the descriptive list that is given above of the servants is included in the encomium. Oh, how important it is to set forth their complexion, and height in feet and inches, and the color of their eyes and hair! What amazing virtue that kind of stuff imparts to a pay-roll! How insipid it would be without that kind of information! I do not see how it could be improved unless there were a provision in the law requiring the weight to be set forth, such, for instance, as that the aforesaid Jim weighs one hundred pounds and the aforesaid John one hundred and fifty pounds, avoirdupois weight by Fairbanks's cattle-scales. If that provision was added it were as easy to garnish the stars as to add to the perfection of this blessed system, born, as we are told, of the wisdom of ages.

Mr. Speaker, a few years ago when a man wanted to convey a piece of real estate worth $500 he was obliged to spread it out over four or five sheets of paper. And that kind of hoary-headed error was in vogue for years. And men were not wanting prepared to swear that the country would go to ruin if any change should be made in that regard. Yet I can now convey $100,000 worth of real estate, the most valuable real estate in the whole country, and not use more than twenty words, and the conveyance is just as valid as this ancient parchment that has been handed down to us from the remotest period of the old English law. It was revered almost as much as the vicious system proposed to be abrogated by this bill.

Thus we have a glimpse, imperfect though it be, of the sublime wisdom handed down to us from a former age! This is the wisdom to trench upon which is sufficient to make the angels weep! This is the sort of hoary-headed error that we ought to continue from age to age and from generation to generation! And when the people, through their representatives, complain about it they are to be told that it is none of their business. This is what we are to say to the people who foot the bill, the hard-handed yeomanry of the country who furnish the money.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to correct him? He has stated that a colonel is entitled to draw for three servants twenty-four dollars. I would remind the gentleman of the fact that by an explicit act of legislation the officer is allowed for each servant the same compensation which is paid to a private soldier, making the commutation for three servants forty-eight dollars. And the allowance for clothing is increased to $19.50.

Mr. DUMONT. That is true. I was aware of that. My illustration was but supposititious, but the gentleman from Ohio will observe that I have made out the pay account of a colonel with care. My illustration was just like supposing that a man's name was John Brown, whereas John Smith would have answered the purpose of my argument just as well. I was simply trying to show the absurdity of claiming perfection for this vicious system.

I recollect a story that illustrates this whole thing. When I was in the Mexican war, an officer was allowed forage in kind, but was entitled to commutation for forage, according to the number of horses he had. The regulations prescribed, I will suppose, that a colonel was entitled to three horses, a brigadier general to five, a major general to seven, and so on clear through the chapter. A certain brigadier general, somewhat celebrated for his wagery when he was provoked into it, had drawn the pay for his horses, and was required by a superior officer, who suspected that he actually had not the full number of horses, to set forth their cost, so that, if they happened to get killed in service, their value might be known; that there might be documentary evidence in regard to what the Government would have to pay. That was the pretense. The real intention was to mortify the brigadier and compel him to tell a bigger lie than he told when he drew his pay. Still he made the report as ordered, and as supplementary thereto went on and gave the pedigree. He came down at length to mule, "pedigree unknown," [laughter;] value, "not worth a damn." [Renewed laughter.] And that is this beautiful system embalmed in the heart of the nation; a sacred thing not to be touched by sacrilegious hands.

Mr. Speaker, I fear I may be charged with making light of serious things. That is the reason why I want to wipe out this system, as one cannot talk of it without, seemingly at least, making a trifle of himself. He cannot do it and tell the truth without seeming to indulge in unbecoming levity and apparently turning himself into a mountebank.

I think every gentleman will agree with me in one thing. If the salary of every officer in the country was fixed in the same way, it would have a demoralizing influence. The tendency would be to demoralization. I do not say it would demoralize such a man as my colleague. I simply mean that is the tendency of the system. The tendency would be that only those could resist it who were, like him, of Roman firmness and able to stand side by side with Cato himself in the preservation of his integrity.

I said to a gentleman the other day that I had seldom seen a pay-roll which stated the exact truth in every respect, and all its details. He replied to me, "Have you then made out a pay-roll every item of which was not in accordance with the facts?" I told him that my pay-rolls were correct, and if they had not been I did not propose to testify against myself. The pay-roll of any honest man ought to be strictly true.

Take such a case as this. Six officers may mess together. They have three servants to wait upon them. Now, these three servants might go down upon every one of these officers' pay-rolls if they were dishonest, and count eighteen. There are no charges in regard to this practice. Too many in the same position, and he who lives in a glass house takes good care not to throw the first stone.

In regard to that part of the bill to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] so well referred, I mean that concerning forage, I understand has been remedied by an amendment. It is true an officer cannot carry forage in his saddle-bags, and that he would find it difficult to get it on the frontier. The interest of the Government is that an officer should be well mounted. I understand that an amendment has been proposed disarming all criticism in this regard.

I simply propose, in concluding these remarks, to say that there are two distinguishing features between the law as it now stands and the bill which proposes to abrogate it, both of which are in favor of the bill. One is to give a fixed salary in lieu of these various items, the tendency of which is as I have already described. The other is to discriminate in favor of field duty. The law as it now stands discriminates in favor of post duty. The law as it now stands discriminates in favor of city duty. The law as it now stands discriminates in favor of staff duty. In my judgment, it is a vicious system, and ought at once to be abrogated.

The distinguishing glory of this bill is that it fixes a just and equitable system and holds out inducement for men to get into the field instead of getting into the city. A man to be a good military officer should be inured to hardship, day toil and night toil, sleeping on the damp ground with nothing but the canopy of heaven above to shelter him. If a man has been effeminated, if the nerve has been taken out of his arm and the strength out of his backbone by living in Washington, Philadelphia, or New York for a series of years, he is not fit to go into the field at all. This bill encourages that kind of service most valuable to the country. It encourages that kind of service which makes our heroes.

Now, having disclaimed all hostility to the Army or the officers of the Army, having disavowed any intention to decrease their pay in a ruinous manner, as charged, I declare it is my intention to give my vote in favor of this bill after the amendments which have been offered shall be adopted. It will be doing them no harm while doing a great deal of good to the service of the country.

Mr. DAVIS obtained the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a moment.

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am exceedingly desirous that this bill should be brought to a conclusion to-morrow morning if possible, and if there are two or three others to speak perhaps it might be well for the gentleman to go on half an hour to-day. I give notice that I wish to dispose of the bill to-morrow if possible.

Mr. DAVIS resumed the floor but gave way to

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, who moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. DAVIS: The petition of N. Beardsley, J. W. Sterne, and 8 others, bankers, of Cayuga county, New York, praying for the modification of the act taxing the circulating notes of State banks after July 1, 1866.

Also, like petition of Henry Westfall, Henry Weed, and 89 others, merchants and business men of Onondaga county, New York.

By Mr. ELIOT: The petition of Elihu M. Mosher, and 366 others, citizens of New Bedford, Massachusetts, praying that a law regulating the hours of labor and fixing eight hours as a day's work in the employ of Government should be passed by Congress.

By Mr. HARDING, of Illinois: A remonstrance from citizens of Ruthtsburg, Illinois, against obstructive bridges over Mississippi river.

By Mr. HOLMES: The petition of Delos De Wolf, and others, citizens of Oswego county, New York, for modification or repeal of law imposing tax of ten per cent. upon banks paying out the notes of State banks after July 1, 1866.

Also, the petition of N. Higginbotham, and others, citizens of Madison county, New York, for modification of same law.

By Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY: The petition of John Cooper for American enrollment of the vessels Three Belts and Sweet Home.

By Mr. JULIAN: The memorial of L. H. Whitney, and 250 others, settlers on the Soscol ranch in California, praying for the passage of a joint resolution declaratory of the construction of the act of 3d March, 1863, relating to said lands.

By Mr. KELSO: Petition of citizens of Little Rock, Arkansas, for a law declaring the road from Fayetteville, Arkansas, via Cincinnati, Arkansas, to Fort Gibson, Cherokee nation, a post road.

By Mr. SCOFIELD: A petition from volunteer soldiers praying for a discharge.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 5, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 477) further to provide for the safety of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, to regulate the salaries of steamboat inspectors, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 253) for the relief of the trustees and stewards of the Mission church of the Wyandott Indians; which was read and passed to a second reading.

REFERENCE OF A BILL.

On motion of Mr. CONNESS, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. No. 343) to quiet land titles in California be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

On motion of Mr. STEWART, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. No. 287) to provide for the construction of a wagon road from Boise City, in the Territory of Idaho, to Susanville, in California, yesterday reported from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, be recommitted to that committee.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 351) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to lease such of the public lands of the United States as are known as saline lands, or lands containing mineral springs, and to provide for the preservation and development of the same; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. NYE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 352) granting to A. Suto the right of way and granting other privileges to aid in the construction of a draining and exploring tunnel to the Comstock lode, in the State of Nevada; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. NYE. I move that the bill be printed and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CONNESS. I think that bill should go to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. NYE. It is for a grant of lands. It is simply a right of way and other privileges through the public lands. I think the reference I propose is proper.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 102) construing and giving effect to the joint resolution entitled "A resolution for the relief of the State of Wisconsin," approved July 1, 1864; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 587) to incorporate the Soldiers' and Sailors' Union of Washington, District of Columbia; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed, without amendment, the bill (S. No. 203) to enable the New York and Montana Iron Mining and Manufacturing Company to purchase a certain amount of the public lands not now in market.

ANNA E. WARD.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 459) granting a pension to Anna E. Ward.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I ask that the Senate concur in that conference committee's report. It is simply to strike out words which were repeated twice in the act, a mere verbal inaccuracy. I have the report here and submit it.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 459) granting a pension to Anna E. Ward, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their amendment to said bill.

H. S. LANE,

JAMES GUTHRIE,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

NELSON TAYLOR,

P. SAWYER,

A. HARDING,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

OCCUPATION OF MINERAL LANDS.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to give notice that at an early period, as soon as I can get the attention of the Senate to it, I shall ask for the consideration of Senate bill No. 257, reported from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to regulate the occupation of mineral lands and to extend the right of preemption thereto. We regard it as an important bill, and as it is getting late in the session, I hope the Senate will be ready to consider it when we call it up, which will be at an early period.

NAVAL PENSION FUND.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to take up Senate joint resolution No. 95.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I hope my honorable friend will waive that motion so that I can ask the Senate to take up the unfinished business of yesterday's morning hour.

Mr. GRIMES. This resolution will not take more than a minute.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Then I give notice that after it is disposed of I shall ask the Senate to proceed with the unfinished business of yesterday morning.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 95) amendatory of a resolution regulating the investment of the naval pension fund, approved July 1, 1864, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend the resolution approved July 1, 1864, entitled "A resolution regulating the investment of the naval pension fund" so as to require such portion of the fund as is ordered to be invested in registered securities of the United States to be made a permanent loan to the United States at six per cent. interest per annum in coin, payable on the 1st of January and the 1st of July of each year; but nothing herein contained is to be construed to amend or alter the resolution except so far as relates to the mode of investment.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. I will state that the purpose of this resolution is simply to change the law which now requires that the naval pension fund shall be invested in registered bonds of the United States. It is designed to make this a permanent loan to the United States by an act of Congress, so as to obviate the necessity which is now imposed by law on the Secretary of the Treasury to issue these bonds, and to go through all the forms that ordinary registered bonds are put through, and also to obviate the necessity upon the Secretary of the Navy of keeping these bonds after they are issued to him which are liable to destruction and loss. It invests this naval pension fund in the same way as the Smithsonian fund and several other funds are invested by the United States.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to inquire a little more about this subject. What is the amount of this fund?

Mr. GRIMES. About eleven million dollars.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This resolution, I understand, proposes to make it a permanent investment at six per cent., which would preclude us from making any change hereafter and attempting to make it less.

Mr. GRIMES. I will state that the resolution, as it is now before the Senate, is in the precise phraseology drawn at the Treasury Department, and I have a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury stating that it met the approval of the Secretary, and that the Secretary of the Navy also had been consulted. It dispenses with a great many formulas and a considerable amount of expense, and also obviates the risk which is now incurred by having these bonds issued.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The difficulty that occurred to me is, that this is proposed to be made a permanent investment at six per cent., as I understand.

Mr. GRIMES. It is to be a permanent investment, but the Government is now obliged to pay interest at six per cent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. By what law?

Mr. GRIMES. By all the laws that have been passed on the subject ever since 1803.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the case with the Smithsonian fund, but I did not know that it was so with regard to the naval pension fund.

Mr. GRIMES. It is the case also with the naval pension fund.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the resolution had better lie on the table until we can look into the subject.

Mr. GRIMES. I want to get through with it now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to see how it affects the laws on the subject.

Mr. GRIMES. Very well. I move that it be committed to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I object to that. The Committee on Finance have enough to do without attending to this matter. The Senator had better recommit it to his own committee.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not want it. We have already considered it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I ask that it lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the joint resolution be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 587) to incorporate the Soldiers' and Sailors' Union of Washington, District of Columbia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

Mr. FESSENDEN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 37) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the third, fifth, and sixth amendments and agree to the same.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: in line two of the said amendment strike out the word "ten" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five," and the Senate agree to the same.

WILLIAM P. FESSENDEN,
JOHN CONNESS,
GEORGE READ RIDDLE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
R. P. SPALDING,
S. M. CULLOM,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The result is that the House recede from all their disagreements except one, and in that case they agree to our amendment with an amendment which reduces somewhat the sum that was appropriated by the Senate. If there is no objection to the report on the part of the Senate, I suppose it may be adopted at once.

The report was concurred in.

CLERKS OF INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I now move to resume the consideration of the unfinished business of the morning hour of yesterday, Senate bill No. 282.

Mr. SUMNER. Will that take much time?
Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think not.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 282) to reorganize the clerical force of the Department of the Interior, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the select committee, in section four, line four, after the word "Interior" to strike out the words "shall be the same as that now allowed by law to the Commissioner of Patents," and to insert, "namely, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the Commissioner of Pensions, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall be $4,000 each per annum;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That from and after the commencement of the next fiscal year the compensation of the Assistant Secretary of the Interior and that of the heads of the bureaus of the Department of the Interior, namely, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the Commissioner of Pensions, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, shall be $4,000 each per annum, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In the same section four I move to insert the words "other than the Patent Office" after the word "bureaus" in line eleven, so as to make the clause read, "and that of the chief clerks of the bureaus other than the Patent Office," &c. The salary of the chief clerk of the Patent Office now is $2,500 per annum. The reason why his salary is $2,500 and ought to remain at that is that he is not only the chief clerk of the bureau, but he is the disbursing officer of the bureau, and has to give bonds in a large sum for the safety of the funds. The effect of the amendment I propose is to allow the salary of the chief clerk of the Patent Office to remain as it is now fixed by law, while if these words be not inserted the section would reduce his salary to $2,250, which ought not to be done.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the committee why the Commissioner of Patents is left out of the officers enumerated in the fourth section whose salaries are raised.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will state to the honorable Senator that the Patent Office was created distinct by itself, and is paid, not out of the funds of the Treasury, but out of the fees which are received by the Patent Office. The Commissioner of Patents receives $4,500 per annum by the existing law, and the committee thought it not wise to reduce that salary, although were they now to fix it they would probably fix it at the same sum as that proposed for the other heads of bureaus.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not resisted the progress of this bill because I did not wish to make any amendment to it, but now I desire simply to state the effect of the bill. I was not a member of the committee organized to consider it and did not wish to interfere with its consideration by the Senate; but before it is finally acted upon the Senate ought to understand that the effect of the bill, although attempted, it seems to me, to be disguised to some extent, is to increase the salaries of all the clerical force of the Interior Department from ten to fifteen per cent. In other words, it pays three hundred and thirty-six employes in the Interior Department very nearly the same compensation that is now paid to three hundred and eighty-two. It is said that the three hundred and thirty-six will be sufficient to perform all the duties required in the Interior Department. I think so, too; but under existing laws the Secretary of the Interior can reduce the number of his clerks. The number decreased is forty-six, and the salary or compensation now paid to forty-six clerks is to be divided among the remaining employes.

My objection to this bill, and the only reason why I shall vote against it is, that in my judgment this is not the time to commence an increase of salaries, for of course the increase provided for in this bill, equal to about twelve or fifteen per cent., must run through all the various Departments of the Government. If this bill passes, as a matter of course the same claim will be made from all the different bureaus and Departments in Washington, extending to some two or three thousand employes, and having passed this bill we cannot resist their claims. Indeed, the business of the Interior Department is probably less onerous than that of the War Department or of the Treasury Department.

I do not wish to discuss the question, because the whole thing is in a nutshell. The increase of salaries amounts to about twelve or fifteen per cent. by the division among the remaining employes of the salaries heretofore paid to forty-six clerks. There is no trouble under existing laws in reducing the number of clerks; but under this bill the same persons will be employed and continued in office. There is scarcely a doubt of that. It is not contemplated to reorganize entirely the whole clerical force, but the same persons will be continued in office.

Mr. GRIMES. And the residue as temporary clerks.

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps so. I doubt very much whether there will be an actual decrease in the number of clerks; but if there is a decrease, it will only show that during the war, when we needed all the money we could get, they employed forty-six persons unnecessarily. That is the whole argument on which the bill is founded. I do not wish to argue it; I shall content myself with voting against it.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. This subject was referred to a special committee on the motion, I believe, of the distinguished Senator from Ohio. That committee was constituted of the chairmen of the different standing committees the business of which was connected with the Interior Department—the chairmen of the Committees on Patents, on Pensions, on Indian Affairs, on Printing, and on Public Lands. We had before that special committee a letter of the Secretary of the Interior and a full exposition of his wishes on the subject. The committee then sent for the head of every bureau represented in the Interior Department. They all came before us in person, and gave us a full exposition of the present amount of clerical force and the amount contemplated by the bill. The bill is perfectly satisfactory, not only to the Secretary of the Interior, but to the Assistant Secretary, and to the head of every bureau in that Department. But the objection meets us here which is raised by the Senator from Ohio, that it is an increase of salaries. That is doubtless true, so far as the clerks retained are concerned; but there is a decrease of $6,000 in the aggregate expenses of the Interior Department. It is the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, and of the head of every bureau in that Department, that by reducing the clerical force by the amount of forty-six clerks, and dividing their compensation among the remaining clerks retained, they will get a higher quality of clerical ability, and that the business of the Department will be administered more promptly and more efficiently. This, then, is no proposition to increase the salaries of clerks in one sense, although it may be in another, for the aggregate expense is decreased, and the efficiency of the service is increased.

The Senator from Iowa asks the question whether the clerks with whom it is proposed to dispense will not be really retained as temporary clerks. Under your present law temporary clerks may be employed; under this bill temporary clerks cannot be employed, for the number is limited and the compensation is limited. I have no doubt, then, that you will secure a greater and more efficient amount of service for $6,000 per annum less, than you have at present. So far from the argument being good, that by raising the salaries here you are required to raise the salaries in all the other Departments, I hesitate nothing in saying that if the same kind of special committee was to-day raised, to reorganize and fix the compensation of the clerks in every Department of the Government, you might save from fifty to one hundred thousand dollars per annum, and satisfy the wants and requirements of the country much better than you do under the present system. I think there should be such a committee raised in reference to the War Department, the Navy Department, the Treasury Department, and the Post Office Department; and by reducing the number of clerks and paying a greater compensation to those retained, you would have more efficient service, more able clerks, and save from fifty to one hundred thousand dollars per annum. I do not see the argument resulting from the allegation of an increase of expense when we reduce the aggregate expenses of the Department more than six thousand dollars a year, and in the opinion of every man familiar with the subject get able and more competent clerks. That is the whole of it.

Mr. POMEROY. In reply to the remark of the Senator from Ohio, that if we pass this bill we shall also have to relieve the officers of the other Departments of the Government, it may not be improper to say that there is no Department of this Government now in which the heads of bureaus have not a larger salary, with the exception of the Post Office, than is proposed by this bill. If the Senator will refresh his memory, he will remember that the Comptroller of the Currency, to begin with, has $5,000; he will remember that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has $4,000; he will remember that the Superintendent of the Coast Survey has $6,000; he will remember that the Treasurer of the United States has $5,000; and the Finance Committee, I believe, have already reported an addition to that which will make his salary, if we concur in their recommendation, $6,500. When the law was passed reorganizing the supreme court of this District, the salary of the judges was placed at $3,000, and we have since increased it to $4,500; and all the heads of bureaus of the Navy Department have a salary at least equal to what is proposed in this bill.

Mr. GRIMES. Oh, no; they have $3,500. Each one of the heads of bureaus in the Navy Department, except the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, who draws pay as an admiral, has $3,500.

Mr. POMEROY. I have not been able to learn exactly the sum received by the chiefs of bureaus in the Navy Department, from the fact that the amount that they receive is not precisely put down.

Mr. GRIMES. We have the exact amount in the Navy Register.

Mr. POMEROY. In the War Department we have a brigadier general at the head of each of these bureaus, which gives them a salary of at least $5,000.

Mr. GRIMES. That may be, but it is not so in the Navy Department.

Mr. POMEROY. The head of the Coast Survey, and, I think, most of the heads of the bureaux of the Navy Department, receive a larger salary than this.

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir; none of the Navy Department except one. The Assistant Secretary of the Navy gets $3,500 a year; the chiefs of the Bureaus of Navigation, of Ordnance, of Recruiting, and of Construction and Repair get $3,500 each; and the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, Admiral Smith, gets $4,000, drawing pay as a naval officer.

Mr. POMEROY. My attention was particularly directed to the remark of the Senator from Ohio, that if we passed this bill the officers in the War Department would be here asking for an increase of salary. I directed my attention particularly in reply to that.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to remind the Senator from Kansas that during this session the salaries of the officers throughout the Navy Department have been increased, I believe, thirty-three per cent.

Mr. POMEROY. I did not know how much, but I knew their salaries had been increased somewhat. That will bring up the salaries of the heads of bureaux in that Department to at least $4,000.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The salaries of all the officers in the naval service have been increased, as I am informed.

Mr. SHERMAN, [to Mr. GRIMES.] Is that so?

Mr. GRIMES. There is no law of Congress about it, but the Secretary of the Navy has made an order on the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to know if that is so. That is rather a remarkable statement, that the Secretary of the Navy has increased the salaries of the officers connected with that Department under an order.

Mr. GRIMES. The Secretary of the Navy has issued an order, under the law of Congress, commuting allowances of all kinds and paying to officers an increase upon the amount of their salaries, as fixed by law, in place of drawing it as commutation for rations, forage, and servants.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is that in the power of the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir; he has the same power on that subject that the Secretary of War has. All the allowances of the Army are based on the Rules and Articles of War. There is no authority of express law authorizing commutation for quarters, fuel, lights, &c., in the Army.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator will investigate this subject he will see that we have actually placed the salaries in the Interior Department, if this bill should pass, so far as the heads of bureaux are concerned, lower than in the War Department, and I think lower than in the Navy Department. That was the understanding of the committee, in view of this increase of thirty-three per cent. that has been allowed by the Secretary of the Navy.

I will only add that in trying to report this bill according to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior and those who are best informed of what would promote the public service, the committee agreed to report it in the manner in which it has been reported. We do not increase, as has been stated, the aggregate expense, but we do undertake to secure the best class of men that can be employed by giving certain heads of bureaux more compensation than they have heretofore had, and we are informed that it is necessary. It was stated to us over and over again that they could not retain in the service competent men at a salary of $1,800. By this bill a new grade at $2,000 is created in each of these bureaux. They can retain men at that price in the service whom they cannot retain at $1,800. The object of the Government is to get competent men in these places. As was said by the Senator from Maine yesterday, there is no difficulty in getting twelve hundred dollar clerks. There are plenty of those, and there is a great pressure for such places; but when clerks are advanced to $1,800 they become so familiar with the duties of the office and understand the laws, and especially in the Land Office the land laws so well, that they resign and go outside and commence practicing, and thus, in that way, the best officers are lost to the Department, because they can make more money outside than in the Department.

This increase was urged upon us strenuously, because these men have to decide most important questions. Every case in every land office in the United States where there has been a dispute and a contest is referred to Washington. Law questions, at least as important as the judges of our courts have to decide, are every day referred to the heads of these branches of the service, and they have to decide them. If a mistake is made, it takes months, to say nothing of the expense, in correcting that mistake. The branch that I particularly investigated requires not only competent but practiced and experienced men. A new man going in there is worth almost nothing in comparison with those who have remained for years. This clamor of turning out experienced and faithful and tried men and putting in new ones, although it is patriotic and commendable, will not promote, as I believe, the public service in that Department.

I was much interested in what the Senator from Maine said yesterday, from his own experience in the Treasury Department, that the service falls to pieces if left in the hands of inexperienced and incompetent persons; and that is the reason why we made this change. I am satisfied, from my own familiarity with the Interior Department, that the service will be greatly promoted if we can secure the services of the men whom we can obtain by giving them the salaries provided for in this bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There are two or three verbal amendments necessary to be made as to the time when the bill shall take effect, as it may not pass until after the 30th of June. In the third line of the first section I move to strike out the word "next," and in the fourth line after the word "year" to insert "ending June 30, 1867;" so that it will read:

That from and after the commencement of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, the clerical force in the office of the Secretary of the Interior and in the several bureaux of the Department of the Interior shall be as follows, &c.

Mr. POMEROY. I thought we inserted that yesterday.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. As it did not come from the committee, it was not incorporated in the vote concurring in the amendments of the committee. I move this amendment of my own motion.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In the forty-ninth line of the first section I move to strike out the word "next" and insert the word "said;" so that it will read:

From and after the commencement of the said fiscal year.

And I also move the same amendment in the second line of the fourth section, to strike out the word "next" and insert the word "said."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those changes will be made in order to make the bill correspond with itself.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have a little more information as to the manner in which the pay of the Navy has been increased thirty-three per cent. because I must confess, if that has been done in my presence here, without my knowing anything about it, I should like to know when it was done and under what law it was done. If there is to be an increase in one Department of the Government, I would not stand here claiming that it should not be done in other Departments of the Government. I must confess that I am taken very much by surprise when I am informed that the pay of the Navy has been increased thirty-three per cent., and I should like to have some explanation from the Senator from Iowa about it.

Mr. GRIMES. I think I can inform the Senator without much trouble. By a law passed,

I think, in 1792, the Secretary of War was authorized to make rules and regulations for the government of the Army, which should have the same force and effect as laws of the United States, provided those rules and regulations did not contravene the laws of the United States. Such a law as that was not made applicable to the Navy, because the Navy Department was not created until 1798; and no law of that kind was in existence authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to make similar rules and regulations for the Navy until about three or four years ago, during this war. Under that law of 1792 has grown up the whole system of commutations that are allowed to officers of the Army. I think if the Senator from Ohio will examine the statutes of the United States he will find nowhere, except in regard to the longevity rations, any authority for commutation, &c. If he will examine the Army Rules and Regulations he will see that it is by the order of the Secretary of War. It was simply by an order of the Secretary of War that there was a double commutation allowed to officers stationed here in this place.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am familiar with that, and I think all of the Senate are familiar with that.

Mr. GRIMES. I shall be through in a minute. Up to 1835 officers of the Navy were allowed commutations for quarters, for servants, for fuel, for lights, and for transportation of baggage. In the law that passed, fixing the pay of the Navy, in 1835, there was an express prohibition against any such allowances being made in the future to officers of the Navy; but it was not made applicable to officers of the Army. When the naval appropriation bill was under consideration at the present session of Congress I offered an amendment repealing the law of 1835, and allowing the Secretary, therefore, under the authority that was vested in him by the act of Congress, to give commutation in certain instances. That bill was passed by both Houses and approved by the President. It is upon the authority, therefore, of the law as it stands, with that section of the act of 1835 stricken out of the statute-book, that the Secretary of the Navy has made an allowance to the officers of the Navy for the increase of their pay. It met the unanimous approval of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, and I understand it has met a similar approval of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was once a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I think we passed a pay law, and it was universally agreed that the system of commutation and allowance of the Army was not applicable to the Navy, and at the request of the officers of the Navy they had a fixed pay. That pay was increased, I think, on the motion of the Senator from Iowa; at any rate some changes were made when new grades were added.

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir, the pay was not increased and has not been during the war.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then there were some additional grades made and some changes in the law; but I did not know until this morning that under a provision inserted on an appropriation bill the pay of the Navy was increased thirty-three and one third per cent. I am now informed of the mode and manner of that increase; and I think the first duty of Congress is to fix by law a salary for the officers of the Army and the Navy. An abuse which has been ingrafted in the Army from time to time, and grown up as an admitted abuse, is now extended to the Navy. It seems to me the better way would be to establish the salary of both Army and Navy hereafter by law. If the pay of officers of the Navy has been increased in this way, I certainly do not object to the increase of the pay of such officers as the Commissioner of Pensions and these various officers five or six hundred dollars a year. If by a simple amendment ingrafted on an appropriation bill, when many of us were not present—certainly I was not—the whole pay of the Navy has been increased thirty-three per cent., I certainly will not stand here resisting, in the interests of economy, the addition of a few hundred dollars to the pay of such officers as the Commissioner of Pensions and the Commissioner of Public Lands.

Mr. NYE obtained the floor.

Mr. GRIMES. Let me say a word to the Senator from Ohio. The average increase of pay that will be allowed to officers of the Navy under the order of the Secretary will not exceed $200.

Mr. SHERMAN. Thirty-three per cent., some one says.

Mr. GRIMES. I say the average will not exceed $200. Some of them only get twenty per cent. While in the Army the commutation exceeds the amount of the pay proper, I believe, one or two hundred per cent., the Secretary of the Navy was so anxious that it should not be run to an excess in the Navy that he has limited them to twenty per cent. in some instances, and the highest is but thirty-three per cent.

I will state, further, that that amendment in its present form perhaps might not have been adopted if it had not been that the House of Representatives utterly refused to make any sort of appropriation to supply quarters for the naval officers who were required to do duty at navy-yards. We were required to have from fifteen to twenty-five naval officers at the New York yard, as an example. The shore-duty pay of a lieutenant commander, stationed there, who has been in the service twenty-five years, would be only $1,875, and he would be obliged to pay at least one third and in some instances one half of that for house rent alone. It was absolutely oppressive. The only way in which the evil could be obviated, as we thought, was to permit the Secretary in certain instances to allow a commutation. Men who are stationed in the yards and furnished quarters are not allowed by the order of the Secretary to have thirty-three per cent., but only twenty per cent. of an increase of pay, which to a lieutenant commander doing duty at a navy-yard would be about $300.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I hope we shall now have the vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada is entitled to the floor. The Chair will put the question as soon as the debate terminates, but cannot do so before.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I beg pardon of the Senator from Nevada; I was not aware that he was on the floor.

Mr. NYE. I believe it is the duty of Congress to provide ample pay to the clerks and other officers, and in most cases I believe it is cheaper service when they are paid liberally; but I desire to call the attention of the Senate, before they vote on this question, to an organization that exists in these Departments, as appears in that loyal paper, the National Intelligencer, on the morning of the 30th of last month. I desire simply to read that, and submit it to the Senate, so that they may see whose salaries they are raising:

JOHNSON DEPARTMENTAL CLUB.

In the proceedings of this club last evening, upon motion of Richard H. Jackson, Esq., it was unanimously

Resolved, That the loyal papers of this city be requested to publish the preamble to the constitution of the club, which is as follows:

Whereas the present crisis of this country calls for a full and honest expression of political sentiment, and a firm adhesion to the Constitution of our land, and the cardinal principles of government as enunciated and established by our fathers; whereas the present Congress of the United States, in usurping the judicial and executive functions of the Government, in overriding all State authority and jurisdiction, in defying the manifest sentiments and wishes of a vast majority of the people of the country, is rapidly changing our republican system of government into a despotism as unmitigated as ever was that of Austria; whereas we are uncompromisingly opposed to all such inroads upon the established principles of the Government, and as unwaveringly indorse and support the past and present administrative policy of President Andrew Johnson, particularly that of the readjustment of the late rebellious States; and whereas as honorable men, holding office under his Administration, feel it incumbent upon us either to sustain him in his noble efforts to preserve the Constitution and the liberties of the people against the infractions of Congress, or, if opposing him, to resign our positions for those who do sustain him; and whereas the political proscription by the several Departments of the Government of the friends of the President is a base imposition, and has become too flagrant and oppressive to be longer borne without remonstrance and resistance: Therefore, for the purpose of strengthening, as far as in our power, the hands of the Chief Magistrate of the Republic against all attempts by a radical Congress to subvert the Constitution and the Government; for the purpose of our mutual protection and support against the present intolerant proscription of the President's friends in the several Departments; and for the purpose of the free and candid expression and interchange of our political opinions and sentiments, we, employes and officers of the Government, do establish this, the constitution of the "Johnson Departmental Club" of Washington city, and cordially invite all employes of the Government in the District of Columbia, who indorse the object and purposes of this association, to join with us in the good work.

Upon motion of the same gentleman it was also unanimously

Resolved, That this club cordially indorse the late speeches of the honorable Secretaries of the Navy, War, State, and Treasury Departments, responsive to the invitation of the National Union Club; that the free, candid, and patriotic sentiments of the Secretary of the Treasury are in perfect keeping with his well-known personal and political integrity, are creditable to him alike as a patriot and statesman, and do honor to the Government he represents; that the able and candid response of the Secretary of War has rendered him still more prominent in the history of the country.

Resolved, That the replies of Secretary Harlan and Attorney General Speed were characteristic, and leave no room to doubt—as long generally believed—but what they are opposed to the President's readjustment policy; that they are but clogs in the machinery of the Government—obstacles in the way of the early restoration of the Union—prejudicing equally the success of the President's administration and the welfare of the country; that, as Cabinet officers hostile to the avowed policy of the President, they manifestly retain their positions in bad faith for sinister and ulterior purposes, and to embarrass, as far as they can, his attempts to heal the wounds of the country. Being, at least, opposed to his policy, they are incapable of rendering him that assistance and earnest cooperation essential to its complete success, and should give place to others more worthy and competent who can. That justice to the people and to the Government, and the necessities and welfare of the country, alike demand their immediate resignation or removal.

ROBERT WRIGHT,
President.

FERDINAND L. SARMIENTO, Secretary.

I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin if the head of this club is one of the men whose salaries he proposes to raise.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not know the name.

Mr. NYE. His name is Jackson.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. He is not in the Interior Department that I know of.

Mr. NYE. This document is signed by Robert Wright, president; Ferdinand L. Sarmiento, secretary.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No such names have appeared in the Interior Department, to my knowledge.

Mr. NYE. We have got so accustomed in Congress—

Mr. WILSON. This man Jackson is a clerk in the Second Auditor's office, one of the "chivalry."

Mr. NYE. I have not the honor of knowing the gentlemen who thus undertake to control and abuse Congress. We have got so accustomed to receiving rebuke from certain quarters that it ceases to hurt; but I insist upon it that a class of men who are here asking for favors at the hands of Congress, the clerks of these Departments, should be the last to attempt to control the action of Congress or to abuse its members.

Now, sir, I move that this subject be postponed until we can ascertain whether the officers of this departmental club are to be the recipients of the benefits of this increase of salary, and whether it is the object of this departmental club and of this bill to so cut down the number, and you always find the honestest men having the lowest salary, as to get rid of those men as clogs in this departmental club or not. I hope that this Senate, in view of its own dignity, that this Congress, in view of its own sense of propriety, before voting to increase the salaries of these men, will know whether it is these arraigners of the representatives of the country that are to receive the benefits of this increase of salary.

Mr. President, having stood such attacks from all other quarters without perceiving any symptoms of being hurt, I insist upon it that when these clerks attempt, with an insolence that has never before been equaled, with an impudence as unparalleled as the assertions from other quarters, imitating others in their expressions, to abuse the representatives of the people they shall not receive increased salary, increased facility for abusing the power from which they draw their nourishment and support. I therefore ask that this subject shall be postponed until we can inquire whether, while the men that in this "loyal" paper, the National Intelligencer, of the 30th of May, arraign Congress as usurpers and as establishing a despotism and tyranny here equal to Austria, are hitting us on one side of the head with a club, we shall open the pockets of the Government to give them increased facilities for hitting us again. I should like to have the Senator from Wisconsin take time; I do not suppose he is prepared now, for he never speaks without due preparation; I want him to investigate this subject and report "in brackets," as he has in this bill what is proposed to be stricken out, whether or not these departmental clubs exist and whether they are for the object set forth in this paper, whether the object is to bring every clerk in the Departments to support the President in his policy or to turn him out, and whether this bill is to aid in it. I insist upon it that this bill should not pass until the Senate has an opportunity to examine that matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the further consideration of the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. CONNESS. The motion was not for an indefinite postponement.

Mr. NYE. Temporarily, for a day or two.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The statement was until certain facts could be found out about a certain paper, which is of course an indefinite postponement.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator rather appeals to me personally. If I did not really suppose he was jesting this morning I should take it seriously; but it certainly is a supreme jest for him to quote that long article from the Intelligencer and make that have any sort of application to the bill that is now pending before the Senate. The bill before the Senate, it is true, increases the salaries of the Commissioner of Pensions, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and it increases the salaries of some of the principal clerks and heads of divisions in those bureaus and decreases the aggregate number of clerks in the Interior Department.

Mr. NYE. That is what I complain of. Is it to put out the men who do not maintain "the departmental club" and raise the salaries of those who remain?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Not at all.

Mr. NYE. That is what I want to see.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I hope the honorable Senator from Michigan will give way calling up the order of the day that we may dispose of this question.

Mr. HOWARD. I insist on the order of the day.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This is an important matter.

Mr. CONNESS. Let it go over until tomorrow.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. All the amendments have been passed upon, and it is simply a question on the passage of the bill. I should like to have it disposed of this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday is in order, and it can be laid aside, except on motion, only by unanimous consent.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator from Michigan insists—

Mr. HOWARD. I must insist on calling up the unfinished business of yesterday.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 127) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. DOOLITTLE, to strike out the second section of the proposed article and insert in lieu of it the following:

After the census to be taken in the year 1870, and each succeeding census, Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to the number in each State of male electors over twenty-one years of age qualified by the laws thereof to choose members of the most numerous branch of its Legislature; and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States according to the value of the real and personal taxable property situated in each State not belonging to the State or to the United States.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. President, the few observations which I propose to make are addressed to the general merits of the proposition which is before the Senate, but some of them are addressed to the very point of this pending amendment. I read in a morning paper that it was expected that I would present some important and new views upon the subject. The views that I shall present, Mr. President, may be important in the sense that almost any view that any man may present who has a vote to give on such a subject is important; but that I shall be able to say, after six months' discussion of this subject, anything new is more than I expect.

Mr. President, all the questions involved in the proposed amendments to the Constitution have been so elaborately and ably discussed on former occasions during the present session that I do not feel at liberty to attempt to argue them at length and in detail. I do not propose to do more than to state, in the shortest and plainest manner I am able, some of the reasons for my action upon the propositions submitted to us by the committee.

The clause of the first proposed amendment, that "no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States," secures nothing beyond what was intended by the original provision in the Constitution, that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

But the radical difference in the social systems of the several States, and the great extent to which the doctrine of State rights or State sovereignty was carried, induced mainly, as I believe, by and for the protection of the peculiar system of the South, led to a practical repudiation of the existing provision on this subject, and it was disregarded in many of the States. State legislation was allowed to override it, and as no express power was by the Constitution granted to Congress to enforce it, it became really a dead letter. The great social and political change in the southern States wrought by the amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery and by the overthrow of the late rebellion render it eminently proper and necessary that Congress should be invested with the power to enforce this provision throughout the country and compel its observance.

Now that slavery is abolished, and the whole people of the nation stand upon the basis of freedom, it seems to me that there can be no valid or reasonable objection to the residue of the first proposed amendment:

Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law.

It is the very spirit and inspiration of our system of government, the absolute foundation upon which it was established. It is essentially declared in the Declaration of Independence and in all the provisions of the Constitution. Notwithstanding this we know that State laws exist, and some of them of very recent enactment, in direct violation of these principles. Congress has already shown its desire and intention to uproot and destroy all such partial State legislation in the passage of what is called the civil rights bill. The power of Congress to do this has been doubted and denied by persons entitled to high consideration. It certainly seems desirable that no doubt should be left existing as to the power of Congress to enforce principles lying at the very foundation of all republican government if they be denied or violated by the States, and I cannot doubt but that every Senator will rejoice in aiding to remove all doubt upon this power of Congress.

The second article of the proposed amendments involves many considerations, and opens a much wider field for discussion. I suppose it is the purpose of the Union Republican majority in Congress, when they shall have agreed upon articles of amendment to the Constitution to be proposed for adoption, to say to the southern States which seceded, joined the confederacy, and waged war against the national Government, that as preliminary to their again becoming acting members of the national Union by their Senators and Representatives in Congress they must adopt or ratify such amendments. Indeed, one of the bills reported by the committee, accompanying the proposed amendments, proposes this directly, and is a part of the committee's plan of reconstruction. It is objected in the outset to this that the States and people who have remained loyal to the Government during the war for the suppression of the rebellion have no right to affix such or any condition whatever to their return; that, having laid down their arms and ceased active hostilities against the nation, and acknowledged their allegiance and willingness to obey the national laws, no reason exists why their representatives should not be immediately admitted to their seats in Congress and participate in the legislation for the nation; and that to refuse this is really to deny to those States their proper constitutional rights.

No public or political question has ever arisen in this country that has excited more ingenious and earnest debate than the legal and political condition of the seceded States after the suppression of the rebellion by the military power of the nation. The discussion began long before the war ended, and before there was occasion for any practical application, and it has continued ever since. I do not purpose to go into this question or to attempt to prove by argument that these States did or did not lose or forfeit their corporate existence as States by their acts of secession and rebellion, or that they are now in or out of the Union. I may say, however, that I was never able to see as clearly as others could anything so illogical and absurd in the doctrine that these States actually forfeited their rights as States and lapsed into the condition of Territories belonging to the Government, requiring reorganization and readmission into the Union as much as if they had never been admitted. Their acts of secession were of course entirely void, and of themselves had no effect; but when the great majority of the people of these States abandoned and forswore all allegiance to the Union, formed themselves into a hostile confederacy, filled every official place in the State with enemies of the Union, and then used all the official machinery of the State, in common with the personal efforts of the great majority of the people, in carrying on for years a bloody war against the nation, it seems to me almost absurd to say that the nation might not, if it so elected, treat them as having forfeited all rights to be considered existing States in the Union, and treat them when subdued as so much unorganized territory.

The difficulty now lying in the way of taking this ground and basing the reconstruction or restoration of the seceded States upon it is that the national Government has hitherto, from the beginning of the rebellion down to the present time, proceeded upon the opposite theory; that is, that the States, as such, still existed; that the corporate life of a State was not lost or destroyed by the passage of ordinances of secession or the prosecution of armed hostility by the majority of its citizens. All departments of the national Government having for so long acted upon this ground, it would be exceedingly embarrassing to unsay and undo so much that has been said and done; indeed, it could hardly be done without greatly aggravating and enhancing the difficulties with which the subject of restoration is now beset. Nothing short of absolute necessity could now justify the Government in ignoring State existence in the members of the late confederacy and reducing them to the condition of unorganized territories.

Is it necessary for the protection and safety of the always loyal part of the nation to do this? May we not without this require such guarantees and conditions from the seceding States, prior to allowing them to participate in the general direction and government of the nation, as in our judgment the national safety requires?

By the most formal and solemn acts of legislation these States withdrew or attempted to withdraw from the national Union; they abjured all allegiance to the national Government; they withdrew their Senators and Representatives from the national Legislature; they formed themselves into a separate and hostile confederacy, of which each of these States was a constituent member; and for four years as a separate nation of States, and by the individual action of the great majority of their people, they made most cruel and unrelenting war against the loyal part of the nation.

Now, conceding that all this did not destroy the corporate existence of each or either of these States as a legal essence, it must be admitted that all actual existence of legal relation or connection between those States and the national Union was severed and destroyed. It cannot be claimed that while these States were acting as States in the confederacy and occupying the position of armed and hostile belligerents toward the United States they were at the same time entitled to claim and exercise the rights of States in the Union; to be represented in its Legislature, and participate in its Government. We succeeded by our superior physical power in overthrowing and crushing this hostile confederacy, and compelled them to lay down their arms. Now, before these States can resume their former places in the Union loyal State governments must be instituted and take the place of the disloyal ones that have existed, and then the legal relation and connection between them and the General Government must be restored by some power or department of the General Government.

Now, in what department of the national Government does this power rest to say when the people of the insurgent States have returned to loyalty, whether the State governments set up anew are really and truly loyal, and then to restore the broken and severed legal relations between them and the Union? Clearly, in my judgment, it must rest in and with the law-making power of the Government, the representatives of the States and the people, the two Houses of Congress. In the progress of reconstructing or restoring these States to loyalty and their former position in the Union, the executive department of the Government has assumed to dictate terms and conditions to those States, which they complied with. The terms and conditions imposed were wise and just in themselves, and I do not take it upon me now to say they were not rightfully exacted by the Executive. But I do say that, in my judgment, there is far more ground of doubt as to the rightful power of the merely executive branch of the Government to do this than there is as to the power of Congress, the substantial law-making power of the nation, to exact the same or other like conditions.

It has been said that unless these States have really forfeited their State existence and are out of the Union, we have no more right to exact or impose conditions to their return than we have to impose similar terms upon New York or Ohio; that a State cannot commit treason or forfeit its existence by the commission of crime. But there cannot well be a State, exercising and performing its functions as such, without people; and the idea of the existence of a State in harmony with and yielding loyalty to the Union, and the people who inhabit it at the same time armed and hostile rebels, is certainly an anomaly.

Now, the people of these States are the same who have been rebels, the same with whom we have been at war for years, and from whom we have just succeeded in wresting their arms. Now, can it be possible that we are at once bound to admit these people to actively participate with us in administering the General Government; that we have no more power or right to test their loyalty or require security for it than we have of the people of a State which has always been loyal and true? It seems to me to be confounding all distinction between right and wrong, between innocence and crime, between loyalty and treason.

It is said there is no warrant in the Constitution for such a course, and therefore we cannot do it. The truth is, the framers of the Constitution never contemplated such a state of things and made no provision for it. The Constitution, to be sure, provides for the suppression of insurrections; but evidently this never contemplated an extensive rebellion so formidable as to produce for years a division of the nation and a separate de facto government. The real question is, not whether there is any express warrant in the Constitution for it, but whether there is anything in the letter or spirit of the Constitution that forbids it. In my judgment there is not. It is sanctioned by principles of substantial justice and right, and by the great law of self-protection and defense, which is as applicable to communities and nations as to individuals.

I conclude, then, that there is no objection to the exercise by Congress of the power to impose any condition or limitation to the return of these States to participate in the government of the nation, which shall be just in itself, and necessary for the safety and welfare of the nation.

If, as I insist, we have the right to require of these States suitable and sufficient conditions or guarantees, and that, too, by amendments of the fundamental law, then several questions present themselves upon the amendment proposed. Do we need this amendment for our future protection and the peace and safety of the nation? Does this amendment furnish it sufficiently? Is it doing any wrong or injustice to the white people of the South? Is it just to the negro population of the South? This amendment leaves the general basis of representation, as fixed by the Constitution originally, upon numbers or population. In some of the discussions of this subject in this Chamber it has been strenuously insisted that this is not the true and just basis upon which representation should be based, but that it should rest upon the basis of voters. I entirely disagree with those who have argued for this new doctrine, and in my mind it is clear that the existing basis is the only true one, the only one consistent with the true idea of a representative republican government. The question is not; perhaps, directly involved in this amendment, but still it is not wholly aside from my line of argument. All the people, or all the members of a State or community, are equally entitled to protection; they are all subject to its laws; they must all share its burdens, and they are all interested in its legislation and government.

Notwithstanding this no State or community professing to be republican allows all its people to vote. Every one fixes for itself some rule which, in its judgment, will furnish a body of voters or electors who will most wisely and safely represent the wishes and interests of the whole people. The right or franchise of voting has, probably, been more widely extended in these American States than in any other professed republican Government, but in the most liberal of these it has always been confined to a small minority of the whole people. In none of our States have females, or males under twenty-one years of age, ever been allowed to vote. In many of the States the right of voting has been restrained within much narrower limits. Persons coming to this country and establishing their permanent residence here are required to remain five years and then to go through an established process of naturalization before they are allowed the privilege of voting. Yet we all know that many females are far better qualified to vote intelligently and wisely than many men who are allowed to vote; and the same is true of many males under twenty-one, and of foreigners who have not resided here for the period of five years. The truth is that the whole system of suffrage of any republican State is wholly artificial, founded upon its own ideas of the number and class of persons who will best represent the wishes and interests of the whole people. The right of suffrage is not given to a particular class because they have any greater interest in the Government, or because they have any more natural right to it than others, nor to exercise it for themselves and in their own behalf, but is given to them as fair and proper exponents of the will and interests of the whole community, and to be exercised for the benefit and in the interest of the whole.

The theory is that the fathers, husbands, brothers, and sons to whom the right of suffrage is given will in its exercise be as watchful of the rights and interests of their wives, sisters, and children who do not vote as of their own. While the rules of suffrage are different in the different States, the plan of basing representation in the national Legislature upon the number of voters in each would be manifestly unjust; it might with the same propriety be based upon the number of members in the Legislature of each State. But if the rules of suffrage were the same in all the States, the adoption of such a rule for national representation would be manifestly unjust. The Union contains many very recently settled States, and by reason of the great extent of unsettled country all still have, such must be the case for many years to come. These new States to a great extent are settled by emigration from the older States, and it has been and will ever continue the case that a much larger proportion of this emigration are males. The consequence is that the newly settled States contain a very much larger proportion of males than the older States, and therefore a much larger ratio of voters.

Can it be justly claimed that five thousand people in Nevada or Colorado should have the same voice in the Government as twenty thousand people in Massachusetts or New York, even though the number of males above twenty-one were the same in each? I have said more than was necessary upon this particular point. By the existing Constitution the States holding slaves, in addition to their other population, were entitled to have three fifths of their slaves counted in ascertaining their share of representation. By the amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery, which was really one of the results of the war, this entire mass of slave population, counting by millions, were made free, and as the Constitution stands the States where slavery existed would now be entitled to have the remaining two fifths added to their numbers for representation, although no one of them all is allowed to vote.

This very fact, it seems to me, furnishes a very sufficient reason for a readjustment of representation among the States, and an answer to the often-repeated question, why amend the Constitution at all? With no amendment on this subject the late slave States come into the lower House of Congress with a much larger representation than ever before. Is it safe to do this, is it just to the loyal portion of the nation who have borne such immense burdens to maintain its existence? If not, I hold we are not bound to encounter any such peril. For a long period of years sectional hatred toward the North had been cultivated in the South, in consequence of our dislike and condemnation of their wicked and anti-republican system of human slavery. This feeling was excited and fomented by the arts of ambitious and designing men till it broke out in a gigantic rebellion for the purpose of separating from us and forming a separate government for themselves—the most terrible and bloody civil war the world has ever seen, lasting for four years; characterized by almost innumerable instances of cruel and barbarous hate on the part of the insurgent States. We finally succeeded in putting down the rebellion, overthrowing the government they had set up, and adding the mortification of total defeat of their cause to their other reasons for hating us and disliking our Government. These people have submitted to the national Government because they have been compelled by force to do so.

But have we any evidence that justifies the belief that they are now ready to yield willing allegiance to the Government and obedience to its laws? All the mass of evidence taken by the reconstruction committee, the tone and sentiment of the almost entire southern press, the information derived from private sources, concur in showing that as yet no such thing exists to any considerable extent, and that the feeling of hostility to the national Government and northern people is as great now as it was while the war was raging, and that the submission to the laws and authority of the Government is the enforced submission to superior power. Does any one doubt that if an opportunity was now offered for an effectual separation it would not be embraced by a far larger majority of the southern people than that by which their acts of secession were adopted?

Looking at the circumstances we could hardly expect to find it otherwise now, and I respect those people more for the open and undisguised avowal of their sentiments than I should if they hypocritically pretended to acquiesce cheerfully and rejoicingly in their own defeat. We must rely upon time, emigration, the intercourse of business, interchanges of kindness and good will, and especially the beneficent and protecting care and influence of the Government to foster and build up a feeling of attachment to the Union and to allay the bitterness and asperity now existing. In this view it has seemed to me that it was not so desirable as many others have believed it to be that great haste should be made in their restoration, and that our reunion with them would be much more likely to be harmonious and lasting if done coolly and deliberately than if we rushed to embrace each other.

But the question is, whether in the present state of facts it is safe and just to the nation to admit these States to participate in the government of the nation upon such terms as will incur any hazard of their being able to take the control of it, and if they choose injure or overthrow it? I have heard it asked what harm they could do if admitted to full representation in Congress and were able by political affiliations and alliances to control the legislation of the nation.

I will refer to but one of the many things which might be most disastrous to the people of the loyal States. To carry on the war and suppress the rebellion we have incurred a debt to the enormous amount of $3,000,000,000. The great bulk of this debt is held by the people of the North. Much of it is held by capitalists, but not all, by any means. It has entered into all the transactions of society and business. All public trusts, whether educational, charitable, or religious, are invested in it, as well as nearly all private trusts for widows, minors, or others. The entire currency of the country is composed of it or based upon it. In addition to this it is most extensively held among the people; in my own State I know that almost every man who had any money to invest, whether the amount was great or small, now holds it in Government bonds. Indeed, I think I may say that except what is invested in business or in business corporations, the great mass of the money capital of the North is now in the national securities. To pay even the interest on this debt and our immense annual pension-list will require taxation for us of unexampled severity for many years to come.

Now, this debt has all been incurred in putting down the southern rebellion; our great pension-list is to reward or reimburse those who have suffered on our side in the same cause. The war to a great extent has devastated the South; very many have been made poor and destitute; they have lost their slaves, whose value they counted by thousands of millions; almost every one suffered loss by the bubble of the rebel debt; they have their thousands of maimed and disabled men and their thousands of widows and orphans dependent upon them for support, and for whom no provision can or will be made by the nation. Under these circumstances will they not be restive under our heavy taxation to pay our national debt and our pensioners? Say what we will, say what they will, the truth is that if they can avoid aiding in its payment they will do so, and pretexts enough will be found in some fancied or pretended injustice to them on our part to justify such action on theirs. In saying this I do not mean to assert that these people are more faithless or less sensible of obligation than we are, for I have very little doubt that under the same circumstances we should do the same thing. It is hardly in human nature to do otherwise.

It is said we ought to be magnanimous and trustful toward these people; put full faith in their promises and oaths; that we have no right to assume they will not keep them. I would certainly extend all magnanimity to them. I would trust all their oaths and promises which I believed they would keep. But I should hardly desire to trust them to fulfill a promise which under the same circumstances I fear I should myself find some excuse for breaking.

But I do not think we are specially called upon to trust or put faith in official and governmental oaths taken by our southern friends. Can they ever be more solemnly bound to the Government and to yield it their allegiance than they were at the very moment they seceded and violated their oaths? Our faith can hardly be strengthened by our experience.

This class of oaths has not in latter years been found very binding on the individual conscience, and of them we may say, with Hudibras—

"Oaths are but words, and words but wind,
Too feeble implements to bind,
And hold with deeds proportion so
As shadows to the substance do."

But what have we to fear from them if admitted into Congress with all the representation they would have without any amendment of the Constitution? The North would still greatly outnumber them, and could always vote them down.

It is sneeringly asked, do you not consider yourselves their equals? Are you such cowards and poltroons as to be afraid of being beaten in debate and overthrown by these southern gentlemen with such odds in your favor? It is not hard to answer these questions in fact, but it is hard and humiliating to be compelled to acknowledge where the real danger lies. For many years prior to the rebellion the North had a large numerical superiority over the South, and a much larger delegation in Congress. She was still more largely her superior in wealth, in business, and in all material and scientific advancement. But notwithstanding all these advantages to the North, the South ruled the nation. Why? The answer is short: by the aid of her northern allies.

To go back no further than the war of the rebellion: did we not have many men in the North who sympathized with the rebels; who counseled resistance to the draft, and threw every obstacle in the way of the successful prosecution of the war; who rejoiced at our defeats and rebel victories? Did not a large party in a national convention resolve that the war for the suppression of the rebellion was a failure and ought to be stopped? Now, if men could be found who would do this when the nation was in the very mortal agony to preserve its existence, is it uncharitable to suppose that to make a successful political alliance and get into power, men would not be found who would unite on a platform of repudiation of the national debt? Why, in my part of the country the war cry of a certain party has been "Taxation of the national securities!" which was but a partial repudiation of the contract of the Government. I do not desire to dwell upon this point; it is not a pleasant theme either for reflection or discussion.

Considering the immense pecuniary stake the people of the loyal States have in the national securities, and the universal disaster and calamity which would attend their repudiation, or even any great distrust of them, it behoves us to be cautious and sure that we open no possible door for the entrance of such danger. In my judgment, the admission of the southern representatives without such an amendment of the Constitution as the new and changed condition of southern population requires in order to be just, would subject us to that very peril; indeed, that it would be sure to come. I would prevent it.

Will this amendment, if adopted, furnish the needed protection; or in other words, will the South, even with the aid of northern allies, be able to obtain the control of the Government or of Congress?

If these States refuse to extend the right of suffrage to the colored men their representation will be confined to the white population. This number, especially of males above twenty-one years of age, has largely decreased during the war, and this deduction, together with that to be made for the three fifths of the slave population, would so reduce the congressional representation of the seceding States that no reasonable fear need be entertained that even with the aid of northern allies would they be able to obtain control of the Government. If, to enlarge their political power and representation in Congress, they extend suffrage to all the colored men, such an element of loyalty would thereby be infused into the ballot-box that, added to the white loyalty existing there, we might safely count upon a portion of their representation being reliable, true Union men, and thus avoid a solid sectional vote against the interests of that part of the country which has saved it. In my judgment, there is no reasonable ground of fear, whether they do or do not extend suffrage to colored men, that the control of the national Government can be placed in disloyal hands.

Will the adoption of this amendment work any wrong or injustice to the white people of the South?

While slavery existed they were allowed representation upon three fifths of their slaves. It is somewhat difficult to see any principle upon which this basis was adopted. If they stood upon the same footing as the non-voting white population, then they should have had representation for the whole number; while if they were regarded as property merely they should not have been counted at all, as no property qualification was established or allowed in other respects. If any representation at all was allowed, it was proper that its exercise should be given to the masters, as the condition of absolute dependence and submission in which the slaves stood rendered all free and intelligent choice impossible on their part, and if the slaves had any interest to be protected it was the master's and not theirs. The master might possibly be regarded as the head of a family, of which the slaves formed a part, and so their proper representative; but I agree that the analogy is exceedingly faint. But the compromise by which this partial representation was allowed for slaves had probably very little foundation in any just principle of representation, but was one of the arbitrary compromises by which the conflicting interests of the two sections were adjusted. The North consented to so much representation, in consideration that direct taxes should be laid in the same manner. Like all the compromises that have been made, the South had the best of it, as they had a large and constant representation from it, while the direct taxes have been too small and unfrequent to furnish any corresponding advantage to the North.

But slavery is over and ended. The slaves have been made free. The masters can no longer claim to represent them, either on the ground that they are members or dependents of their families or that they own them as their property. The former ruling class in the South say, "These people, now having become free persons, we are entitled to have our representation raised by the enumeration of the whole for that purpose." "Very well," say we, "let the same rule of suffrage extend to them as is applied to the white people, and be represented for them all." "By no means," it is answered; "they are too ignorant to know how to protect their own interests in voting, and therefore we will vote for them; and still more, we cannot permit them to vote because it would tend to elevate them socially to something like the elevated plane upon which we stand, which we will not submit to."

Is there any just ground upon which the southern whites can claim that they should represent the negro population, especially those lately held in slavery? Do they stand in the same relation to them that the fathers, husbands, and brothers of a northern community do to their non-voting women and children, whose interests are as dear to them as their own? How opposite in theory and in fact is the relation between them. They do not regard them as having a common interest to be supported, but as a hostile element in society to be spurned and crushed.

It seems to me perfectly manifest that upon no just principle should representation be allowed to the whites on account of the negroes. Suppose we test this by the actual choice of the negroes themselves.

If the negroes were allowed to choose representatives themselves, and to choose between their former masters or others like them and men like the senior Senators from Massachusetts and Ohio, which would be elected? I would be willing to wager well on the success of my friends here. I think it perfectly just for us to say, "If you will not let these people vote you shall not alone represent them, but we will do it jointly. We believe we have their true interests at heart quite as much as you; we believe we understand their wants quite as well, and we are satisfied they will be more content under our joint representation than under yours alone."

Does this amendment do justice to the colored people of the South? Mr. President, I am sorry to feel compelled to say that I do not think it does. I cannot feel satisfied with a scheme of reconstruction of these rebel States which gives no direct and immediate benefit to the only class of loyal people living in them. When I remember how loyal and faithful these people ever proved; how they fed, clothed, concealed, and guided our prisoners who had escaped from rebel prisons and starvation; how faithfully and truly they brought us information and guided our troops; and more than all, how gallantly they fought by the side of our men, and how nobly they yielded their lives to save the nation, I feel that something more direct should be granted to and done for them. I should be much better satisfied if the right of suffrage had been given at once to the more intelligent of them and such as had served in our Army. But it is believed by wiser ones than myself that this amendment will very soon produce some grant of suffrage to them, and that the craving for political power will ere long give them universal suffrage. Such I know to be the opinion of many intelligent Union men of the South with whom I have conversed. I trust the result may be as they predict, and that the day may come when in all the nation, as in my own free State, the law shall make and know no difference between men on account of race or color. Believing that this amendment probably goes as far in favor of suffrage to the negro as is practicable to accomplish now, and hoping it may in the end accomplish all I desire in this respect, I shall vote for its adoption, although I should be glad to go further.

The substitute for the third section, which we have adopted, disables the leaders of the rebellion, both civil and military, from holding office unless restored by act of Congress. Can the South, can the men who are thus disabled, complain of this? Were ever men who had been guilty of armed rebellion against their lawful Government treated with such lenity? The history of the world shows no parallel of mercy like this. Never before was there a rebellion of half the magnitude of this, I might say of a hundredth part the magnitude of this, that the streets did not run with the blood of the offenders. A war without cause, or pretended cause, except that the opposite party had carried the election in a constitutional way, which resulted in killing and disabling probably half a million men on our side, involving us in a debt of $3,000,000,000 to burden us and our children after us, and we exact as a penalty for it, and as a measure of safety for ourselves, that the leaders, instead of being hung, shall not hold office unless Congress shall for their good behavior or other cause remove the restriction. What if they were the subjects of a political delusion? What if they had been taught that a State had the constitutional power to secede? Have not all rebellions had as good a foundation, and those who were hanged for it been as sincere in their belief in the justice of their cause as any man in this rebellion was? This has never been regarded as any answer to the legal liability. If a man or set of men make war against their Government, they do it at the peril of making the war successful or of taking the legal consequences.

If when the rebellion was over we had said to every man engaged in it, "We will allow you to retain your life and your property, but you shall never participate in the Government of the country you have attempted to destroy, by voting or holding office," it would have been all they could have expected or had any right to expect. This is the basis upon which Maryland, Missouri, and other States have settled it for themselves.

But we leave the great mass utterly untouched, and the leaders with their lives, their property, the full enjoyment of all their civil rights and privileges, with the right of voting for all officers, both State and national, with the single restriction they shall not hold office. The disproportion between the cause and the consequence is so great as to almost make it ridiculous. I know it is said that this is a measure so harsh and severe that it will not be accepted by the South. But I do not believe so; on the contrary, I believe it will be acceptable to the masses, that they will consider it a very easy atonement, and that if there is anything like punishment in it, it falls where it is deserved. If there be any included in this class (as it is agreed there may be) who were really forced into the rebellion against their will, it will be very easy to procure absolution by making the fact appear to Congress.

The remaining propositions of amendment, declaring the sacred and inviolable character of our national obligations, and the illegality and invalidity of the rebel debt, and of any compensation for the slaves who have been freed, admit of no doubt as sound propositions in themselves. The only question that can be made upon them is the propriety or necessity of incorporating them into the fundamental law. For myself, I think that although these may in a certain sense be said to be matters of a temporary character, still they involve interests of such immense magnitude that it is proper they should be settled in the most solemn and enduring mode, and that their incorporation into the Constitution will save disputes and wrangling hereafter.

Mr. President, it has been said that all these proposed amendments, as a whole, as a general plan for the restoration of these States, will not be acceptable to them, and that they will not adopt them, or at least that they will not do it willingly; and if they adopt them at all it will only be under a kind of coercion and because they cannot otherwise obtain what they seek; and that we have no right to secure even proper amendments in that way.

It seems to me that this plan, as a whole, is characterized by so much moderation and forbearance that it cannot fail to commend itself to the people of these States so that they will readily and freely give it their sanction. But, sir, if it be true that they are not satisfied with it, and will only adopt it to secure their return to share in the national power, I am so well satisfied that this plan contains nothing but what we have the right to insist on, and which justice to the nation requires, that I should feel no hesitation in saying kindly, but firmly, "You must acquiesce in these amendments before we will permit you to take part in the administration of the General Government." There is nothing new in this, either. Did these States accept the amendment abolishing slavery willingly—a much more important matter to them than anything contained in these propositions? Did they declare their ordinances of secession null and void or declare the rebel debt invalid willingly? We know they did not, but only because the President required it of them. Has any one ever blamed the President or thought he was unjust to the South in these requirements? If the people of the nation, through their representatives, believe that something more should justly be required, they have the equal right and should exercise the right to demand it.

We should not exercise our power to make any unjust demand, but what is just and right to exact we should be wanting in our duty if we fail to have done.

Mr. President, it is a matter of great satisfaction to me that at last, after so much and so anxious deliberation, it appears so probable that Congress will be able to present a plan upon which the requisite majorities of both Houses will be able to agree, and especially when as a whole this plan commends itself so well to my own judgment of what is right.

It is known that some differences of opinion have existed between Congress and the Executive on this subject.

Great differences have existed among ourselves; many opinions have had to yield to enable us to agree upon a plan. If we are so fortunate, as I trust we shall be, to pass these propositions by the requisite majorities, although they may not in all respects correspond with the views of the President, I believe he will feel it to be his patriotic duty to acquiesce in the plan proposed, and give his powerful influence and support to procure their adoption. We are all aiming at the same grand result, the difference is rather in the choice of modes and means to attain it. We are all, I trust, actuated by the same high motives of patriotism, and all desire to see all these States again acting harmoniously together. In a matter of such grave importance, with no precedents for our action, with no guide in the Constitution but that furnished by its general spirit and purpose, it is not singular that great diversity of ideas should exist. In such case opinions must yield to some extent, or else nothing could be agreed or settled, and all would be anarchy. I will not allow myself to believe that these measures will not, under the circumstances, receive the sincere support of the President, although he may not believe them perfect.

Mr. President, there are men who believe we are now on the verge of ruin, and that we shall never again become a united and harmonious people. But, sir, I believe they are either cowards or croakers, who always see the dark side of the picture. For myself, I see no such cause of alarm. To me everything looks hopeful for the future. We have just gone through the greatest war the world has ever seen. An unparalleled social revolution has taken place in the South—three or four million people turned from slaves into a free people.

That in so short a time after these great events so much of order and quietness and obedience to law should exist is astonishing. The world never witnessed its parallel. We did not expect it ourselves before the close of the war, but now we are impatient and troubled because it is not better. Time alone will smooth and allay the stormy waves of excitement and passion caused by such momentous events. To me, sir, a great and glorious future is opening for our country. Slavery, the great blight and curse that has hung upon us, is ended forever. The South, so long retarded by it, will be opened and expanded by the influence of free labor and free institutions. A new agriculture will enrich and beautify her fields. Commerce and manufactures will build up busy towns and carry thrift and wealth along her great rivers. All causes of discord between North and South being over, we shall become a homogeneous nation of free men, dwelling together in peace and unity. United and wholly free, our power would awe the world. I hope to live to see the day when all will agree that this great war which has destroyed slavery, severe and burdensome as it was to this generation, was yet one of those "blessings in disguise" sent by the Great Ruler of all which proved the very salvation of the nation.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, as I shall vote for the plan agreed upon among my political friends, it is proper that I should make a brief statement of my reasons. While it is not the plan that I would have adopted, as is well known, still it is the best that I can get, and contains many excellent provisions. It repudiates the rebel debt and affirms the sacred obligation of the nation to pay the debt contracted in preservation of the Union. It does not base representation on voters, which I preferred, but it approximates it more nearly than any other plan presented, and recognizes the principle that a white man in the North is entitled to equal representation with a white man in the South. It declares that all men are entitled to life, liberty, and property, and imposes upon the Government the duty of discharging these solemn obligations, but fails to adopt the easy and direct means for the attainment of the results proposed. It refuses the aid of four million people in maintaining the Government of the people. It involves freedmen's bureaus, civil rights bills, test oaths, and exclusion from office, all supported by military power. I would not object to these, for I recognize the obligation of full protection for all men, if there were no cheaper, easier, and better plan for the attainment of this worthy object. But the reasons why I can support this plan are, that it recognizes the obligations, which I hold sacred, and does not preclude Congress from adopting other means by a two-thirds vote, when experience shall have demonstrated, as it certainly will, the necessity for a change of policy. In fact it furnishes a conclusive argument in favor of universal amnesty and impartial suffrage. The longer the North strives to protect the negro and the white loyalists of the South from sure violence at the hands of rebels by military power, supported by grievous taxation, with increasing danger of a consolidated and despotic Government, the more clearly will the necessity appear of returning to first principles, and according the ballot to all men. It is not the first time that the black man's aid has been spurned by this Government, and it will not be the first time that necessity has driven us to avail ourselves of his support. While his labor was added to the power of treason traitors were triumphant; when it was subtracted and added to the material resources of the Government the Union forces were victorious. While his political power is ignored or added to disloyalty free government in the South is impossible. When it is withdrawn from rebels and added to the loyal forces the Union and republican institutions will be safe. The utter impossibility of a final solution of the difficulties by the means proposed will cause the North to clamor for suffrage. Test oaths, exclusion from office, and military rule will make the South anxious for amnesty, now so lightly considered, and willing to take suffrage to avoid certain and greater evils. While the way is left open, as it is in these resolutions, for both mercy and justice, the logic of events will work out the great problem, and satisfy all who are not now satisfied that the march of this country must either be toward consolidated, arbitrary power, supported by enormous taxation, or toward amnesty and suffrage, union and liberty. If the arguments presented by this plan do not convince at once time will do the work. I will further remark that it is a better plan than I expected could be agreed upon, and I hope much good from it. It may lead to a final settlement, and with that view I shall give it my support.

Mr. HOWE proceeded to address the Senate. Without concluding, he yielded the floor for an executive session. [His speech will be published in full in the Appendix.]

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 5, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MINERAL LANDS.

Mr. JULIAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, by unanimous consent, reported back House bill No. 822, to provide for the survey and sale of the lands of the United States containing gold, silver, and other valuable minerals, for the assaying and coining of such minerals, and for other purposes, with amendments and an accompanying report. The bill with the amendments and the accompanying report were ordered to be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

NEW YORK AND MONTANA MINING COMPANY.

Mr. STEVENS. I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill No. 203, to enable the New York and Montana Manufacturing Company to purchase a certain amount of the public lands now in market, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The question was taken on the motion to reconsider, and it was agreed to.

The question recurred on ordering the bill to a third reading.

Mr. STEVENS. This is a bill to enable a company to establish iron works in advance of the building of railroads in Montana Territory. It passed the Senate unanimously without any difficulty. It becomes necessary to cause a survey of the lands, and this bill is the result.

Mr. SPALDING. I would like to hear from the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands something in regard to the merits of this bill.

Mr. JULIAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HOLMES] had more particular charge of the bill, and probably can explain it more intelligibly than I can.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Public Lands have had this bill under consideration and have directed me to report it to the House with a recommendation that it pass. The necessity for this bill arises from the fact that the public Lands in Montana have not been surveyed. Preemptors can take up but one hundred and sixty acres of land each. The parties interested in this measure have been associated under the general law of the State of New York providing for the incorporation of manufacturing and mining companies. The object of this company is to carry on the business of mining and manufacturing of iron and steel in the Territory of Montana. I have looked over their articles of association and I find that they have complied in every respect with the law of the State of New York under which they are incorporated. They desire to establish in the Territory of Montana iron works of sufficient capacity, not only to supply the mining interests with iron and such articles as are manufactured from iron, but also to supply, if possible, the iron necessary in the construction of the Pacific railroad. For this purpose a large supply of wood land is absolutely necessary.

Parties interested in this company applied to the Commissioner of the Land Office to ascertain whether they could go on and preempt the quantity of land required by taking a large number of persons who would be entitled to preemption. They found that that was impossible. Under the preemption law only sufficient timber to construct buildings and for the necessary improvement of the land could be taken. It became necessary, therefore, to apply to Congress, because the public lands had not been surveyed. Parties acquainted with this business estimate the quantity of land necessary to supply the wood for such a work as this would be from twelve to twenty thousand acres. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] who is familiar with this matter, will be able to state precisely what is required. I understand that there is attached to his iron works a lot of sixteen thousand acres, and that he regards that amount as quite small enough for works of the magnitude proposed to be established by this bill.

This bill does not ask for a donation of land. It provides simply that this company may go on, under such directions as the Secretary of the Interior may make, and select twenty sections of land, three of them to be mineral, composed of iron or coal, and the residue, seventeen sections, to be composed of wood or timber land. The lands are to be selected in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior shall direct. They are to be bounded by lines running north and south and east and west, and are to be as nearly in a square form as possible. The company are to be at the expense of surveying the lands and furnishing plats after survey for the approbation of the Secretary of the Interior.

They are to pay to the Government the Government price of $1 25 per acre for the lands within two years from the passage of this bill, and within the same time they are to erect upon these lands and have in operation iron works capable of producing fifteen hundred tons of iron per annum.

Now, as I said before, there is no gift asked for or desired by this company. If they go there and make this investment, an investment of not less than $200,000, it is necessary that they should have timber to run the works for a series of years. All they ask is that, as the Government has not surveyed these lands so that they can purchase them, that they be allowed, at their own expense, to survey the lands, pay the Government price for them, take possession of them, and erect their works.

There is attached to a pamphlet, which I have here, a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office stating the difficulties that this company would labor under if they undertook to preempt these lands, and also a letter from the Delegate from Montana and the marshal of that Territory, recommending the passage of this bill. I will ask the Clerk to read those letters.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March 23, 1866.

SIR: In reply to your letter of this date, making inquiries as to the legality of taking timber from preemption claims, I herewith inclose circular of December 24, 1855, in which the construction of the law for the preservation of public timber is clearly set forth.

From this it will be seen that, except for the improvement of the land or the construction of buildings, fences, or other improvements upon the premises, preemptors are not allowed to cut timber. Settlers under the homestead act are brought within the same restrictions.

The enforcement of these regulations is necessary to prevent the spoliation of the public timber and the subsequent abandonment of the preemption or homestead claims without compensation to the General Government.

The principle is, that parties are not allowed unnecessarily to denude the land of its principal value until they have acquired an absolute title; and this is the only safe rule that can be devised, unless authority should be granted to sell the timber alone.

To cut the wood to the extent proposed by you would make you liable to prosecution and penalty, and complaint could be made by the Government agent or by an individual.

Your letter is returned herewith for reference.

Your obedient servant,

J. M. EDMUNDS,
Commissioner.

O. D. BARRETT, Esq., Washington City, D. C.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 19, 1866.

GENTLEMEN: We, the undersigned, have examined the bill introduced by Senator WACE on the 15th instant, and numbered 203.

We do not see anything in the bill to which any resident of Montana or any one having any interest in that Territory could object; but on the contrary, we know of nothing that would aid the development of the agricultural resources and mineral wealth of that Territory so much as having the iron we need manufactured on the spot.

Timber, grazing, and arable lands are in such profuse abundance there as to preclude the possibility of such a grant being construed into giving a monopoly.

Had the public surveys been commenced with the settlement of the Territory there would have been no necessity for making the grant; but, under the circumstances, the necessity exists, and we earnestly recommend the passage of the bill.

SAMUEL McLEAN,
Delegate from Montana.
GEORGE M. PINNEY,

United States Marshal, Montana Territory.

Mr. HOLMES. The total amount of lands which this bill authorizes them to preempt and purchase is twelve thousand eight hundred acres, of which ten thousand eight hundred and eighty acres are to be wood or timber land. All mineral lands except iron and coal are expressly reserved, and the patents when issued are to convey no title to any lands thus reserved. No one can over estimate the benefits both to the General Government and the people of the Territory of Montana that will accrue from the establishment of works of this character in that Territory. Industry, enterprise, and thrift will follow and surround them. I hope the bill will receive, as I believe it deserves, the support of every member of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I think these gentlemen are launching upon a rather perilous experiment. They must have great faith in the influx of population into the Territory of Montana. The idea of making iron, the most valuable of all metals, even more valuable than gold and silver, there in advance of much population is one which ought to be encouraged, and can be encouraged only in the way set forth here. As to the number of acres that would be required to produce fifteen hundred tons of pig iron and convert it into bar iron by means of charcoal every one acquainted with the subject knows that it would require at least sixteen thousand acres. I should think twenty thousand acres as little as any man would want to start with. I have but a small establishment myself, and yet I find sixteen thousand acres too little for my purpose. I should not have referred to my own works if the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOLMES] had not referred to them. They are situated in what are called the South mountains, between Adams and Franklin counties. There are four iron works adjoining mine. One of them has more land than mine has, about seventeen thousand acres. Mine has between sixteen and seventeen thousand acres. I doubt if any prudent man would think of putting charcoal iron works on less than from fifteen to twenty thousand acres.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] that it makes a difference whether the timber is hard wood or soft wood. He has been speaking of hard wood in his calculations. The timber in Montana is composed in great part of soft wood, pine, hemlock, &c.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman is correct. If the timber should happen to be pine and hemlock it would require more; twenty thousand acres would be as little as would be necessary to carry on these works. Our chestnut timber will grow in twenty years so as to be fit for cutting for this purpose. But the timber in Montana, I understand, is mostly pine and hemlock, and of course it would require a longer time for it to be renewed.

Inasmuch as iron enters largely in the pursuits of mining, agriculture, and manufactures, I think we should do all that could be done to foster its manufacture in these new regions. This company asks nothing from the Government except the privilege of now doing what they would have a right to do, had these lands been surveyed by the Government. I think much can be said in favor of the bill, and I can see nothing that can be said against it.

Mr. PRICE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] one or two questions in regard to this bill. Is it to grant to this company the privilege of pre-empting these lands or of purchasing them?

Mr. STEVENS. The privilege of purchasing them.

Mr. PRICE. To purchase twenty sections of land in a square form in the Territory of Montana.

Mr. HOLMES. Amounting to twelve thousand eight hundred acres in the aggregate.

Mr. PRICE. Are the mineral lands excepted from the operations of this bill?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir; all mineral lands are excepted except iron and coal lands. This bill is perhaps more carefully guarded in that respect than any other making a land grant that I now recollect, and I have looked into it very particularly.

Mr. PRICE. Then the only effect of this bill is to give this company the privilege of purchasing these lands in advance of the Government surveys?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir, paying the expense of the surveys themselves, and paying for the land in two years, in which time they must have their iron works established.

Mr. PRICE. Then I can see no objection to the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TRACTION ENGINE ROADS IN TERRITORIES.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to aid in establishing a line of traction engines and wagons from the Missouri river to the Rocky mountains, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' ORPHANS' FAIR.

Mr. MOULTON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be respectfully requested to loan to the lady managers of the soldiers' and sailors' orphans' fair, now being held in this city, such American flags in his possession as may be desired to decorate the building in which the said fair is being held.

Mr. MOULTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXPENSES OF INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for present consideration a resolution of inquiry addressed to the Secretary of the Interior, calling for his annual report upon the contingent expenses of his Department.

Mr. SPALDING. Let the resolution be read.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas by an act of Congress, approved August 26, 1842, it is made the duty of "the head of each Department to report to Congress, at the commencement of every regular session, a detailed statement of the manner in which the contingent fund of their respective Departments, and for the bureaus and offices therein, has been expended, giving the names of every person to whom any portion thereof has been paid; and if anything furnished, the quantity and price; and if for any services rendered, the nature of such service, and the time employed, and the particular occasion or cause, in brief, that rendered such service necessary; and the amount of all former appropriations in each case on hand, either in the Treasury or in the hands of any disbursing officer or agent, and that they shall require of the disbursing officers, acting under their direction or authority, the return of precise and analytical statements and receipts for all the moneys which have been, from time to time during the next preceding year, expended by them, and the results of such returns, and that the sums total shall be communicated annually to Congress by said officers respectively;" and whereas by an act of Congress approved June 25, 1861, also an act approved March 4, 1863, "the Secretary of the Interior was authorized to expend such part of the amount theretofore appropriated to carry into effect any treaty stipulation with any tribe or tribes of Indians, all or any portion of whom shall be in a state of actual hostility to the Government of the United States, including the Creeks, Choctaws, Seminoles, Wichitas, and other affiliated tribes, as well as the Cherokees, as might be found necessary to support such individual members of said tribes as had been driven from their homes or reduced to want on account of their friendship to the United States, and enable them to subsist until they could support themselves in their own country: Provided, That an account should be kept of the sums so paid for the benefit of the said members of said tribes, which account shall be rendered to Congress at the commencement of the next session thereof," &c.; and whereas it appears that said reports have not been made to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior during its present session as required by the aforesaid acts, but have been altogether withheld: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish the said reports to Congress at an early day and inform this House why it is that the same has not been made as required by law.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I object.

EDUCATION OF COLORED YOUTH.

On motion of Mr. HOLMES, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Public Lands was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the New York Central College for the education of colored youth; and the same was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

A. L. GOODRICH AND NATHAN CORNISH.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

There was no objection.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to report back joint resolution (H. R. No. 77) for the relief of Ambrose L. Goodrich and Nathan Cornish for carrying the United States mails from Boise City to Idaho City, in the Territory of Idaho, and to move that the House non-concur in the amendment of the Senate, and ask for the appointment of a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

DAVIS FOSTER.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Davis Foster, lieutenant of the twenty-fourth Massachusetts volunteers, for reimbursement for clothing, &c., lost by the sinking of the United States transport Fanning; and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

AMOS SANFORD.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Amos Sanford, of Prairie City, Illinois, for an appropriation of $125; and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

CANAL AND SEWERAGE COMPANY.

The SPEAKER. The Chair omitted to state that the bill (S. No. 190) to incorporate the District of Columbia Canal and Sewerage Company would, in regular order, have come up this morning immediately after the reading of the Journal, but by an arrangement between the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia [Mr. INGERSOLL] and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. F. THOMAS] it was agreed that, with the consent of the House, the bill should not be called up until next Thursday morning. The Chair presumes there is no objection to this arrangement.

NATIONAL DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am directed by the select committee on education to report back the bill (H. R. No. 276) to establish a national Bureau of Education, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I ask that for convenience in considering the bill the substitute may by unanimous consent be regarded as the original bill.

There was no objection.

The substitute, which was read, provides in the first section that there shall be established, at the city of Washington, a Department of Education for the purpose of collecting such statistics and facts as shall show the condition and progress of education in the several States and Territories, and of diffusing such information respecting the organization and management of schools and school systems and methods of teaching as shall aid the people of the United States in the establishment and maintenance of efficient school systems, and otherwise promote the cause of education throughout the country.

The second section proposes to enact that there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a Commissioner of Education, who shall be intrusted with the management of the department herein established, and who shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum, and who shall have authority to appoint one chief clerk of his department, who shall receive a salary of $2,000 per annum; one clerk who shall receive a salary of $1,800 per annum; one clerk who shall receive a salary of $1,600 per annum; one clerk who shall receive a salary of $1,400 per annum; and one clerk who shall receive a salary of $1,200 per annum; which said clerks shall be subject to the appointing and removing power of the Commissioner of Education.

The third section provides that it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Education to present annually to Congress a report embodying the results of his investigations and labors, together with a statement of such facts and recommendations as will in his judgment subserve the purpose for which this department is established. In the first report made by the Commissioner of Education under this act, there shall be presented a statement of the several grants of land made by Congress to promote education, and the manner in which these several trusts have been managed, the amount of funds arising therefrom, and the annual proceeds of the same, as far as the same can be determined.

The fourth section proposes to authorize and direct the Commissioner of Public Buildings to furnish proper offices for the use of the department herein established.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, with the first gun fired upon Fort Sumter the nation was born into a new life. All that has followed, all that will follow, must be regarded as the natural outgrowth of that great event.

With that act we passed forever beyond the middle ages of our history as a nation.

Those States which had so long been sanctuaries to which cruelty and injustice could flee for shelter and protection were by that act thrown open to the civilizing influences of the age. The light burst in upon them, along the track of our advancing armies, never to darken, never to retrocede, so long as the nation itself should endure.

Two great conclusions have been reached. We have found that the hitherto governing populations of those States could not be trusted to uphold the national Government. Nay, more, that they have sought, through unparalleled sacrifices, to overthrow it. For some reasons, through some causes, operating universally, and through long periods of time, the people have been rendered unfit to wisely govern themselves, much less to participate in the government of others. They strove to drag down the entire temple of our liberties; they have succeeded at least in burying their own prosperity in ruins.

The responsibility for all this has been properly charged to slavery.

Slavery has been swept away, but the ignorance, the degradation, which were its consequences remain, not to die during this generation, not to die during many generations, unless we now do our whole duty as legislators.

Another great fact presents itself: four million human beings have been lifted from a condition as low as that of the brute to manhood. We have declared them entitled to the right to work out every attribute of goodness or grace or greatness which God has given them. We have taken the shackles from off the limbs of nature and bidden her follow out her own instincts to her own perfect destiny, undeterred by any artificial obstructions of ours. Proclaiming nothing, promising nothing, we have thrown open all doors to the black man and cried God speed to him as he moves forward into the future.

What pressing necessity results from these two great facts? Education.

Education for the white man of the South, that he may so wisely and liberally judge as to love the great nation which lifts him up, and the flag which is the symbol of the noblest and broadest liberality in all this world. Education for the black man, that the new powers conferred upon him may not be merely brute forces reacting against himself, but may be wisely directed to his own advantage and the glory of his country. Education for the country itself, that the entire population may rise to the level and above the level of the most favored localities; and that as we are the freest, the bravest, and the most energetic, so also we may become the most enlightened people upon the face of the earth; the foremost instruments in whatever good God may yet design to work out upon the globe.

Is it not a shame, Mr. Speaker, that this nation, which rests solely and alone upon the intelligence of the citizen, and without which it could not exist for an hour, should thus far have done literally nothing either to recognize or enforce education? As John Adams said, "The despots have stolen a march upon this Republic in the liberal patronage of that education upon which a republic is based." France, Prussia, Austria, and Russia have made education an affair of the State and have esteemed it as of the highest consequence. In Prussia the Minister of Public Instruction ranks next to the King. In France the office of Superintendent of Public Instruction has been dignified by such illustrious names as Cousin and Guizot. But the United States, whose theory of government is that if the people are ignorant they are necessarily unwise, if they are unwise they are necessarily misgoverned, and if they are misgoverned every interest dear to the citizen is necessarily put in jeopardy—the United States, I say, whose very corner-stone is the enlightened judgment of each individual citizen, has allowed despots to build up mighty systems in behalf of education, while in this, its capital, not a Department, not a bureau, not even a clerkship is to be found representing that grandest of all interests.

We will be told that we have left all that to the States. Yes; and we have had the rebellion as a consequence. The attempt to invert the pyramid and build a great, wise nation upon an ignorant, bigoted, and brutalized population has cost half a million lives and $1,000,000,000 of debt. And it will cost us still more. We cannot make bricks without straw. We cannot build a republic without intelligence.

But we are told that the man who cannot read and write is not necessarily lacking in intelligence. No; not if he is immersed in the midst of an intelligent and educated population. He may grow

"To what he works in, like the dyer's hand."

He may borrow enough of the results of education from those around him to compensate for his own deficiencies. But place him in an equally ignorant population and his superiority will be simply that of the chief among savages.

Civilization is nothing more than education. We excel the past because we have swept a wider field of observation; we possess the accumulations of a greater number of generations of workers; we are ourselves happier, wiser, better because we know more.

When any man rises up and defends ignorance, he does it in a language every word and syllable of which is a testimony to the untiring industry and the constantly increasing cultivation of his predecessors. He cannot utter a word in favor of ignorance and its barbarisms without touching upon words drawn from the cultivated inhabitants of Rome or Athens, or those later races who fought their way up from ignorance and wretchedness to learning and greatness. Out of his own mouth is he condemned. Nay, more, his logic flies back upon him like the weapon of the Australian; for if ignorance is desirable in the constituent, it must be equally so in the representative, and he who has the learning wherewith to defend ignorance should give place to him who hath most of that ignorance which he eulogizes.

Two widely different policies found their fountains two hundred years ago upon the Atlantic coast, and their waters have swept forward across the continent upon parallel lines. The results are before the world.

In 1642, Massachusetts proclaimed the first of these policies in these words:

"It is the duty of the municipal authorities to see that every child within their respective jurisdictions should be educated."

The other policy was proclaimed in Virginia, when in 1671 Sir William Berkeley, Governor, thanked God that—

"There are here no free schools or printing; and I hope we shall not have them these hundred years. God keep us from both."

And so these policies set forth upon their pilgrimages toward the setting sun, carrying with them the destinies of millions of human beings. In the track of the first were found intelligence, enterprise, invention, industry, prosperity, liberty, and justice. In the wake of the other a thousand hideous things lifted up their heads—ignorance, sloth, poverty, oppression, cruelty, slavery, and last of all, anarchy—

"Which from its horrid hair, Shook pestilence and war."

And all these things were as inevitably contained in those two parent seeds, education and ignorance, as are the branches of the oak contained in the acorn.

Why, sir, so exactly, in the order of God's providence, does like produce like, that the words of Governor Berkeley, in 1671, were repeated almost literally in the words of Governor Wise one hundred and fifty years later, when he "thanked God that there was not a single newspaper published in his district."

Compare these two pictures. They are typical. The first is an extract from a speech of Henry Ward Beecher, made in 1865, descriptive of northern society. He says:

"We find the villages touching each other, and the roads are lined with noble houses and orchards and gardens, and trees and fields innumerable covering the free, broad expanse of this happy Christian land, because they have acknowledged the common man, educated the common man, and sanctified his work."

The second picture is from the pen of Judge Underwood, in his address to the grand jury of Norfolk on the 8th of May, 1866. He says:

"Those at the North who assail us seem to forget our peculiar circumstances. That education, which is almost universal with them, is here confined within very narrow limits, and the masses of the people who cannot read are necessarily dependent on the educated few for their opinions and conduct."

"To convince the most skeptical let us look at the history and condition of the first congressional district in this State. That district contains more than four times the territory of the rich, prosperous, enlightened, happy, liberty-loving State of Rhode Island. It was once the seat of learning and of boasted Virginia hospitality, the birth-place of four Presidents of the United States, and embracing the site of the first English settlement in America, the city of Jamestown, which, now more fallen than Tyre or Sidon or Sodom and Gomorrah, has not enough of ruins left for even the bats to flit or owls to hoot in. In the nineteen counties of that district there is not now, as its Representative in Congress thirty years ago boasted, a single newspaper published, and so long has the schoolmaster been abroad that probably more than three fourths of its native grown men and women can neither read nor write."

Let us reduce these descriptions to the test of actual figures. In 1850, according to the facts set forth in the United States census of that year, the amounts expended in the support of public schools in the three political divisions of our country were as follows:

In the rebel States.....	$546,037
In the border slave States.....	283,763
In the free States.....	5,996,837
Total.....	$6,826,637

Or, to speak of these results in round numbers, the entire slaveholding population expended about three fourths of a million of dollars, while the free States expended nearly six millions. Eleven States lately in rebellion, containing several million people, expended about half a million dollars, or about fifty thousand dollars each in the education of the population!

In some remarks which I had the honor to make to the House in the early part of the session I showed that according to the census of 1860 the total number of persons in the United States over twenty years of age unable to read and write, and who were born in the country, and excluding the slaves, was 834,106; and of these 545,177 were found in the southern States, containing one third of the population, and but 288,923 in the northern States, containing two thirds of the population.

If the same ratio prevailed that is found in New England there would be less than thirty-four thousand illiterate persons in the southern States; as it is the number is over half a million!

Nothing, it seems to me, would more clearly demonstrate how faithfully the upas tree, which was planted upon the shore of Virginia by Governor Berkeley has extended its blighting and deadly influence, than these figures.

Can we doubt for one instant the great and pressing necessity for the General Government to interest itself in this question of education?

As we have found ignorance and rebellion everywhere associated together as parent and child, must we not destroy ignorance if we would have the nation live?

If so, what less can we do than pass the bill now before the House?

Do we not need such a department?

Mr. Speaker, we mock and jeer at poor Mexico. Our contempt for her anarchical and revolution-scourged people chills even that sympathy to which she is entitled by her misfortunes and her sufferings. To what are we to attribute her condition? The answer is plain.

"It has been liberally estimated," says Brantz Mayer, in his work upon Mexico, "that of the Indians and negroes not more than two per cent. can read and write, and of all others not more than twenty per cent." "If we take this computation to be correct," continues Mr. Mayer, "as I believe it is, we shall have:

Of Indians and negroes who can read and write.....	80,120
Whites and others.....	607,628

Total able to read and write out of a population of seven millions.....687,748

"If we suppose," says Mr. Mayer, "that out of the one million whites five hundred thousand, or one half only, are males, and that of that half million but twenty per cent., or one hundred thousand, can read or write, we will no longer be surprised that a population of more than seven millions have hitherto been controlled by a mere handful of men, or that the selfish natures of the superior classes who wield the physical and intellectual forces of the nation have forced the masses to become but little more than blind instruments of their will."

We pity Mexico. From our higher position of peace and security we can afford to look down upon and pity her. The clamor of arms yet resounds in her midst; while almost within sight of this Capitol the ruins of the great rebellion are yet smoking; and we are laboring under the dreadful burdens of our debt and counseling together how we can intrust a share of the Government to the tender hands of the men who fought to destroy it; how we can consign the lamb to the wolf under constitutional pledges that the wolf shall forego his nature.

Mr. Speaker, we have little room for self-congratulations over poor Mexico.

As you came here from your home, Mr. Speaker, you passed over the little State of Delaware, represented on this floor by one member and at the other end of the Capitol by two Senators. Let us compare Delaware with Mexico.

In 1860 the total number of free persons in Delaware over twenty years of age unable to read and write was:

Of whites.....	6,661
Of free negroes.....	5,508
Total.....	12,169

We must add to these one half the total number of slaves in that year, namely, 1,798, and we have a total of 14,068. Now, the total population of Delaware in that year was 112,216; which being divided in half would give us about 56,108 as the total of persons over twenty years of age. Of this number 14,068 are unable to read and write, being one fourth of the population. Truly, we have cause to set ourselves above Mexico and commiserate her!

If popular ignorance has plunged Mexico into poverty, anarchy, and ruin, what shall it do for the United States? Can the same cause yield one set of results west of the boundary line of Mexico and an entirely different set of results east of that line? Let those who indulge in such delusions turn to the present wretched condition of the rebel States. In what are they better than Mexico? How many degrees are the "corn-crackers," the "sand-hillers," and the "clay-eaters" above the "greasers" and "guerrillas" of Mexico? How far were the dirty, unkempt hordes of ignorant men who flocked under the standards of Lee and Johnston fitted for self-government, fitted to hold up the polished pillars of the great temple of law, order, and civilization? Let those answer who believe they can extract the precious jewels of moderation and wisdom out of the darkened brain of ignorance, wretchedness, and degradation. For my part, it appears to me as plain as the sun at noonday, that if we permit ignorance to spread over the land, doubling, almost trebling its numbers, as in the past in every twenty years, eating away our civilization, degrading our people, impeding commerce, destroying manufactures, making brutes of the masses and demagogues of the leaders, that this great nation of ours cannot by any possibility survive for half a century.

It is no flourish of rhetoric to say that we hold the destiny of mankind in our hands. See with what eagerness we are scanned by the civilized world; mark the efforts now being made by foreign nations to approximate to our institutions; listen to the words of the great leaders of nations in the other hemisphere. While Gladstone praises us, Napoleon soothes his people by telling them that France and the United States rest on the same ideas! Tyrants are stealing our livery to serve the devil in. It is something to feel that upon this globe we are the forefront of civilization and human progress and the undoubted masters of the future.

But with this reflection comes home the overwhelming responsibilities of our position.

We must not fail. We carry the world upon our shoulders. No human prescience can calculate the results of our destruction to the cause of humanity.

Then let us eliminate that which is more dangerous than slavery—ignorance. Let us labor to make every man who votes an intelligent, conscious, reasoning, reflecting being.

Then the true Republic will be realized. Then the struggle of parties will be, not to hold back the world, not to throw blocks before the car of progress, but to strike down every error, every wrong, every injustice.

Pass this bill and you give education a mouth-piece and a rallying-point. While it will have no power to enter into the States and interfere with their systems, it will be able to collect facts and report the same to Congress, to be thence spread over the entire country. It will throw a flood of light upon the dark places of the land. It will form a public sentiment which will arouse to increased activity the friends of education everywhere, and ignorance will fly before it. It will press forward in its work from the bright villages of the North down to the lowly huts of the poor white and the poorer freedman in the South; down to the bayous of Louisiana, down to the everglades of Florida, down to the very shores of the Gulf. And in its track what a glorious assemblage shall pour forward; the newspapers, the public libraries, the multiplying railroads, the improved machinery for agriculture, the increased comforts for the home, with liberality, generosity, mercy, justice, and religion.

Pass this bill and after-generations will bless your work. No man can sum up all its consequences.

Here to this center will be brought all the results of experience and experiment in the pursuits of education. Here they will be analyzed and eliminated, and from this center they will go forth in an unceasing flood to all parts of the land.

This is a foundation upon which time and our enormous national growth will build the noblest of structures. The hope of Agassiz may here be realized; or even that grander dream of Bacon, "that university with unlimited power to do good, and with the whole world paying tribute to it."

Mr. Speaker, the condition of the South is the great argument in favor of the passage of this bill at this time. We must take some measure to provide for or induce the education of its people, black and white. But, sir, I can say with truth that I press this measure with no unkind feeling toward the people of that unfortunate region; that I will do all in my power to alleviate the sufferings they yet endure; that their prosperity is identical with that of the country, and their elevation essential to the permanence of the nation. I press this measure because it is just to all and will be beneficent to all.

As war dies let peace rise from its ashes, white-winged, white-robed, and luminous with the light of a new morning—a morning never to pass away while the world shall stand. Then may be said, in the language of one of our own writers:

"How they pale,
Ancient myth and song and tale,
In this wonder of our days,
When the cruel rod of war
Blossoms white with righteous law,
And the wrath of man is praise."

Mr. Speaker, I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS.]

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman from New Jersey to yield to me a moment that I may present some amendments.

Mr. ROGERS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend as follows:

In section one, line three, after the word "established" insert the words "by the Secretary of the Interior;" so that the clause will read:

There shall be established by the Secretary of the Interior, at the city of Washington, a Department of Education, &c.

At the end of the same section add the following:
And for this purpose he is hereby authorized to appoint two clerks, at a salary of $1,500 each per annum.

Strike out section two.

In section three, line two, strike out the words "Commissioner of Education" and insert, in lieu thereof the words "Secretary of the Interior;" so that the clause will read:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to present annually, &c.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to occupy the time of the House but a very short time in making a few suggestions. I intend to present against the passage of this bill. In fact, I did not know until the honorable gentleman who preceded me began to speak that a bill of this character was before the House. I had reason to believe that from the experience we had in this House and in this country no more Federal bureaus would be attempted to be established for the purpose of carrying out any particular ideas of philanthropy of any set of men whatever. I think, sir, the finances of the country are now sufficiently burdened and that we should allow the States, as they have been in the habit of doing, the entire control of looking after the education of their children.

To establish here at the head of our Federal affairs in Washington a bureau for the purpose of giving the principles by which the children of the different States shall be educated would be something never before attempted in the history of this nation. It was never thought of before. I say here to-day, without fear of successful contradiction, that at no time in the history of this Government, from the time of its first organization down to the present hour, was there ever before an attempt to establish a bureau or an institution of any kind or character at the head of Federal affairs for the purpose of diffusing intelligence throughout the States of this Federal Union.

I say, sir, in the first place, there is no authority under the Constitution of the United States to authorize Congress to interfere with the education of children of the different States in any manner, directly or indirectly. This bill is one similar in purport and effect, so far as power under the Constitution of the United States is concerned, to the Freedmen's Bureau bill. It proposes to put under the supervision of a bureau established at Washington all the schools and educational institutions of the different States of the Union by collecting such facts and statistics as will warrant them by amendments hereafter to the law now attempted to be passed to control and regulate the educational system of the whole country.

I say that this country will compare favorably in respect to education with any country upon the face of the earth. Go back to the most glorious days of Rome and Greece or of English history, and you will find nowhere a population of the character and magnitude of this where education has been more universally diffused or a people more intelligent.

I am content, sir, to leave this matter of education where our fathers left it, where the history of the country has left it, to the school systems of the different towns, cities, and States. Let them carry out and regulate the system of education without interference, directly or indirectly, on the part of any bureau established as an agent of the Federal Government.

This bill proposes to provide that there shall be established at the city of Washington a Department of Education, for the purpose of collecting such statistics and facts as shall show the condition and progress of education in the several States and Territories, and of diffusing such information respecting the organization and management of schools and school systems and methods of teaching as shall aid the people of the United States in the establishment and maintenance of efficient school systems, and otherwise promote the cause of education throughout the country.

The bill does not seem to be so broad in its terms as the speech of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] would indicate. Although the bill does not propose to go into the States and interfere with the regulation of the school systems there, yet it proposes to collect such statistics which will give controlling power over the school systems of the States. How is it proposed to carry on the object in view? To establish a bureau here which will cost this Government more than $100,000 a year to get it in running order. The officers and clerks will cost some fifteen thousand dollars a year. They are to go from one end of the Union to another and to involve this Government in the expense of collecting information.

Now, sir, I say when you refuse to give the soldiers of this country their due, when you are not willing in this House to meet as we ought to have done the bounty bill and pay to our soldiers the bounty without regard to what they may have received from township, county, or State, it is a poor time, in the present deplorable condition of our finances, to inflict upon the country a centralization of power and influence at the capital of this Government, to interfere with the domain of States with regard to education, and at an expense of $100,000 a year.

Mr. GRINNELL. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. I wish to know whether he has ever opposed an appropriation for the purpose of collecting agricultural statistics, and whether this idea of collecting information in regard to education does not stand somewhat on the same basis.

Mr. ROGERS. No, sir; it has no resemblance whatever. The object for which the Agricultural Bureau was established is one almost coeval with the formation of the Government itself. It is a system established by our fathers, and not a system of modern times at all. It is one which is necessary in order to hold complete and intimate connection with foreign countries and get the necessary information for the Federal Government. It is necessary for the diffusion of knowledge of a national character all over the country, and has no analogy to this interference with the simple rights of the States in regard to the education of their own people.

Mr. GRINNELL. I would ask the gentleman, if we can show that we are able to compete successfully with foreign countries in agriculture, why should we not show them that we have a better system of education.

Mr. ROGERS. This bill does not propose at all to educate, but simply to establish a bureau for the purpose of keeping a set of men at the capital—a Commissioner with a salary of $5,000, a chief clerk with a salary of $2,000, another with $1,800, another with $1,600, another with $1,400, and another at $1,200; and all this expense is to be borne by the Government, which is now weighed down by heavy taxation. Sir, when gentlemen on the other side stand up and talk about the finances of the country being in such a deplorable condition, when they are unwilling to vote to the soldier who has defended the Government the bounty to which he is justly entitled, they have no right at such a time to come and ask us to establish an institution of this character, one never talked, thought, or dreamed of before at any time in the history of the country. When we reach such a state of finances that we can establish such an educational institution then it will be time enough to do it. But let us first pay off the bond-holders who are holding $3,500,000,000 exempt from taxation, or put the bonds in such a shape that they may be taxed. Let us clear ourselves of debt and establish a financial system on a solid basis before we inflict upon this country another bureau not quite so great in magnitude as the Freedmen's Bureau, but one of the same kind and character, according to the speech made by the gentleman who preceded me, [Mr. DONNELLY.]

The gentleman talks about educating the people of the South, as though they were a set of men who had no education, learning, or intelligence. Sir, when he defames them by saying this he defames his country. I am here to say that they have intelligence in the South, and that the intelligent classes there are those who are responsible for bringing this rebellion upon the country, and not the uneducated classes who were dragged into the movement. It was such men as Yancey, Slidell, and those that were at the head of affairs who drove the people into rebellion, and not the deluded masses.

Mr. GRINNELL. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ROGERS. I cannot be interrupted now; I have but fifteen minutes.

Mr. GRINNELL. I only wanted to ask the gentleman if he thinks that education promotes disloyalty.

Mr. ROGERS. It does not. I submit to gentlemen upon both sides of the House that there is no reason or necessity for this bill at all, because the education of the people will be attended to, and it always has been attended to. We have enough to do to pay our debts and to keep the affairs of this nation in the proper equilibrium. And when you undertake to establish a bureau here for the purpose of diffusing education you add just so much to the expenses of the nation. The bond-holders, the men who have an interest in the perpetuity of the Union and in the payment of the debt, the men who have large amounts of money invested in Government funds, ought to be paid every dollar. The main argument made against the Pacific railroad bill, the argument which induced the House to vote against the bill, for gentlemen upon both sides agreed that it was a great enterprise, and would add to the greatness and glory and grandeur of the country, was that it added to the expense; that it would lead to a depression of the finances, and that the financial condition of the country would not bear up under such a proposition. That bill would not have cost the Government a cent.

Now, here is a proposition which is a mere scheme of philanthropy, got up for the purpose of educating the children of the whole country, and the result will be that in a short time this bureau will need more clerks and expenses for stationery, &c., and I will guaranty you that in the very first year the expense of the bureau will not fall short of $100,000; and it will run on until it costs $500,000 a year. I want you to remember that there are thirty-five million people in this country, located from Maine to Texas, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and all of these people are to come under the jurisdiction and control of this Educational Bureau. And where will it end? It will not stop until we run up a bill of expenses that will materially injure the finances of the Government.

Yes, sir; and here we have also the Freedmen's Bureau; and it appears that this is but a twin sister of it, according to the argument made by the learned gentleman who preceded me.

We hear talk here about educating the people of the South. You had better first get the people of the South back into the Union. Let us reunite the bonds which have been broken asunder; let us restore the Union before you undertake to establish an Educational Bureau.

The gentleman from Minnesota seems all at once to be inspired by a very kindly feeling toward the southern people; the ignorant masses down there must be educated. How? This is a proposition to interfere with their internal domestic affairs with regard to the education of their own children. The only effect of this bill will be to create a prejudice in the South by undertaking to regulate their educational systems through the agency of officers in Washington. We are to have a centralized power here to tell the people of the South and the people of all the States of this Union what their system of education shall be. I do not know how the people of New England will like it. The people of New England have given their children a very elegant education. They vote millions and millions of dollars every year for educational purposes in New England and New York and Pennsylvania and New Jersey. But this bill proposes that this bureau shall collect statistics and give directions to the people of New England and New York and Pennsylvania and New Jersey, telling them in what manner they shall educate their children.

Why, sir, there are to be public buildings put up here in Washington; and new bureaus to be established here, and the head of this bureau must hold a seat in the Cabinet of the President of the United States; for it will not do to have a great educational bureau here; one to diffuse so much knowledge, such a grand scheme for concentrating the intelligence and enlightenment of the whole world in the United States, without making it a part of the executive government of the country.

Now, as was said yesterday most appropriately by the eloquent and learned gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] in his speech against the bill in relation to the pay of the Army, to which I listened with the most intense interest, because it was an able and eloquent speech, we should stand by principles and axioms which have been established for years and years past; that old precepts and principles should not be laid aside for the purpose of establishing new and untried ones.

Now, the educational system of this country will stand the test of comparison with the educational systems of the most favored countries. And an honorable gentleman who stands up before the Speaker of this House and undertakes to make out that this country is groveling in low ignorance does not understand this country; for there are many men who have only been educated in common schools, who have never been in a college, unless they went in at one door and were kicked out at the other, have shown themselves as much fitted for their duties by their intelligence as men who come out of these colleges with their sheep-skin rolls and high-sounding degrees. It is a reflection and a disgrace upon the men in our Army, who were not so well educated as the gentleman would like, but whose brawny arms drove back the hordes of the rebellion. They have shown by their acts that they were men of understanding and judgment and discretion. And why should we now undertake to interfere with the education of their children, and compel them to pay their share of the tax for that purpose? It is a step toward taking away from them rights to which they alone are entitled.

Sir, it is hardly necessary for me to stand here and show what are the constitutional objections to this bill. No man can find anywhere in the letter or spirit of the Constitution one word that will authorize the Congress of the United States to establish an Educational Bureau. If Congress has the right to establish an Educational Bureau here in this city for the purpose of collecting statistics and controlling the schools of the country, then, by the same parity of reason, a fortiori, Congress has the right to establish a bureau to supervise the education of all the children that are to be found in the thirty millions of the population of this country. You will not stop at simply establishing a bureau for the purpose of paying officers to collect and diffuse statistics in reference to education. The head of the bureau is to receive $5,000 a year. What is he to do for that large salary, which is $2,000 more than a member of Congress receives? He is to sit here at his desk in Washington for the purpose of collecting statistics, and the poor men of this country are to pay him $5,000 for it. And what is the necessity for such an officer? All the States have a system of statistical accounts of their educational systems. You cannot find a State in the South or in any other part of the country that does not keep a statistical account of the operation of their schools.

And no one ever before thought of attempting to interfere with the action of the States in this respect. And I hope there are enough of good men in this House to prevent the passage of this bill. I think the House will understand that this is not a political question; it is a mere wild scheme of philanthropy, though it may be dictated by an honest conviction. If we are to go for a system of charity, giving away the public moneys of the country, let us take hold of the matter most thoroughly, and educate all the poor children of the country at the expense of the Government.

Are the people of this country prepared for the passage of an act of Congress which will establish here a bureau that will cost this Government at least $100,000 a year? Why, sir, it appears as if we took no consideration or account of the expenses to which we are subjecting this Government. Why, sir, the Secretary of the Treasury has stated within a few days that the financial condition of this country is in the most delicate position in which it has been during the war or since. Sir, in view of the numerous failures of large banking houses in England, in view of the general financial depression and panic extending from one end of Europe to the other, I implore this House to exercise a vigilant care with reference to our national finances, so that we may emerge from this conflict with our financial credit untarnished, as well as our national integrity vindicated, so that we may proclaim to the world the ability of the United States of America, not only to put down the armies of treason, but to pay the expenses of the war. And to do this we must not be burdened by such legislation as this, founded perhaps upon charitable views, but calculated to inflict great damage upon the finances of the country.

If this bureau is not to have extensive ramifications throughout the country; if it is not to involve an expenditure of thousands on thousands of dollars for the collection of statistics, then it is simply for the payment of eight or ten clerks to do nothing, fifteen or twenty thousand dollars annually.

I think the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] who introduced the bill to reduce the pay of the Army will hardly vote for this bill, which will add to the expenses of the Federal Government something like one hundred thousand dollars a year at the lowest estimate. It can hardly be expected that any one who would support a bill to reduce the pay of the officers of the regular Army can subscribe to the principles embodied in this bill.

I hope, sir, that this bill will not be passed, at least until members have given it a full investigation; and I trust that their party feelings and party prejudices will not induce them to pass a bill establishing a bureau such as was never before heard of in the history of the country, and which is but one more step to centralization.

THE SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

TREASURY SALES OF GOLD.

THE SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury in response to a resolution of the House of the 28th ultimo, in regard to the amount of gold sold by him since May 1, 1866, the rates of sale, &c.; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PAY OF THE ARMY.

The House resumed the consideration of the special order, being House bill No. 450, to reduce and establish the pay of the officers and to regulate the pay of the soldiers of the armies of the United States, upon which Mr. DAVIS was entitled to the floor.

MR. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of trespassing for a long time on the patience of the House in the discussion of the bill before us; but I wish to present a view which I think is pertinent to it, and which is based upon practical business principles.

Before, however, proceeding to the consideration of the bill, I will say that I speak without any degree of prejudice either for or against the bill. I am for doing, so far as I can, exact and equal justice to all parties. I have no imputation to make upon the motives of the committee who have introduced this bill or upon the motives of any of the gentlemen who have advocated or opposed its passage. What we all wish or should wish is to do that which is just as between the Government of the United States and the officers of that Government employed in the protection of its interests. The relations which exist between the officer and the Government are peculiar. They are unlike those which exist between the Government and members of Congress, whose term is temporary, or those existing between the Government and any other temporary agent.

The officers of the Army are sworn into the service as a profession, and except in the volunteer force this service is intended to be for life. They are educated to this service, and are the appointed defenders of the public interests and the national honor upon the field. The gentleman, therefore, should look kindly upon and deal liberally with those who stand to it in such relation. The entire theory of the system of payment to our military officers is that officers of equal rank shall receive like compensation for the personal service which each one in such rank is supposed capable of rendering. Thus all brigadier generals receive a certain and equal pay proper. And the same with slight modifications may be said of colonels, lieutenant colonels, majors, captains, and lieutenants, whose pay proper depends upon the several rank of those officers.

But while the same pay is awarded to all officers of similar or equal rank for personal service and ability, it is evident that, while the places of employment are widely scattered and varied, from our national capital and our sea-port towns and great cities, to the interior of the country and the frontier settlements, resulting in a vast difference of expenses of living in these locations, the Government owe it to these its agents to compensate them in some mode for the increased expenses of living in localities where they may be stationed. And this precise adjustment is sought to be effected by the existing laws and Army Regulations in respect to allowances and commutations. We cannot ignore the fact that these differences of expense in living depend upon localities; and therefore, if the pay proper for a personal service be assumed, the necessary expense of maintenance should be added, and that varies with the post, city, or town where the offices are located.

I insist, therefore, that this bill, either as it was originally framed or as it has since been amended, makes no just provision in respect to this essential principle of justice. Take any officer of the line, say a major general, whose pay proper is about $2,640 per annum, and whose allowances for rations, servants' clothing, forage, &c., while he is stationed in quarters furnished by Government make up an aggregate, perhaps, of $6,500 or $7,000. If this officer be sent where he can have no Government quarters, and where it may be necessary to furnish quarters for his family at an expense, perhaps, of $2,000 or more per annum, where every incidental expense is increased, it is clear that he must be the loser unless the Government shall, in some way, allow him commutation for quarters. He is sent by the Government as its agent to attend to its business, and every expense sustained by him not covered strictly by the compensation for personal service should be borne by the Government.

Again, if an officer be sent to some place in the country where living is cheap, where labor is low, and where quarters can be given him by the Government, it is clear that these allowances would be neither necessary nor reasonable. We ought to look upon this question as one simply between principal and agent; and in every civil appointment we know that the compensation of agents is and must be graduated upon the basis of different allowances for different locations. A company in New York employing agents of equal ability to represent its interests in Washington, in San Francisco, in St. Louis, in Chicago, or in Kansas, must assume all the expenses of its various agents, paying equal salaries, or must graduate salaries according to the expense of location. Any other system would work inequality and injustice.

The chairman of the Military Committee presented this bill as one fixing uniform pay for uniform grade, giving absolute pay in all cases instead of rations or commutation, and discriminating only in favor of those doing service in the field. But upon reflection the honorable gentleman [Mr. SCHENCK] has conceded the justice of a broader discrimination by providing for forage, and by substituting an increased percentage of pay every five years instead of the longevity rations now allowed for continued service. But he has not gone far enough to effect a perfect remedy. I shall offer no criticism upon the chairman or any member of the Military Committee. I know that the honorable chairman wishes to be just to the officers of the Army, but in his desire for a system of simple and uniform compensation he has inaugurated a system which produces discriminations and inequalities. Indeed, having by his amendments conceded the very principle which I claim to be applicable, I know not why he should not go further and make just provisions for all parties, and for all conditions of the service.

Under the existing law and regulations an officer located at headquarters in Washington is entitled to the same pay proper as an officer of equal rank located at Portland, at Fortress Monroe, St. Louis, Cincinnati, Dayton, or Carlisle, whether in Government quarters or in quarters owned or hired by himself; but if the officer furnish his own quarters, in the absence of any Government accommodations, an allowance is made for the additional expense.

Now, sir, what is the present commutation of officers located at Washington for defraying the expenses attending the location? Under the existing law and regulations of the Army the amount of commutation paid in the city of Washington during the last year for fuel and quarters, items not at all embraced in the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, is as follows:

Commutation for year 1865—Recapitulation.

Rank.	Total amount.	Tax.	Amount paid.
Major general.....	$1,874 95	$93 74	$1,781 21
Brigadier general.....	1,550 50	77 55	1,472 95
Colonel.....	1,530 93	76 54	1,454 39
Lieutenant colonel and major.....	1,270 43	63 51	1,206 92
Captain.....	976 45	48 84	927 61
Lieutenant.....	657 45	32 89	624 56

These allowances are made to these officers because of the difference of expenses in Washington and other points. It is because the bill does not go far enough in that regard that I am compelled to oppose it.

Again, it will be remembered that every officer who served under this Government and receives compensation is chargeable with the internal revenue tax, so that one twentieth of his pay and commutation is deducted before it comes to his hands. There is another item that has been entirely overlooked by the committee.

Now, sir, the system under which the Army has been organized has been in existence for over seventy years, and so far as I know there has not been a single petition presented to this Congress by any officer of the Army in favor of a change. No such petition has been sent here, no communication has been received, and no officer has been here asking that the basis of pay and commutation should be altered. Why, therefore, let me ask, is the change proposed? The system which we have introduced from other countries where it has worked well, where it has existed without complaint; a system introduced as early as 1794, under which we have gone on prosperously and peacefully; a system under which the operations of the Army which we raised to put down the rebellion were carried on triumphantly; why, sir, is that system to be changed? Because it is said that it is a mysterious system, and that the people of this country desire to know the amount which is paid to officers and agents for service.

Sir, there is no very great mystery about it. Any one of the constituents of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] who can read the Army Register can determine precisely the amount of commutation or pay due to an officer of the Army. It is much more certain knowledge, much more easily obtained, than that which might be obtained from some of the Departments of this Government.

Suppose the gentleman should desire to know what becomes of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, where will he get his information? Suppose he desires to know for what reason the vast appropriations which you make here for the support of the Army and Navy are made, what item goes to this purpose, what amount is actually necessary for that purpose, what information does he get? Why, sir, he appeals to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and he hears the response, "The head of the Department told me that the appropriation was necessary, and therefore the committee recommend it." Not a man on the committee can say he has gone to the basis and knows the merits of the appropriation. And so in every Department of the Government. We rely upon the fidelity of those who are in charge of the matters at the headquarters. We take their statements and we believe in their fidelity.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understand the gentleman to argue that the pay provided by this bill for officers on duty in the city of Washington is not sufficient.

Mr. DAVIS. I say I do not believe it is.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would inquire of the gentleman what relation the pay provided in this bill for officers on duty in this city bears to the pay of persons in the civil service in this city whose duties correspond with those in the military service.

Mr. DAVIS. I will not pretend to say what precise relation does exist between the two. I have not said, and do not say, that the pay of an officer located elsewhere is sufficient to support himself respectably in times when everything is as high as it is at present, or has been for two years past.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would ask the gentleman if by the provisions of this bill the officers of the Army are not and will not be the best-paid officers under the Government; better than any officers in any other Department.

Mr. DAVIS. I think not.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think they are.

Mr. DAVIS. Under the requirements of the law an officer engaged in the military service of the Government is prevented from engaging in anything else. Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] can use one half of his time as a member of Congress in the pursuit of his profession. He can give counsel here. He can argue a case in the Supreme Court of the United States, and employ his vacations at home in pursuing his profession.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. A clerk in one of the Departments with a salary of only $1,800 cannot engage in other pursuits half his time. I am not talking about members of Congress but officers in the Departments, in the civil service of the Government, and I do say that under this bill those in the military service are better paid than those in any other Department of the Government.

Mr. DAVIS. Sir, theirs is a very different service. A clerk in any Department may go where he pleases and obtain employment elsewhere. A man who swears fidelity to the Government in a military capacity cannot do it. He takes the peril of the field and looks to the Government for his support for a life-time, while the clerk in a Department, after having acquired in the service of the Government that knowledge and experience which will render his services more profitable elsewhere, goes into a bank in the city of New York, Philadelphia, or elsewhere, and instead of receiving $1,800 a year receives $2,500 or $3,000. And most of these clerks are single men, while an officer of the Army who commenced as a single man is not supposed to be denied the privilege of matrimony.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Does not my friend think it is better for a man to be provided for for life than to go into a Department to continue there during good behavior or at the pleasure of his employer?

Mr. DAVIS. Allow me to say that with regard to most of those who distinguished themselves for bravery in the field, who led our gallant men to the breach, stormed the enemy's fortresses, and pulled down the stars and bars of secession, those men might receive elsewhere than in the public service a far greater compensation than they can get under the Government. With many of them it is nothing but the esprit du corps that keeps them in the service.

Sir, I believe in this Government doing justice. I ask for nothing in behalf of an officer located in the city of Washington which I would not ask on behalf of one located anywhere else. But I know something about the operation of this bill. Why, sir, in 1846 a friend of mine in the Army being ordered to military duty in California, paid for a single room not ten feet square $100 a month as rent. His own pay was about $1,500 per annum. This became so great a grievance on the Pacific coast that Congress passed special acts to relieve the officers. And it is so here. Officers with families pay $1,200 rent, and for their fuel besides, when their commutation allowance does not amount to more than $927. Now, when you come to fix an unchanging, unvarying system, and say that the pay of an officer shall be so much under all circumstances, you at once introduce under the name of uniformity that which is nothing but its opposite.

Now, sir, the pay of a captain located in the city of Washington by this bill is $2,500 a year, and yet the sum which is found necessary for the Government to allow him as commutation for quarters and fuel without anything else is $927 61. If he be a man of family, how can he live upon $2,500? He has in the first place to pay out of his $2,500 five per cent. income tax. Then he has his gas bills to pay, his repairs to his dwelling, his incidental expenses, his wife and children to clothe, his children to educate, and all in a state of society where it costs him vastly more to live than it did five years ago. He receives less than $1,200 for their entire support.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. Will the gentleman state how much the private soldiers get?

Mr. DAVIS. Privates are taken care of by the Government itself. The private soldier takes his pay with the knowledge that he is to have his rations and quarters furnished him by the Government.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. How much does he get for himself and his family when he is stationed in the city of Washington?

Mr. DAVIS. He gets what he agrees to receive, and has his rations and quarters besides. Most privates, I believe, have no families. During the late war probably three fourths of all the men who enlisted were single, and I have no doubt that is the case to-day with non-commissioned officers and privates. They are nearly all young men, and the Government furnishes them with everything in the way of food, quarters, and clothing.

We are told, as another reason why this bill is introduced, that it will prevent fraud and the demoralization of officers. I have too much confidence in the integrity and honor of any officer who has fought or who proposes to fight under the flag of the Republic to believe that for a few dollars or more he would make a false return to his Government which would expose him to be cashiered or summarily dismissed.

Sir, the War Department under the law does take the word of an officer instead of his oath. And to what does an officer certify when he presents his account for payment? I will read it:

"I hereby certify that the foregoing account is accurate and just; that I have not been absent without leave during any part of the time charged for; that I have not received pay, nor drawn rations, forage, or clothing, in kind, or received money in lieu of any part thereof, for any part of the time therein charged; that I actually owned and kept in service the horses and employed the private servants for which I charge for the whole of the time charged, and that I did not, during the term so charged, or any part thereof, keep or employ a soldier as a waiter or servant; that the annexed is an accurate description of my servant; that for the whole period charged for my staff appointment, I actually and legally held the appointment, and did duty in the department; that I was the actual and only commanding officer at the double-ration post charged for; and that no officer, within my knowledge, has a right to claim, or does claim, for said services for any part of the period charged; that for the whole time brevet pay is claimed I had the command stated; that I was actually in the command of a company for the whole time additional pay is charged; that I have not been in the performance of any staff duty for which I claim or have received extra compensation during the time an additional ration is charged for; that I have been in the United States Army as a commissioned officer for the number of years stated in the charge for extra rations; that I am not in arrears with the United States on any account whatsoever."

That is the certificate of honor of an officer of the Army, and during all the time this system has existed, from 1795 to this time, there have been but two or three instances of malfeasance or misrepresentation in the returns of regular officers of the Army. And although but yesterday we heard upon this floor from the honorable gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUMONT,] who claimed that he had seen several years of military service, that he had been in the volunteer service of the country, that these returns were made, as he knew, falsely and fraudulently; that he himself had certified to returns that as to the truth of which in all things he was not certain; although we heard that, I will not accept that as an impeachment of the officers of the regular Army.

Mr. DUMONT. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. DUMONT. I deny utterly that I ever said any such thing.

Mr. DAVIS. I certainly understood the gentleman to say that he had never seen a pay-roll which set forth the truth.

Mr. DUMONT. I said that I had seldom seen a pay-roll that set forth the exact truth.

Mr. DAVIS. If I have misrepresented the gentleman in any regard, I will retract everything which he denies that he said or intended to say. I stated what I understood him to say, and I was about to add that I thought the gentleman himself must have used inaccurate language, for I do not think it possible that an officer who had been in the volunteer service, a man of intelligence and cultivation, would assert anything that he did not believe to be entirely true. Now, what I said was, that the gentleman stated here that the returns which are made out by officers of the Army do not state the truth; that he had never seen a return which did; that he himself had made such returns—

Mr. DUMONT. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman state what he did say, for I do not wish to do him or any other gentleman the slightest injustice?

Mr. DUMONT. I stated that I had had a conversation with an Army officer, and had said to him that I had seldom seen an officer's pay-roll which in every respect stated the exact truth; that he then propounded to me the question whether I had ever made out a false pay-roll; and that I replied to him that present company was always excepted, and that I was not there to testify in regard to either him or myself. And I state again that I have seldom seen an officer's pay-roll that in every respect stated the exact truth. I said not one single word about my own account, nor have I said a single word in regard to any other officer. In regard to saying that I had certified to many such a pay-roll, there was not a word of that kind said; the subject was not adverted to, not a single word was said in regard to the certificate.

Mr. DAVIS. While I disclaim any intention whatever of doing the slightest injustice to the honorable gentleman, I cannot forget the words he uttered upon this floor. He said, and he spoke of it as a matter within his own personal knowledge, that a dozen officers messing together and employing in common two or three servants would include those servants in each of their pay accounts.

Mr. DUMONT. Certainly, and I say so yet. Mr. DAVIS. I understood the gentleman to say that he knew it, and also that he had never seen a pay-roll which told the truth; and I supposed he meant that those pay-rolls had passed his supervision, and had been certified through his instrumentality. If I have done him injustice in that I ask his pardon.

A great deal has been said here upon the subject of commutation of rations, and there appears to be an issue raised on that subject between the Military Committee and the friends of this bill and some who are opposed to it.

It has been asserted here most positively that under the present system and under the present law there is no such thing as drawing rations in kind by an officer. Sir, if that provision exists under the law, then there could be mentioned cases in which to deny it would operate as a gross injustice. Now, I undertake to say that the provision of the law to-day is such that it is within the option of the officer to say whether he will draw his rations, fuel, &c., in kind or will commute. The gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE,] in whose ability, in whose integrity, in whose character in every respect I have the highest degree of confidence, stated that all who had asserted a different principle were utterly mistaken. I know he said it because he believed it. He said he did not know where the legislation was, but that that was the uniform practice of the Army and was the law. Now, sir, if the gentleman will turn to the Statutes of 1795, second session, chapter forty-four, section eleven, he will find this provision:

"That the commissioned officers aforesaid shall be entitled to receive for their daily subsistence the following number of rations of provisions, to wit."

And after specifying the number of rations to which the officer of each grade shall be entitled, the section continues:

"Or money in lieu thereof at the option of said officers, at the contract price at the posts respectively where the rations shall become due."

Now, sir, that law was amended by an act passed in 1796, in which we find a similar provision. I refer gentlemen to the Laws of 1796, first session, chapter thirty-nine, section thirteen, where it is provided—

"That the commissioned officers aforesaid shall be entitled to receive for their daily subsistence the following number of rations of provisions."

After specifying the number of rations to which the officer of each grade shall be entitled, the section continues:

"Or money in lieu thereof at the option of said officers at the posts respectively where the rations shall become due."

Now, I know it will be said, and said with apparent fairness, that the Government furnishes rations at the posts where the officers are located at the price paid by the Government at the point of purchase. That is very true; yet, sir, how often does it happen in the experience of an army that stores are destroyed, vessels bearing them are shipwrecked, warehouses are burned down, so that the officers of subsistence have no recourse but to go to the nearest market and there purchase subsistence at exorbitant prices demanded for provisions upon the frontier and in other localities. Yet, in such a case, under the provisions of this bill, an officer, instead of paying what it would cost him for rations under other circumstances, pays three or four times as much from his fixed and unchanging compensation.

Now, sir, while I think of it, let me state that the reason why the change referred to has been adopted is found in the Articles of War, or in the Regulations of the War Department, in regard to rations. In 1847 or 1848, soon after we took possession of California, officers in the interior, who were entitled to draw rations at their cost to the Government, found that they could not live upon their pay. As I have stated, the rent of a single room, scarcely large enough to furnish space for a wash-stand and a bed, would, in some instances, amount to $100 per month; board would cost six or seven or ten dollars per day; labor would be worth five dollars per day, and the price of everything else would be in the same proportion. Officers in California, being entitled under the law to draw their rations in kind at the place where the Government held them, and at the cost to the Government at the point of purchase without transportation, drew their rations in kind and sold them for two and a half or three dollars per ration. In this way one officer drew at one time, as I have been told, $9,000 in money from the Government; and thus he was enabled to sustain himself. I see nothing unlawful in the act although it was censured. This is the reason why this change was introduced. It is not a matter of law. The law stands to-day as I have read it, unrepealed and in full force; and I do not believe that it is best for us at this time to abolish a system which has worked harmoniously and equitably with respect to all parties, and to substitute for it a system which fixes an arbitrary and unchanging rule of compensation.

Again, sir, on the subject of forage, there have been times when on the plains the horse of an officer could not be supported for six dollars a day. Yet this bill, as first introduced, made no allowance for such a case. The chairman of the committee has, however, very wisely, as I think, proposed, and the House has adopted, an amendment obviating this difficulty; an amendment introducing into this bill the very principle on which he based his objections to the existing law.

Now, sir, if he will go further, if he will do justice in reference to the commutation of quarters, I have no objection to the provisions of the bill. All I ask is justice, and that is all these officers demand.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] in his opening speech assumed what was denied by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUMONT,] who addressed the House yesterday on this subject. The chairman of the committee then said:

"This bill, it will be observed, is entitled 'A bill to reduce and establish the pay of the officers and to regulate the pay of the soldiers of the armies of the United States.'"

I have no doubt the gentleman was entirely sincere in that declaration; but I want to know where the reduction is. Is it in reference to those who have been long in the service? No, sir. As to them, when you come to the amendment he proposes in reference to the longevity rations, you give an officer who has been long in the service largely increased pay. You do not reduce the pay of such officers, but you do reduce the pay of those who cannot bear the reduction. You take the junior officers, the second lieutenants, and you reduce them. It costs as much to clothe and feed a second lieutenant as a major general. Their quarters and their family relations may be different, but their personal expenses for clothing, &c., are generally not very unequal.

The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUMONT,] after criticising this bill, advocates it because it is a measure for the increase of the pay of the Army. If that be so, I say this is not the time to increase the pay of officers of the Army. And if it is to reduce the pay, I also say that this is not the time to do so. I am not willing in the year 1866, when a year has scarcely elapsed since the gallant Army of the Republic struck down rebellion in the field; I am not willing that those who stood gallantly by the flag, and who carried it on many battle-fields through fire and blood to victory, now wounded, perhaps disabled, broken down in health; I am not willing that they shall be met by the Congress of the United States with a proposition to reduce their pay. I want every officer who served his country well shall be liberally compensated for the service he has rendered. They stand high in the record of this nation, exhibiting a more brilliant array of martial deeds and prowess than was ever before exhibited by any country in the world. I am not willing that those men whose names are graven indelibly on the tablets of time should now, one year after the war has ended, have their pay reduced by the action of this Congress.

Now, sir, whether it be to reduce the pay or to increase the pay of the Army this is not the time, and I wish this whole subject could be deferred until the next session of Congress, when a plan might be adopted embracing many of the ideas of the honorable chairman of the committee which would meet with the cordial concurrence of the country. I am sure I should be glad to sustain it.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS.]

Mr. ROGERS. I believe I have only a few minutes. How much time have I?

The SPEAKER. There are only fifteen minutes remaining of the hour of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, of course my experience in military matters is very limited. Much of the information that I have with regard to the status of the Army has been derived from the speeches I have heard delivered on this occasion. But when I look at the act first organizing the Army and fixing its compensation, which it is now proposed to change, I find that it dates back to March 3, 1795. It is enough for me to know that a system of pay which has existed for over seventy years cannot suddenly at this time be changed without doing injustice to officers of the regular Army. There is an impression on my mind—I think I have seen it in this House from the commencement of the session—that several gentlemen who have not been educated at West Point have been continually attacking the regular Army. I believe that had it not been for the discipline which the West Point officers, whose pay is attempted to be cut down by this bill, infused into the gallant volunteers, this rebellion would never have been put down and secession in this country would have succeeded.

Sir, I remember, in looking over the history of this rebellion, that Stonewall Jackson at one time with fifteen thousand men kept three able generals on our side, who had not been educated at West Point, in abeyance for six months with sixty-five thousand men under their command, although if they had been educated cadets it might have been the same.

I am further opposed to this bill because there is no member of the regular Army who is advocating it. This question has been brought before the Congress of the United States at different times. It was talked about in 1820, and a report upon it was made by the then Paymaster General, and his report was against it; and it is a significant fact, which has become a part of the history of the country, that no Secretary of War, from the first Secretary of War down to the present time, with the exception of Jefferson Davis, has ever advocated the system of pay proposed by the bill now under discussion.

A MEMBER. General Bragg.

Mr. ROGERS. General Bragg was never Secretary of War. The only man who ever held the office of Secretary of War, from the commencement of our political existence, who advocated this system of pay, was Jefferson Davis. Braxton Bragg did recommend it, but he was never the Secretary of War of the United States. And, sir, during the late rebellion, in the rebellious States, where nobody will deny that a great army was marshaled, although in a bad cause, Jefferson Davis and Braxton Bragg, who was a general under him, both advocated the same system of pay that we have had in force since the organization of the Army in 1795; and our whole experience through several generations, and even the experience of England for several hundred years before the revolutionary war, demonstrate the fact that no substantial change can be made in the pay system but what would interfere with the morale and efficiency of the American Army.

I am opposed to anything that interferes with the pay of the officers of the regular Army, because I believe the nation owes them a debt of gratitude, equally with the volunteers, that they can never pay. I remember that when despotism reigned in this country, when men were arrested and dragged from their beds at midnight for their opinions, no general of the regular Army countenanced or sanctioned such proceedings. Sir, the officers of the regular Army have been men who have ever stood by the Constitution and the flag. They were the men who led the Army against the British in 1812; they were the men who fought the Mexicans in the Mexican war, who waged battle against the rebellion from the commencement to the end. Many of them were killed and left orphans behind them. And it is now too late a period in the history of this country, when the day of magnanimity has come, to take one single cent or farthing from the pay and emoluments of the West Point officers who led our regular Army through the conflicts of the last four or five years.

It cannot be denied, and the fact will go down to future generations as a proof of the utility of the regular Army, that during the late war the greatest military talent was shown by those who had been educated at West Point. When the flag of the country was almost trailing in the dust, and the hosts of secession were driving by bayonet charges into the ranks of the brave volunteers and regulars, the brave General McClellan, educated at West Point, led them to victory and turned the tide of battle.

Sir, I believe that the stability, the perpetuity, and the glory of the country depend upon sustaining this class of men, who have given their time and influence and shed their blood in defense of the Union.

The Constitution of the United States makes special provision for Congress to raise a regular army. It makes provision for the Army whose organization is now under consideration. The Army, as thus organized, has been true to the country. When the foreign foe has invaded our soil it has buckled on its armor in defense of the Union. These officers of the regular Army have spent years in lone camps or in fortifications on the frontier, drawn away from the luxuries of life, and cut off from that association with their fellow-citizens which is common to us all. That sacrifice they make. I never knew an officer of the regular Army who left anything but a legacy of love and honor to his children. I speak to-day in behalf of the gallant and brave men who belong to the regular Army, as well as the volunteer soldiers and officers. I say nothing in disparagement of those officers who belong to the volunteer service; but I do say that but for the gallantry, the bravery, the knowledge, the skill, and the military judgment of the hero of Antietam (General McClellan) the Capitol of this country would have been taken possession of by rebels, and the flag of rebeldom would have floated from its dome.

A MEMBER. To whom do you refer?

Mr. ROGERS. I speak of General McClellan in particular, and to the able generals belonging to the regular Army, and to the men whose recorded acts of bravery are unparalleled in the history of any war in the Old World or in this.

Sir, I should be recreant in duty to myself and in duty to the descendants who are to come after me did I not sustain the men who have upheld our flag and followed in the footsteps of Washington, who drove the British from these colonies.

Sir, after a conflict like this, when liberty is once more secure, it is no time to attempt to take away one cent of that which is justly due to these gallant officers of our regular Army.

What is the use of this bill? Who asks for it? Not a single general in the Army. Every single one of them is opposed to it. All the reports made to this House from official sources are against it. And yet gentlemen, because of their admiration of the volunteer corps and prejudice against West Pointers, are trying to take away some part of the glory which belongs to the regular Army. They want to make a dive at them and take away some portion of their pay and compensation. I say, sir, it is dangerous to interfere now with them. What reward is it to be a man belonging to the regular Army, who left a situation yielding him ten thousand a year and returned to the service, to give him this compensation? Suppose he be located at Washington, or at some other place where his rations cost five hundred per cent. more than at other points. Is not that officer punished by a fine to the extent of five hundred per cent. on account of the location in which he may happen to be if you make no allowance for rations according to location?

I believe that it is dangerous to interfere with the law which has been in existence for so many years. This law, sir, was in existence when our fathers were not ruled by passion, but were animated by a love of perfect liberty and united in principle and purpose from one end of the Union to the other. But now, when the Union is divided, when the stars of eleven States are blotted off that flag, when ten or eleven million people who are equally interested with us in this great Army are not represented here, when passion rules the hour, I am not willing, for one, to interfere with the pay of that Army which was established in 1795.

What army is there that will compare in magnificence, in splendor, and in efficiency with our American Army? Sir, you may go back over the history of the darkest ages; you may turn to the history of modern times, and nowhere will you find an army in which the morale is so complete or which has performed its work so faithfully as has this Army of ours. I must say, and take pleasure in doing it, that the volunteer soldiers and officers have been brave, gallant, and efficient. Yet, sir, their efficiency was in a great part derived from the discipline acquired by them through the instrumentality of officers educated at West Point, and I do not hesitate to say that an army without discipline can accomplish no more than a mob, and it was the discipline of our volunteer soldiers and officers that made them an army able to compete with any army in the world.

Why, sir, there is no pay that will compensate a man for periling his life on the battlefield. The poor soldier who leaves his native hills and goes to the field of battle for twelve or fifteen dollars a month and perhaps six hundred or eight hundred dollars bounty is not compensated for the risk of life and limb that he runs.

And with the exception of a few members, there is hardly a member of this House who would have gone into the Army during the late war if he could have hired a substitute to take his place, even though he sold his farm to get the money to pay him. He thought too much of his wife and his family, of his home and of his own life to risk it, if he could, by selling all he had, obtain money enough to buy him a substitute.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. ROGERS. I cannot yield any more, for my time is limited to fifteen minutes from the commencement. There is no compensation sufficient to pay these men or volunteers for their services in the Army. Our officers ought at least to be sufficiently well paid so that when they die they can leave means enough to support their families. I believe in paying our officers and soldiers properly for their services, whether in the Army as volunteers or regulars, because if any men should be well paid it is those who have saved their country. The saviour of his country is to be compared with the Saviour of the world, and should be so remunerated by us that those coming after us will see from our example how brave and heroic men should be rewarded. There are no men more deserving the gratitude and care of their country than these men who by their great and brave deeds have accomplished the salvation of their country; they cannot be compensated in dollars and cents for the services they have rendered.

Much has been said about the Government having been at the expense of educating these officers. How is it? A young man, having perhaps a home of ease and comfort, enters West Point, separating himself from the rest of the world, and there receives an education, and afterward devotes his whole life and abilities to the service of his country, as General Scott has done. Is there a man who would have wished that General Scott should have died without leaving a sufficient competence for his family? I think not.

Now, I suppose there are some on the other side of the House who will consider my speech a sufficient reason why they should vote for this bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think the speech has been an argument in favor of the bill. And as both sides have been heard, I suppose there can be no objection to my now notifying the House that I propose to put an end to this discussion by calling the previous question on the bill.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] will yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. SCHENCK. I was about to say that I propose to hold the floor before calling the previous question, and yield to two or three members who desire to offer amendments, and also for five or ten minutes each to two or three others, and then I shall call the previous question.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will yield to me a few moments. I asked the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] to yield to me a moment while he had the floor, but he declined to do so. I suppose he speaks so seldom, and then for such a short time, that he did not feel that he had any time to spare.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSSEAU] for a few minutes.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I expect to vote against this bill. But in doing so I want to say that I do not in the slightest degree indorse the sentiments of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS], and do not yield my assent to his misrepresentations and slanders of more than a million brave men who served in the volunteer service of the United States.

Mr. ROGERS. How did I slander them?

Mr. ROUSSEAU. By saying that they would not have fought or made good soldiers without the aid of the officers of the regular Army.

Mr. ROGERS. I did not say that. I said they would not have won so great victories but for the brave officers of the regular Army who commanded and led them.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. The gentleman is like an unbroken colt in a burr patch, you can neither catch him nor hold him. [Laughter.]

Now, the idea of charging that the Army of the United States, composed almost entirely of volunteers, would have been but a mere mob except for the officers of the regular Army, is a slander upon the volunteer soldiers of this country which I will not hear uttered anywhere by any one without repelling it.

Sir, the regular Army has no better friend in this country, in a humble way, than I am. I have been its friend always, and I am its friend now. I am a friend to West Point and those who have been educated there, and I shall vote against this bill and for that reason. But I want it distinctly understood that in doing so I do not indorse the sentiments of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS.] Rather than indorse those sentiments I would vote for this bill or almost any other. The gentleman cannot have read the history of his country if he believes what he has stated here. Where are the regular officers who organized, drilled, disciplined, and led the volunteers of the Army? Their numbers are just as a drop in the ocean compared with those of the volunteers.

Mr. ROGERS. I would ask the gentleman if he is a West Pointer. Perhaps that is the reason this matter touches the gentleman so much.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I am not; I have never seen West Point; and it is not necessary that I should see it in order to know what volunteers can do and have done.

The volunteer army of this nation put down the late rebellion, and they could have done it as well if there had not been a single West Pointer in the whole Army.

Mr. ROGERS. I don't believe it.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. The gentleman may have stated what he believes, but it is not of the least importance what he believes. I do not think that he has any sufficient knowledge in regard to the matter. I ask him, where are the men of the regular Army who drilled and taught the volunteers to fight? In the whole army of the West—and gallant, brave men they were—there was not a handful of West Pointers. I had the honor of commanding all the regulars in the West, and if they have a friend on earth to-day I claim to be that friend. I feel it an honor to be called their friend. I had hoped, sir, that the gentleman from New Jersey could oppose this bill without assailing the volunteer army of the United States. As one of that army I repel this assault upon them, and if I were a West Pointer or a regular I would repel it all the more strongly.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ROUSSEAU,] in the remarks which he has just made, totally misrepresents me. His object appears to be to place me in a false position before the country.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not yield the floor to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS.]

Mr. ROGERS. I claim the right to be heard in vindication of myself against misrepresentation; and I say that the records of this country will not sustain the gentleman from Kentucky.

Several MEMBERS. Order!

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. ORTH in the chair.) The gentleman from New Jersey will take his seat. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have promised to yield to my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] that he may offer an amendment to remove what he considers an ambiguity in the bill.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask the gentleman to grant me three minutes that I may make an explanation.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not yield to the gentleman from New Jersey, I yield to my colleague.

Mr. ROGERS. Well, all I have to say is that the charge which the gentleman from Kentucky has made against me is utterly false.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey must take his seat.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend by striking out, in the fourth section, after the words "per month," in the ninth line, the following words:

For each month of faithful service in the second year of his enlistment, and a further like increase of one dollar more per month for faithful service in the third year of his enlistment.

And inserting in lieu thereof the following:

During the second year of his enlistment; a further increase of one dollar per month during the third year of his enlistment; and one additional dollar per month during each additional year of his enlistment.

So that the clause will read:

Hereafter each enlisted man shall, instead of any allowance for bounty, receive an increase on his pay proper of one dollar per month during the second year of his enlistment; a further increase of one dollar per month during the third year of his enlistment; and one additional dollar per month during each additional year of his enlistment.

Mr. Speaker, the amendment which I have offered is designed to render more definite what appears to some of us a little ambiguous in the language of the section as it stands in the bill. The intention of the committee is, I presume, that after a man shall have served one year of his term of enlistment he shall, during the second year, receive one dollar per month more than during the first year; that if he shall serve a third year he shall receive an additional dollar per month, and so on, an additional dollar per month for each additional year of service. In order to obviate what appears to me an ambiguity in the language of the section, I have recast it, and I think it expresses more clearly the intention of the committee. I believe the chairman of the committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, while I am on the floor I will say a word on the bill. I have been very much surprised at the opposition which has been manifested to this measure. In the first place, sir, the bill comes from a committee that has had this subject particularly in its charge and has given it a careful and thorough examination. The very fact that the bill is reported by that committee whose members have always been staunch defenders of the Army should, it seems to me, commend it to favorable consideration. But what is of more consequence, the provisions of the bill are such as commend themselves to my judgment, and I approve it on account of its own palpable merits.

I have heard no adequate reason offered in opposition. The present system of pay and allowances of Army officers is objectionable because of its uncertainty, because of the expanding and contracting mode of compensation. In the second place, the system is objectionable because of the fact, which will not be denied by any one familiar with the administration of the present law, that the easier and more comfortable an officer's duty, and the further removed from danger, the larger is his pay; while in proportion to the exposure and peril of the service in which he is engaged the smaller is his compensation.

Now, what I have just stated is a matter of fact which every gentleman who has drawn his pay as an officer of the Government, first on active duty in the field and then on some post duty, well knows. I believe no gentleman acquainted with the operation of the laws on that subject will deny this statement. It is a remarkable rule of compensation that the more dangerous and arduous the duties of an officer are the less is his pay, and the more comfortably he is situated in quarters in a city where he is in safety in the midst of society the greater is his pay.

The object of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is, in the first place, to make the pay definite in amount, giving the proper range in consequence of the character of service, light service the smaller pay and arduous service the larger pay; and next, instead of the longevity ration, giving a certain per cent. of increased pay for more years of service, both to the officer and the enlisted man. This is a wise provision, and will encourage men to remain in the Army.

The argument relied upon as the Samson of objections by the opponents of this bill is, that in some parts of the country it costs an officer more to live than in others, that his fuel, rations, and quarters cost more, and therefore the old system of pay and allowances should be kept up so that the officer may get what he needs from the Government at cost price. I answer this by the fact that our postmasters, our route agents, our territorial judges and circuit judges of the United States have fixed salaries, without regard to the place where they may serve or the price of board where they may live.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I ask the gentleman from Ohio whether it is not true that postmasters and route agents are paid according to the services which they perform and the locality in which they may be stationed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am aware that on the California coast in almost all salaries we have made a discrimination, but that is an exception to our general practice. I say to the gentleman that the principle of this bill to which he objects is one which runs through all of the official departments of the Government.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the men who do not engage in active service in the field should not have, in addition to their comfortable positions, more pay than those who bear the burden and heat of the conflict and rough it in the field or on the frontier. I call upon the members of the House who desire to do justice to the men who were the life of the Army and whose acts illustrate the brightest pages of our history, that those men shall not receive less than those who have been in easy and comfortable positions during the whole struggle. I should like to have it known throughout the country that Congress will stand by these men and say that pay shall depend upon the character of service rendered, and that it shall not be, as now, that the less duty shall earn the greater pay.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will accept the amendment proposed by my colleague. It does not alter the sense at all of that section, and perhaps makes it a little clearer.

I propose to insert after the word "field," in the seventeenth line of the first section, these words: "or on service as chief of bureau," so as to give a brigadier general, the ranking officer of a bureau, the highest compensation of his rank while on duty in that capacity. I offer this after consultation with some gentlemen of the War Department. It is but just it should be included in that class.

The gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE,] who discussed this matter the other day, had an amendment which, in his absence on account of sickness, I will offer to the bill. In the mean time I will hear what the gentleman from Vermont has to offer.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. It is of course known by those who heard what I said upon this bill yesterday that I am opposed to it both in principle and detail, but at the same time, if the bill shall pass, I desire to have it as perfect as it may be made. As the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs does not give me time to answer the arguments of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] I simply content myself by proposing the following amendment, to come in as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That officers of the Army, when on detached service, shall be allowed, in addition to their fixed salary, the actual cost of fuel and quarters.

Mr. SCHENCK. I decline to yield to allow that amendment to be offered. I have an amendment to offer on behalf of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE,] as a modification of or a substitute for an amendment which that gentleman has already offered. The gentleman from Wisconsin is absent on account of indisposition, and he desires me to withdraw the previous amendment and offer this in lieu of it, to come in as an additional section at the end of section five:

And be it further enacted, That officers may purchase from the proper departments the same amount of subsistence and fuel which they are now permitted by law to draw in kind, or commute at uniform prices, to be fixed from time to time by the Secretary of War, not exceeding the average actual cost of the same, exclusive of transportation, upon their certificates that it is for their own use or the use of their families. But nothing in this act contained shall affect the right of officers to use without charge public barracks or quarters or buildings hired for their use in accordance with the laws and regulations now in force.

I have only to say that this does nothing but declare the law as it now is. We have not proposed by this bill to interfere with the permission to purchase subsistence and fuel; but to remove all doubt this amendment has been prepared by the gentleman from Wisconsin, and I hope it may become a part of the bill.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am now appealed to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] to yield to him ten minutes of my time for the purpose of replying to the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DEMONT.]

Mr. THAYER. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] who I hope will allow me to proceed for fifteen minutes, for I can hardly say what I desire to in ten minutes.

I beg the House to understand that I do not intend to traverse again any portion of the ground I have already gone over in what I had the honor to submit to this House upon this subject. My simple purpose in rising is to reply to some comments which have been made by gentlemen upon the argument which I submitted to the House on a former day. Some strictures, I understand, were made upon my remarks on yesterday by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUMONT.] I do not know that I feel called upon to reply to the gentleman from Indiana, for several reasons. First, because I was unavoidably absent from the House when he made my remarks the text for his discussion; secondly, because his remarks are not printed in the Globe to-day, and I have, therefore, no authoritative version of what he did say; and thirdly, if the tenor of his remarks was of the character which has been privately reported to me, I do not think that I am called upon to make any reply to them. I do not think that I owe it either to myself or to this House to make any reply to them. I suppose, indeed I have no doubt, that the gentleman displayed the usual characteristics of his wit and indulged in the usual refined style of rhetoric which I have listened to from him before in this House, and I have no doubt the House enjoyed the performance as much as it usually does upon those occasions.

I have, however, a few remarks to make in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE,] who, I very much regret to see, is not in his seat, and who, I much more regret to hear from the chairman of the committee, [Mr. SCHENCK,] is detained from his seat by indisposition. I desired to submit some remarks to him, because I know that he is a gentleman who is careful in what he says, who can appreciate the language of laws, who knows the force and effect of law, and who will not dismiss from the discussion the laws of the United States with the flippancy which substitutes attempted wit for argument.

Now, sir, the gentleman from Wisconsin takes issue with me in regard to the law on the subject of rations. Sir, I do not profess to know much about the practice in reference to this matter in the Army. I have not had the benefit of the experience upon that subject which many gentlemen in this House have had. I cannot speak with any authority with reference to the practice, but I beg the House to believe that I have not spoken upon this subject without having examined the law which is applicable to it. And by the side of that law I do not care what your Army Regulations are, which are a mere abstract made up in the bureaus and bound together, their various parts often conflicting with one another. I care not what those regulations may be. The law permits an officer to draw rations in kind, and there is no authority in this Government to refuse that privilege to him in the face of the law which secures it to him.

Now, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUMONT,] if I am correctly informed, says that I spoke upon this subject without knowing anything about it. Sir, I do not profess to know so much about military affairs as the gentleman from Indiana, but I do profess to know the meaning of a statute which is written upon the face of the statute-book of the United States, when there is nothing ambiguous in its terms, and I tell the gentleman from Indiana that I can trace upon the statute-book of the United States from the year 1790 down to the year 1863 this provision which he denies to be law.

I have upon my notes reference to no less than twenty-five acts of Congress which either directly or by reference to former statutes place that provision in our laws. The very last one, that of 1861, adopts and incorporates in the provisions of the laws which regulate the Army the very provision of the act of 1802, which act is the foundation of the law now regulating the Army of the United States, although it may be sneered at because it is more than forty years old.

Sir, the act which made the slave trade piracy is more than forty years old, but I suppose that no gentleman upon this floor would have the hardihood to contend that it has been repealed because it was passed in 1820.

I wish now to turn for a moment to the language of these laws; and the first to which I will refer is the act of 1790, the seventh section of which expressly says that "the commissioned officers aforesaid shall be entitled to receive for their daily subsistence the following ration of provisions, to wit." The law then goes on to give the amount of provisions to which each officer shall be entitled, and then it adds, "or money in lieu thereof, at the option of the said officer." That was the law in 1790, after the adoption of the Constitution, when the first Army of the United States was organized. There are twenty-five subsequent acts of Congress which retain that provision. They are as follows: April 30, 1790; March 8, 1791; March 5, 1792; May 9, 1794; March 8, 1795; May 30, 1796; May 28, 1798; July 16, 1798; March 2, 1799; March 3, 1799; March 16, 1802; April 12, 1808; January 2, 1812; January 11, 1812; January 29, 1813; March 3, 1815; March 2, 1821; June 15, 1832; May 23, 1836; July 5, 1838; May 19, 1846; February 11, 1847; February 21, 1857; July 29, 1861.

In 1802 there was a general reorganization of the Army, and the provisions of the act of 1802 are, by references in all subsequent acts, made the foundation for the present organization of the Army of the United States, and the provisions of that law are, in most respects, the present existing provisions of law in reference to the Army of the United States, made so by express reference and incorporation of those provisions in later laws.

The act of 1802 provides that—

"The commissioned officers aforesaid shall be entitled to receive for their daily subsistence the following number of rations of provisions."

It then goes on to give the number of rations to which each officer shall be entitled; and then it adds:

"Or money in lieu thereof at the option of said officer or cadet."

In the year 1808, when the Army was again reorganized, the same provision was incorporated in the law with this addition:

"That the subsistence of the officers of the Army, when not in kind, shall be estimated at twenty-five cents per ration."

The act of 1857, as we all know, raised the commutation price of rations to thirty cents.

Now, sir, I cannot, in the limited time allotted to me by the courtesy of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, go through all these various acts of Congress, and I should probably weary the patience of the House if I undertook to do so.

Finally, I desire to call the attention of the House to the act of 1861, entitled "An act to increase the present military establishment of the United States." That was an act passed in the beginning of the war to put down the rebellion. That act declares—

"That all officers and enlisted men raised in pursuance of the foregoing sections shall receive the same pay, emoluments, and allowances, and be on the same footing, in every respect, of those of the corresponding grades and corps now in the regular service."

The SPEAKER. The time for which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] yielded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] has expired.

Mr. THAYER. I trust the gentleman from Ohio will yield to me a few minutes more.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman will recollect that the reason he gave me for yielding in the first place to him was that he desired to reply to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUMONT.] But he appears not to be doing so now.

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman must observe that I am addressing my remarks directly to the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well; I will yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. THAYER. Those provisions, which were in the act of 1802, and which I have said now constitute the basis of the organization of the Army, have, so far as the subject I am considering is concerned, been incorporated into every law which has since been passed upon that subject.

In order to refute this position the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] quoted a foot-note from the edition of the revised Army Regulations, published in 1863, which foot-note says:

"Subsistence stores will not be issued to officers, nor to their servants, unless they are enlisted men, and are so reported on the officer's account and payroll."

Now, of how much force is that? Turn to page 368 of the same book and you will see printed the certificate which the officer is bound by the rules of the Department to sign before he can draw his pay. That certificate begins thus:

"I hereby certify that the foregoing account is accurate and just; that I have not been absent without leave during any part of the time charged for; that I have not received pay, nor drawn rations, forage, or clothing in kind," &c.

That is what he is bound to certify before he can get his pay, and that is in the same volume of regulations which contains the foot-note which the gentleman from Wisconsin read to show that he cannot draw his rations in kind.

Now, these discrepancies are very easily accounted for. The portions of the Regulations relating to the different bureaus are made up in those different bureaus. That relating to the commissary department is made up in the commissary bureau; that relating to the quartermaster's department is made up in the quartermaster's bureau; that relating to the pay department, in the paymaster's bureau, and so on in regard to the different bureaus. And these abstracts thus prepared in the different bureaus are bound together and form what are called the "Revised Army Regulations." But they are the mere observations of officers of the various bureaus put in the shape of notes to the text of the Regulations. They are of no consequence so far as changing the law is concerned. Will any man undertake to say that he can abrogate an act of Congress by merely putting a foot-note in the book of Army Regulations?

I declare that that which I say to be the law upon this subject is the existing law, and all the commissaries and quartermasters and paymasters in the world, who, in their compilations of the Army Regulations should put in a thousand foot-notes contradicting the express law upon that subject, are impotent to change the law. I have here another copy of the Revised Army Regulations, and on page 268 I find this note:

"If rations are drawn for a commissioned officer on this return, his name, rank, regiment, and corps must be mentioned in the remarks."

Now, these facts show conclusively to anybody who will examine the law, that what I have stated upon this subject has been correctly stated. That has been the law from the first organization of the Army. I do not say that the practice of the Government has been uniform. The variation from the law may, perhaps, be due to that departmental legislation to which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] referred in his remarks the other day. The subsistence department, in order to avoid the trouble of issuing rations in kind to officers, may have put that foot-note into the Army Regulations which has so utterly misled the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE,] and by which he has been so completely victimized.

It must be clear to anybody who will examine the law that the provision to which I have referred relating to officers' rations still constitutes a part of the law relating to the military service of the United States. I venture to say that no sensible person will undertake to dispute that who has carefully examined the law upon the subject.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will now yield ten or fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUMONT.]

Mr. DUMONT. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to occupy either ten or fifteen minutes in replying to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER.] He seems to be inclined to believe that I have inflicted some wrong upon him. I am not conscious of having done so. Such a thing never entered into my imagination. Everything I said was in entire kindness toward him. My remarks may not have been in the exact strain which the gentleman himself would have used; but the style of those remarks was my own, and I do not know how to use any other style than that which a kind Providence has given to me.

Now, the Regulations of the Army declare in so many words that commutation of subsistence shall be drawn. Another section of the Regulations declares that officers may purchase subsistence from the commissary department at the contract price therefor, deducting transportation, upon filing a certain certificate. The gentleman says that he does not care anything about the Regulations; that he goes back to the statute. He does not seem to know that the Regulations themselves are by an express statute made the laws of the land. The gentleman also says that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] is careful about what he states; that he does not indulge in wagger; that he knows what he talks about. Well, I incline to believe that such is the case, and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania would improve very much by being governed by the same rule. There is a statute passed by Congress declaring, in so many words, the Regulations of the Army to be the law of the land; and I do not care how much the gentleman goes back to the year 1800 or the year 1795 to hunt up old obsolete statutes which have been repealed.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DUMONT. Yes, sir.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he can point to any statute which repeals the provision which has been the subject of controversy. The gentleman says it has been repealed; I desire to know by what statute.

Mr. DUMONT. By the Regulations.

Mr. THAYER. Then I will ask the gentleman by what clause of the Regulations; because it will not, I suppose, be pretended that a mere foot-note added by an officer is a regulation.

Mr. DUMONT. There is no foot-note about it. The provision referred to has been repealed by the clause that comes in contact with it. When two laws come in conflict with each other the latter law, according to all the adjudications in the land, repeals the former.

The gentleman may say that these Regulations are made by Army officers. That does not make any kind of difference if Congress afterward adopts them. I do not care who made them—if they were made by an old woman, if they were made by the most humble man in Washington city—if Congress afterward by solemn enactment adopts them as the law of the land they are the law of the land, notwithstanding the gentleman may talk about "foot-notes."

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has been very kind to me. On one occasion he yielded the floor to me, giving me an opportunity to make a speech out of my turn. I felt exceedingly grateful to the gentleman for that; and the last thing which I would have wished to do was to show my ingratitude by inflicting a wrong upon him. I understand this whole thing. The gentleman was led into some errors. I acknowledge him to be a good lawyer, one of the ablest in the land; but he was led into some errors by yielding a too credulous ear to those who misrepresented the facts. And now the gentleman has been led into additional blunders by having what I said reported to him in an offensive sense. You, Mr. Speaker, heard the few crude remarks that I took occasion to make yesterday. I do not pretend that they had much merit; I do not pretend that they were what they ought to have been; I do not pretend that they were what they would have been if they had come from the classic lips of the gentleman who has taken offense at them. But they were just what I believed to be appropriate to the bill.

Sir, a person who could not understand a word of the English language heard two persons engaged in a discussion in that language. He went away and said that a particular one of the parties had proved victorious; he had no kind of doubt about it. "Why," it was asked, "how did you find out which was victorious? You could not understand a word that either of them said." His reply was this: "Why, one of them got mad, and I knew then that he was whipped." [Laughter.]

The gentleman did get mad, and there is no use of disguising it. There is no need of going round the bush. There is no use of being mealy-mouthed about it. He went from one blunder to another on this subject, and it was the bounden duty of any sworn member of the House, in answering him, to refer to the mistakes which he had made. I did it as a man, and I profess to be as much of a man as any on this part of God's footstool. I intend so to act on all occasions.

I did not do it with any view of being offensive to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I entertain no unkind feelings for him, none whatever. I confined my remarks to those which he had made in regard to the Army. I entertain no unkind feelings for him, because I presume that he has been led astray by those who heard my remarks and were inclined to get him to pitch into me. [Laughter.] I have now said all that I desire.

Mr. SCHENCK. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. SCHENCK. Before proceeding to close the debate I will yield for a moment to the gentleman from Maine.

NEBRASKA WAR DEBT.

Mr. BLAINE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Nebraska, to reimburse that Territory for money expended in raising troops, &c.; and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

PAY OF THE ARMY—AGAIN.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I regret the absence of my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE,] as I was desirous he should make some reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER.] However, I do not know I can better supply what he would have said than by asking the Clerk to read the letter which he has sent notifying me it would be impossible for him to be present to vote, as he wished, for this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 5, 1866.

MY DEAR GENERAL: I very much regret that I cannot be present to vote for your Army bill this afternoon. I would certainly be there if it were possible, but cannot believe that the House will vote down so just a measure, thereby declaring its approval of the policy which has hitherto made fighting and service with troops not the highest, but rather a secondary duty for officers of the Army.

At present it is mortifying to see how they scramble for clerkships.

Very truly yours,

H. E. PAINE.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is just it. We have introduced a bill here to make the compensation to be afforded to the different classes of the Army of the United States, classed, I mean, by their employment, if not more favorable, at least equal, for those who are serving actively in the field with troops to the pay which is given to those who are engaged in bureaus or at headquarters, or in recruiting in cities and towns, where their services are more allied to those of civil life. The resistance made to this bill is a resistance made in behalf of those who are pursuing rather civil avocations and against those who are following the active duties of their profession, serving with troops in the field. That is the broad line of distinction between those who support this bill and those who oppose it. I am not at all unwilling to stand by the bill in the form in which we have now submitted it.

There has been a great deal said in the progress of this discussion—and the House will bear me witness that I have been willing there should be the fullest and fairest discussion allowed—which has little to do with the bill itself or the particular principle involved in its consideration. All that the gentleman has said just now about the ration, with due deference to his opinion, valuable as it usually is, I submit has nothing to do with the real question at issue. The ration, whether it can be drawn in kind or whether it cannot be drawn in kind, as we know is the construction and practice under the law which forbids it, or whether it be paid in the shape of commutation, as it now is, in lieu of the ration in kind, is in fact, in assuming the form of money, nothing more than so much money added to the salary of an officer, and the question is whether we shall continue to pay the salary of an officer in that shape.

Gentlemen have referred to this bill as one that has not come before the House with the unanimous indorsement or assent of the committee who reported it. With that I apprehend the House has little to do. It must have had the assent of a majority of that committee when a quorum was present for the transaction of business, as I know it did. Although, to my surprise, my colleague on the committee, [Mr. BLAINE,] who did not attend during the discussion before the committee, in order to give us the benefit of his valuable suggestions there, opposes the bill now in the House, and although the intimation comes from one other member of the committee that he is opposed to it, yet it is reported with the cordial and hearty assent of at least a very considerable majority of the committee from which it came.

But I do not suppose it is a matter of opinion with gentlemen in this House whether they shall sustain a bill or not according as that opinion is strengthened by the assent or dissent of this, that, or the other person. We do not put the bill on that ground. We present it upon its merits before the House as containing a wholesome reform, as providing for the abandonment of a vicious system which has long prevailed, in order to introduce in its stead a better system for the payment of officers of the Army.

We are met next with the intimation that this bill has its origin in certain prejudices or cunning and sinister purposes or concealed motives on the part of those who introduced and who sustain it here, and that it is in fact but a covert attack upon somebody—West Point, for instance, or the regular Army—and not really a measure in the interest of the Government at all. I have no reply to make to such imputations as those. They are unworthy of those who make them and undeserving of answer. Those who impute low or malicious motives I have always found to be influenced by such motives themselves. They therefore speak from a sort of consciousness of what they themselves might do under like circumstances.

I say again, we put this bill before the House on its merits. We wish to introduce a reform in the manner of payment of the Army, and although the abuse sought to be reformed is one which has not only lasted for many years, but has gone on step by step enlarging and increasing in strength, I find in that fact only a further argument for applying the hand of reform, and I trust it will be successfully applied now.

Sir, it is not opinion that gentlemen who have opposed this bill have found in their way or in the way of their arguments. The difficulty with them is that they have been met at every point by facts in regard to existing abuses, by facts in regard to the present mode of payment, by facts in regard to the opportunity for abusing that mode of payment. Their difficulty is therefore not in our putting authority against authority, but in our interposing facts in proof of the abuse in answer to all their citations of authority.

But let us look at their citations. Gentlemen inquire, who has asked for this bill? And they reply, not the regular Army. Now let me ask, who constitute the regular Army? The regular Army as it exists to-day, so far as its officers are concerned, is made up, more than four fifths, of officers appointed from civil life, and never educated at West Point. So that disposes, I believe, of the apprehension or fear in regard to this being a blow at West Point.

What next? Who are they who are opposed to the passage of this bill? Officers of the regular Army? Sir, I aver, without the fear of successful contradiction, that a very large majority of the officers, including some of the very best in the Army, are exceedingly solicitous that a bill of this kind should pass. But they are officers who are not here in Washington; they are officers who are away on duty. Some of them have been here, however, and within the last twenty-four hours I have been appealed to by two or three of them who did most gallant service in the field, sweeping the rebels from the Shenandoah valley and performing deeds of valor elsewhere, who desire nothing more than that such a bill as this should pass this House and should pass Congress.

Now, sir, there is a good deal of the regular Army away from Washington, away from Philadelphia, away from New York, away from the various stations about the country, away from the headquarters of the various military departments and divisions. And everybody that is away from those places desires this bill to pass; because it will more or less help them, while everybody who is at this station desire this bill not to pass, because it will cut a little into their pay. And that is the fact in reference to the witnesses who have been arrayed here upon the one side or the other.

But, sir, I will refer to the witnesses produced, and they are not so much witnesses as to facts. Who are they? "Three that bear witness." I hope I shall not be deemed irreverent. And upon this proof, furnished for the occasion by the War Department, gentlemen have spoken pretty much all they have to say upon this subject. They might just as well have had this printed communication from the pay department read at the Clerk's desk, and there rested their case, than to have amplified upon it and made it, perhaps, a little obscure in doing so. [Laughter.] On the 10th of March, after this bill was reported from my committee, it was deemed important to get an opinion in regard to it; and accordingly a copy of the bill was furnished to my very excellent friend, the present Paymaster General. He gave his opinion that the bill was inexpedient and ought not to pass; and he sustained that opinion by reports made heretofore upon that subject. By whom? By Paymaster Towson in 1826, when the subject was before under discussion, and he backed it up by a corroborating opinion of Paymaster General Larned, made in 1856, and he indorses the reports of both Towson and Larned.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Do I understand the gentleman to say that that report is signed by Paymaster General Brice? I should think not. I know that only two months ago I had a conversation with Paymaster General Brice on this very subject, and he told me then that he thought such a bill as this ought to pass, and that it would certainly save the pay department very much trouble if the pay of officers were fixed at a definite sum, and not left to depend upon various contingencies.

Mr. SCHENCK. Not only that, but it is a simplification of the mode of pay, saving a vast amount of machinery of the paymaster's department—a machinery now occupied in ciphering out these long, inextricable rolls, which my friend from New York [Mr. DAVIS] thinks that "he who runs may read," and understand, too.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. SCHENCK. As I have referred to the gentleman, I suppose I must yield to him.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to know what effect this bill would have upon the pay of a major general, a brigadier general, who had been in the service thirty years.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will answer that question presently; I prefer to proceed now.

The Paymaster General says:

"I send you, herewith, an extract from an official report of that gallant and much distinguished officer of the war of 1812, Brevet Major General Nathan Towson, Paymaster General of the Army for thirty-five years, (from 1819 till his decease in 1854,) made to the Secretary of War, April 3, 1826.

"Also a letter on the same subject, addressed to the Secretary of War, dated February 18, 1856, by the excellent successor of General Towson, the late Paymaster General Larned."

We have here got three witnesses on the stand, and it is fair to look at the interest of witnesses; they are Paymaster General Brice, Paymaster Larned, and Paymaster General Towson; all of the three, according to the present policy, being stationed where they get these allowances. Very naturally they do not want the law changed. That is the whole of it. I do not say this for the purpose of impeaching either of these three gentlemen, and I will not be misconstrued by having it said that I impeached them by referring to them in this way. But I do say that Paymaster Generals are akin to us, and to human nature—the human nature that characterizes us—as much so as any others; and it is a most unnatural thing to call upon gentlemen and expect them to decry a system by which they themselves benefit, and ask them to come forward as volunteer witnesses to testify against it.

I wish those gentlemen had written to the officers in the field. I wish they had sent out to those who are serving on the plains, or who are on duty at the various posts throughout the country; who are with their troops doing the hard, active work of their profession, constituting as they do a very large majority of the whole number of the officers of the Army, and obtained their opinions upon this subject. I oppose witness to witness. I have had not merely one but many communications and appeals from officers of that class, who desire that this bill shall pass, because it seeks to do justice to them, and aims to establish some fair and equitable relation between them and others.

Now, I propose to illustrate this, not at any great length, because I suppose the House has had enough not only of the discussion upon the general merits of the bill, but also of the illustrations which have been presented here. I will show how this bill will work, by taking for instance the first officer upon the list, a major general, and I do this at the risk of repeating to some extent what I have already said upon this subject. The pay proper of a major general, under the present system, is $220 a month, or $2,640 a year. To that pay is added commutation for four servants, at sixteen dollars each per month, or $768 a year. The allowance for clothing for those four servants is $312 a year. He is allowed for subsistence for himself fifteen rations per day for three hundred and sixty-five days, or five thousand four hundred and seventy-five per year; and for his servants four rations per day, or fourteen hundred and sixty per year, making an aggregate of six thousand nine hundred and thirty-five rations, which, at thirty cents per ration, would make $2,080 50. Then he is allowed to draw forage for five horses, amounting, at the present appraised value of forage here in this city, to $208 50 for each horse, making an addition of $1,042 50. He also gets an allowance for fuel, which varies a little in different places. But in making out the allowance for fuel, they generally take the average cost of the best dry hickory wood, and set that down as the price of fuel to be allowed. As estimated here a major general is allowed $509 62 for fuel. And then he is allowed as commutation for quarters the further sum of $1,206, making his aggregate pay $8,648 62; or $648 62 more than the Secretary of War receives. That is the pay of a major general, when on duty here in Washington, or at headquarters in Baltimore, Philadelphia, or New York, or out upon the plains at a post, or wherever else he may be, doing the duty of a major general at a station, as is the case with most if not all major generals in time of peace.

Now it is true that of this sum $1,042 50 is for forage, which is in kind and not in cash. All the rest of it is paid in cash. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] says that these poor suffering soldiers cannot afford even to keep a carriage. Sir, the peculiarity of the pay of an officer of the Army is that he can keep his carriage, while but few of the officers of the naval or civil service can do so. The officer of the Army can draw for his horses forage in kind, and therefore he can be sure of having enough to keep his horses. And it is also true that some of them drive around in ambulances which belong to the Government, and which cost the officers no more than their forage does.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. You were a major general in command at Baltimore, at one time, I believe.

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir, and I speak knowingly upon this subject, because I have been a part of it, though I will not consent to be put into the confessional here. I was enabled to live very well there upon my pay of over $8,000 a year, a great deal better than I can live here as a member of Congress upon my pay of $3,000 a year. I did not save much of my pay then; I save still less of it now. Even when I was of that class of officers who are better paid than any other class of officers under the Government of the United States—I mean the officers of the Army—I confess to the extravagance of having spent pretty nearly all of my pay, as I have no doubt my friend from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] would have done under the like circumstances.

But that does not touch the merits of this question, to which I will now go back. It was an unlucky illustration which the gentleman made about these officers not being able to keep their carriages, for in fact they are just the class of officers who are able to keep their carriages. The Government feeds their horses, for which the officer is at no expense, and he can purchase a carriage of his own, or drive about in an ambulance belonging to the Government, which also will cost him nothing. Now, I like too see these officers driving about in their carriages; I like to see them well paid.

But, as I said before, the difficulty with the gentlemen who oppose this bill is that they must deal with facts, and not with mere opinions. Now, take from the entire pay of the major general, which is $8,648 62, the cost of the forage, $1,042 50, and there is left the sum of $7,606 12. How does it happen to be so much? Because that aggregate sum includes $500 62 as commutation for fuel and $1,296 as commutation for quarters, making an aggregate of $1,805 62 which these gentlemen get by reason of being stationed at some town or post, or away from the troops, and upon a different sort of duty; while officers who are in the field and with their troops do not get this allowance. Subtract $1,805 62 from $7,606 06 and you have remaining $5,800 44.

Now, this bill does what? It gives to each major general who is serving in his proper capacity as commandant of a military division or of a department $7,000; and if he be upon a less command it gives him $6,500. Thus it takes, I admit, $606 06 away from the major general who is serving in this quasi civil capacity, in an administrative capacity or in a clerical capacity, or in a military capacity not in the immediate and direct command of troops; while it adds $1,200 in one case and $700 in another to the pay of those major generals who are actually doing the hard active duty of their profession with troops and with their commands. This explains why those officers who are with their troops and with their commands—constituting the large majority—are in favor of some such bill as this; while the present system receives the support of those who fill the easier, the quieter, the less dangerous positions, though my friend from Vermont thinks that there is greater risk of life here in Washington than in the field of deadly combat.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether the officers who are serving in the field do not have those very things which are allowed in the way of commutation to officers who are upon detached service.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will tell the gentleman. For fuel we subsisted principally on fence rails; sometimes we had green wood, when the soldiers could get it. For quarters, we had sometimes what the gentleman from Indiana describes—a number of fence rails leaned against a fence, with some straw thrown over; or, if not that, sometimes the canopy of heaven, sometimes a tent. Sometimes in a fort with a garrison, quarters may be supplied by the Government; but these are very different from the quarters which gentlemen get who have the good fortune to be at headquarters, or in the War Department, or on recruiting duty, and, as my friend from Indiana says, living under an arrangement by which their tavern bills are paid; for that is the whole of it.

Here again my friend and colleague on the committee [Mr. BLAINE] is exceedingly distressed on account of certain officers who might be ordered to some remote place in some distant mountainous region where wood might be $100 a cord. Now, does any man believe that any officer sent to any such place ever paid to warm himself $100 a cord for wood? The Government may have paid that sum; but the peculiarity of the matter is that this bill does not touch those who are on garrison duty in forts and who have their fuel paid for and their quarters supplied by the Government; and though it might cost the Government a considerable sum to warm the officer sent out to one of those distant posts, the officer, under the present system, saves all his commutation. He probably does not draw it at all, because at one of these outposts there is no occasion for him to buy wood at $100 a cord. That was a sort of fancy picture.

Besides, sir, we are not legislating here for a condition of things in which wood may be $100 a cord. We are legislating for the ordinary normal condition of the country in regard to prices. Now, it may be that when gold was first discovered in California the prices of subsistence in that region rose to such an extent that it was a hardship upon an officer, civil or military, to be sent out there at the compensation ordinarily paid to any other civil or military officer. It may be that the Government found it necessary in that extraordinary and exceptional case to interfere. So, I apprehend, the Government might do again. The difficulty is, these gentlemen want us to make them the exceptional case all the time.

How is this commutation for fuel and quarters? Gentlemen have talked something about it, and those who have not informed themselves would be led to suppose when an officer is ordered to headquarters at Washington he has to spend his money in warming the office he occupies, and to pay the rent for that office, and that it is necessary he should have it all back again in the way of commutation. No such thing. If General Augur be put on duty here he has offices provided for him in which all the business of the headquarters of this department is transacted. He has a house here with an office for himself, with all the rooms appurtenant thereto, all of which are paid for by the Government out of the Treasury of the United States. And every pound of coal and every stick of wood which is used by General Augur in warming his headquarters are paid for out of the Treasury.

What, then, is this commutation? It is not what it costs for the rent of offices for General Augur or what is paid for warming them. It is because the quartermaster certifies there are no quarters to be furnished to him, as quartermasters do on the slightest provocation, and he draws in cash as commutation his $1,800. He has the right under the law to do it. It goes for General Augur or Mrs. Augur, if there be one, or the little Augurs or gimlets, [great laughter;] in other words, it goes to take care of the family.

Take the case of an officer who is sent on recruiting duty to the village of my friend from Vermont, [Mr. WOODBRIDGE,] if it is possible that the gentleman, with all his polish and refinement, resides in a village.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I live in a city.

Mr. SCHENCK. No, he says he lives in a city. Well, I will take my rural friend from Iowa, [Mr. GRINNELL.]

Mr. GRINNELL. I live in the country.

Mr. SCHENCK. I beg pardon again. Perhaps some gentleman here lives in a village where now and then a man may be picked up by a recruiting officer. Now, if a recruiting officer be sent there he draws commutation for forage, commutation for fuel, commutation for quarters as though he were in Washington city, with this difference, that in villages they cut the rent per room down to nine dollars, whereas in this city it is put up to eighteen dollars a month, and in New York to twelve dollars. Nine dollars a month will get a good room in a village. This nine dollars a room is to be multiplied by two, three, or four, according to the number of rooms to which the officer, by reason of his rank, may be entitled.

These gentlemen are trying to raise an issue between this bill and the committee who reported it, and which I trust the House is going to sustain, and the gentlemen stationed here at Washington. It applies no more to gentlemen stationed at Washington than anywhere else. All over the country, wherever a man is stationed away from active duty with troops in the field or elsewhere, in garrison at a fort where fuel and quarters are provided, he gets his commutation for fuel and quarters whether he happens to be in the humblest village or the largest and most expensive city. My friend from New York [Mr. DAVIS] told me of a grievous case. It is the case of a gentleman who served in Missouri. It illustrates how men who sell themselves to be the slaves of the Government as officers in the Army are liable to be ordered around. This gentleman, serving with troops in Missouri, was suddenly, and without application on his own part, ordered to Washington city. It was hard to live here, and he could not sustain his family. Where had he been? In Missouri. Where was his family? Clifton, a village in Iowa.

While serving with troops he was content to let his little responsibilities and their mother stay at home in Clifton, Iowa. It was undoubtedly a hardship to sever those family ties by taking him away from all the endearments of home to the companionship of rude, rough men in the field, no longer to have his prattling children about his knee. But he stood it. When, however, he came to Washington he must needs have Mrs. Officer and the little Officers with him. It was very hard for him to live without them, I dare say. He could not expect to indulge in luxuries without paying for them. If he had left his family at Clifton, Iowa, however, and had come on here, he would have drawn, under the present system, his pay and commutation, with which he could have supported them in luxury, if they were only supported in comfort before in Iowa. And under the provisions of this bill he would get just as much as he got when he was serving in the field, for we make no difference against him, although we are unwilling to make any for him.

Mr. DAVIS. I would ask the gentleman whether it would not make a difference to an officer with a family twelve hundred miles away and with a family two or three hundred miles away, where he can occasionally visit them.

Mr. SCHENCK. I was interrupted while the gentleman was putting his question so that I did not hear it. He will therefore excuse me if I do not reply.

The allowances which I have referred to under the law are those that appear upon the surface. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. DAVIS,] if I am not mistaken, claims that there is no difficulty in understanding what officers are paid under the present law. I can only say that I do not quite understand it myself, and I have never yet found an officer cute enough to make out his own account. I thought I had shrewdness enough to make out my own, but I found that the paymaster's clerk gave me two or three hundred dollars more than I could calculate. I leaned as far as I could toward my own interest, and made out what I thought ought to satisfy myself, as men generally do in matters of money, but when the paymaster's clerk found I was entitled to more and forced it on me, of course I took it. [Laughter.] It requires all the astuteness of a Philadelphia lawyer—and therefore I wish my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] was on our side, [laughter]—to find out what an officer's pay really is under the present law.

But without going into all these changes in the law, how much is paid by one bill and how much by another—and my friend from Indiana [Mr. DUMONT] says the pay has doubled within his experience—I see there are other little perquisites and advantages of a legitimate and legal character, which, now that these gentlemen put me on the stand, I shall undertake to testify about. As for myself I am compelled to make the best disposition of commutation of fuel and quarters with my family when I come to Washington with my $3,000 a year. I am compelled to patronize the horse cars that run on the avenue, particularly when they give me a free ticket, instead of keeping my own carriage, because I have no allowance for forage. But when it comes to dealing with the fellows at the market they will not take less than about twenty-four cents a pound for particularly choice cuts of beef. But my neighbor in the Army over the way gets his for about ten or twelve cents. Why? Because under the present law—and we do not change it in this bill—officers are authorized to purchase commissary stores at cost price from the Government without taking into account the cost of transportation any more than the wastage, the cost of killing, or the interest on the money invested, or any of the other contingencies which enter into the actual cost before the retail butcher adds his profit on the top of the whole.

Mr. BLAINE. I want to ask the gentleman whether or not this bill, as it now stands, does not continue this forage just as before.

Mr. SCHENCK. Precisely.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I would ask whether the bill as amended does not give the right to draw commissary stores as before.

Mr. SCHENCK. Precisely.

Mr. BLAINE. I would ask the gentleman whether this bill does not give officers the right at some posts to draw fuel in the same way that the present law does.

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. That is just the way in which I understand it, and the gentleman has modified his bill so as to give the longevity ration. It also continues the abuse of charges on commissary stores, just as now. It provides also for a continuance of the abuse in reference to fuel; so that a man ordered to the base of the Rocky mountains can draw his fuel at the rate of $100 per cord. The bill also contains the abuse in regard to forage; so that the committee has given way in regard to these four particulars.

Mr. SCHENCK. I congratulate myself, sir, that the gentleman from Maine has come over to my side. This bill is precisely what the law is now; and I expect that he will vote for it. He said that he was going to ask me a pertinent question. Well, sir, I have answered so many impertinent questions that I expected something pertinent to the subject this time; but I can make no answer to such a question. This bill proposes to readjust and modify the whole system and get rid of the greatest abuses. His argument is that we should do nothing at all.

Now, in regard to this matter of the purchase of commissary stores, I say that the amendment sent to me by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE], and which I accepted and offered to the House in his behalf, does not alter the present law at all; nor did the bill as originally introduced alter it.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, yes.

Mr. SCHENCK. Oh, no, sir. The gentleman would not understand it. An opportunity is still left to officers of purchasing stores for themselves. The original bill did not interfere with that provision; but in order to make it perfectly clear, to "make assurance doubly sure," I have put into the bill the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE].

Mr. BLAINE. What I meant to say was, that the very abuses upon which the gentleman has been commenting in reference to commissary and to forage are continued in his own bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir; I beg the gentleman's pardon; I was not doing that at all; I was referring to these matters merely as an illustration.

But, sir, in addition to these things which appear upon the face, and which run through all the different grades of the Army, there are other advantages which these officers have, who are so much whined about, and which we, so far from taking from them, as it is said, this bill really gives them.

I say that a major general, in addition to his pay of $3,000—and it is the same with officers of other grades—gets an advantage in the purchase of his beef and other articles of consumption. For instance, if I want tea or coffee, beef or flour, I must buy it at retail prices at the baker's or the grocer's. But officers of the Army can get these articles at the commissary stores at commissary prices. They do it now, and they can do it under this bill.

Mr. BLAINE. The first section of this bill, as originally introduced, was in these words, "that from and after the 30th September, instead of the pay, allowances, and emoluments of every kind, except as hereinafter provided, the following shall be the yearly compensation." Now, will the gentleman pretend to say that this is not an "emolument" or "allowance," the privilege of buying articles of consumption at a low price? The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] admitted it, and at his instance the gentleman from Ohio has reinserted that very provision in the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. If so, then I have this advantage over my friend from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE:] if I am convinced whether by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] or any one else, that I have committed an error, I admit it. But has he ever been open to any such conviction? No, sir, never. [Laughter.] These are privileges and advantages which we did not take away from these officers; which we never intended to take away from them. But in order to remove all doubt about the matter, we have consented that an amendment shall be put in declaring that we do not intend to take them away.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] this question: whether a colonel at Fortress Monroe, in command of the fortress, would not under this bill receive $3,500 a year, with his fuel and quarters; and whether a colonel in the same branch of the service on duty here in Washington would not receive but $3,000 a year, and out of that be obliged to pay for his fuel and forage.

Mr. SCHENCK. The pay of the colonel would depend upon the duty he performs. If he should happen to be performing the duties of a position which gave him $3,500, he would get it, of course. If he goes, however, where he has less responsibility; if he is assigned to other duty, for instance as a clerk, as many of these colonels, and lieutenant colonels, and majors, and captains, and even generals, too, are serving in Washington, he would then get just what a member of Congress gets, and no more. Now, if my friend from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] can persuade himself that he is not superior to a second-class clerk, then I will give up the point.

But I have been interrupted so often I am afraid my remarks will appear very disjointed when they appear in the Globe to-morrow. I will now try and conclude what I have to say.

Now, we leave to these officers all these advantages and privileges of which I have spoken, because we are willing they shall be paid, and well paid. And they are well paid. I insist upon it that the officers of the Army as a class get higher pay than any other class of officers in the service of the Government. As I have said before, I do not think officers of the Navy, even making all allowances for prize money, have as much pay as they should receive; certainly they are not paid in proportion to the officers of the Army. And what has been the consequence? Despairing of getting an increase of their pay, they have managed by some ingenious device of legislation to get through Congress, some two or three weeks ago, a bill repealing the statute which provided that none of these allowances should be given to officers of the Navy. And the moment they got that through the Secretary of the Navy added thirty-three and one third per cent., in lieu of these commutations, to the salary of every officer of the Navy who might be ordered to perform the services indicated; thus becoming departmental law instead of congressional law. Now, did the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] know that he was voting for any such measure? Did many others here know anything about it? Did they know they were voting to add thirty-three and one third per cent. to a considerable class of the officers of the Navy through the action of the Secretary of the Navy? I can only say I did not. Something came here from the Committee on Naval Affairs. I was a great deal absorbed, as members know very well, with military matters, and I voted for it, supposing it to be all right. And the first knowledge I had of it was the issuing of this order by the Secretary of the Navy.

Now, the object of this bill is to take the legislation upon this matter in regard to officers of the Army into our own hands, and make the law say just what they shall receive for their compensation when performing this, that, or the other class of duties. The object is to have this matter adjusted by law, to leave no discretion to the heads of bureaus or the Department, or to others; to prevent these officers from becoming dependent upon these heads, and place them in a position where they may be ordered to this duty for one year, to another duty another year, and thus give all a chance, and not have one particular class of officers put in one particular place and kept at one particular class of duties all the time, as they now are, until, like old hulks in port, the barnacles grow all over them. We propose to take these officers out of their snug harbors, out of these little sea-water coves, and run them up into the interior where the fresh water can reach them, and then by every principle of natural philosophy the barnacles will fall off and they will become clearer and lighter for duty. I do not want a system which will encourage men to be kept in places until they are moss-grown, until lichens are formed upon their legs and backs. On the contrary, I would keep them stirring; I would keep them clear and bright, ready for action whenever and wherever the country may need their services, whether in camp, in the field, in garrison, in Washington, on recruiting service, or wherever else their services may be desired. And in this way only will you have the most effective Army.

Now, I am not to be charged with being an enemy of the Army, an enemy of regular officers, an enemy of West Point, or anything else because I am for reforming these abuses and dispensing with a vicious system of this kind. I hold that he is the best friend of the Army and of the country who is in favor of correcting whatever may be wrong, no matter how long the evil has existed, nor how great it has grown; who is in favor of getting rid of it whenever a fitting opportunity arises for doing so.

I hope we shall now have a vote upon this bill.

The previous question having been seconded and the main question ordered, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill, Mr. TAYLOR called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 83, nays 40, not voting 58; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Brandegee, Bromwell, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cullom, Deffrees, Delano, Dodge, Donnelly, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Seafeld, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Spalding, Taber, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Ward, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—85.

NAYS—Messrs. Blaine, Boutwell, Boyer, Chanler, Conkling, Davis, Dawson, Driggs, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hogan, Hooper, Hotchkiss, James M. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, and Winfield—58.

So the bill was passed.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. NIBLACK said: On this bill I have paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. STEVENS. If he were here he would vote for the bill, while I should vote against it.

Mr. ALLISON said: I desire to state that on this question the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. INGERSOLL, is paired with the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. HARRIS. The gentleman from Illinois, if he were here, would vote in the affirmative, while the gentleman from Maryland would vote in the negative.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. DUMONT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPALDING presented the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 37) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1867, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the third, fifth, and sixth amendments, and agree to the same.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in line two of the said amendment strike out the word "ten" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five," and the Senate agree to the same.

W. P. FESSENDEN,

JOHN CONNEDY,

GEORGE READ RIDDLE,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

R. P. SPALDING,

S. M. CULLOM,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is a joint resolution (H. R. No. 63) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. This resolution was introduced by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that this joint resolution be indefinitely postponed, for the reason that the constitutional amendment already passed by the House covers the whole subject-matter.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVAL DEPOT AT LEAGUE ISLAND.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is a bill (H. R. No. 452) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to accept League Island, in the river Delaware, for naval purposes, on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] is entitled to the floor.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. DELANO, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That all claimants whose applications have received an adverse report from the Committee of Claims have leave to withdraw their respective papers, leaving copies thereof.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendment to House bill No. 459, granting a pension to Anna E. Ward.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. DELANO, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, reported adversely on the following cases; which were laid upon the table:

John Van Cott and Samuel Malin, of Utah; resolution relating to claims for horses, &c., impressed into the United States military service in Indiana and Ohio; Ezekiel Sarwin, and others, of Massachusetts; John M. Stanley, of the District of Columbia; Newton Smith, of Kentucky; Lieutenant John E. Abel, first New York artillery, of New York; House resolution No. 173, for the relief of Lewis J. Candiff, of Missouri; Horace E. Dummick, of Missouri; L. O. Mercer, of Maryland; E. Marquis, of Indiana; Harriet E. Davis, of Missouri; citizens of Wrightsville, Pennsylvania; Edmund Briggs, and others, of Massachusetts; House resolution No. 49, to authorize certain credits by Internal Revenue Commissioner to R. McCoy, of Maryland; Charles J. Michaelson, of West Virginia; A. A. Bradley, of Georgia; Sophia Shilenger, of Maryland; Harriet Beard, widow, &c., of New York.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that indefinite leave of absence be granted to my colleague, [Mr. INGERSOLL.] He was in the House previous to the vote on the bill concerning the pay of the Army, when he had to take the train for home.

The motion was agreed to.

J. J. FERRIS.

On motion of the SPEAKER, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the pension papers in the case of J. J. Ferris, as it was provided for under the general law.

The SPEAKER stated that the unfinished business was the report in reference to League Island; and that if the House should adjourn it would come up after the reading of the Journal to-morrow, and be the order of business before the House until disposed of.

And then, on motion of Mr. KELLEY, (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. ANCONA: Letter of Thomas M. Dukehart, a first assistant engineer United States Navy, on the subject of rank of assistant engineers in the United States Navy.

Also, letters of Michael Zeltzer, Isaac Eekert, president of Farmers' National Bank; Isaac R. Fisher, William Arnolds, G. A. Nicholls, and others, directors and stockholders of said bank, remonstrating against the passage of an amendment proposed to the forty-first section of the national currency act.

By Mr. DAVIS: The petition of John C. Millen in behalf of the German Evangelical Lutheran congregation of St. John, praying an act to incorporate the same.

By Mr. HOGAN: A petition of 136 citizens and marble workers of Muscatine, Iowa, praying for increased duties on finished marble.

Also, a petition of 235 marble workers and stone masons of St. Louis, Missouri, praying for increase of duty on wrought marble.

By Mr. KELLEY: The memorial of officers of the different historical and literary societies of the United States and the State of Pennsylvania, praying Congress to so modify the existing laws as to permit postage on documents, and books forwarded to the societies above named, to be paid on delivery; and that the present rate of postage charged on certain described papers and documents be reduced fifty per cent. below the present charges to said societies.

Also, a memorial of 373 citizens of Pennsylvania, praying Congress not to restore any State that has rebelled and warred against the United States, to its place and power as a governing partner in the Union till adequate security has been obtained against its renewing the attempt to secede.

By Mr. RAYMOND: The petition of Mrs. Catherine N. Croft, widow of Colonel Marriot N. Croft, asking compensation for the services of her late husband during the war against the rebellion.

Also, a protest of a large number of inhabitants of Salt Lake City, against setting off the west degree of Utah to Nevada.

Also, petition of John B. Ennis and others, for an equalization of bounties.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 6, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SENATOR FROM FLORIDA.

Mr. JOHNSON. I beg leave to present the credentials of Wilkinson Call, elected a Senator to the United States from the State of Florida for the unexpired term ending the 3d of March, 1869. I move that they lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 101) directing the removal of certain obstructions from the public square known as Market square, in the city of Washington, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 143) making an appropriation for the repair of the Potomac bridge, reported it without amendment.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of William Crosswell, praying that he may be allowed a pension, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 354) for the relief of William Crosswell. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 616) for the relief of Lucinda Gates, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 103) in relation to the pay and accounts of collectors of internal revenue who have failed to take the required oath of office; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to hear that resolution read.

The Secretary read the resolution, which proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust the accounts and pay the salaries of all officers and employés of the Treasury Department who have been heretofore actually engaged in collecting revenue within the States lately in insurrection, such adjustment and payment to be made with and to each officer or employé who has failed to take the oath of office required by law whenever his successor has been duly appointed and lawfully qualified, and not otherwise.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 355) to establish certain post roads; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

VISITORS TO NAVAL SCHOOL.

Mr. GRIMES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to the Senate a copy of the report of the Board of Visitors to the late annual examination of the Naval School.

REFERENCE OF A BILL.

Mr. NYE. Yesterday I introduced a bill (S. No. 352) granting to A. Sutro the right of way and granting other privileges to aid in the construction of a draining and exploring tunnel to the Comstock lode, in the State of Nevada, and had it referred to the Committee on Public Lands. The Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] suggested at that time that the proper reference would be to the Committee on Mines and Mining; and on reflection I have come to that conclusion. I therefore move that the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of that bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The motion was agreed to.

ALEXIS GARDAPIER.

Mr. HARRIS. I move take up for consideration Senate bill No. 308, which has been reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 308) confirming the title of Alexis Gardapier to a certain tract of land in the county of Brown, and State of Wisconsin, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to confirm the claim of Alexis Gardapier to a certain tract of land situate in the county of Brown, Wisconsin, described in the report of the commissioners to examine titles and claims in the Territory of Michigan as "lying on the west bank of Fox river, and more particularly known as being a vacant strip lying between a tract No. 1, confirmed to Jacques Porlier, on the north, and tract No. 2, confirmed to Louis Grignon, on the south, commencing at low-water mark, and running west eighty arpents, and in width three arpents on the aforesaid river;" and the bill also directs the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue a patent therefor, which is to be recorded in the office of the register of deeds for Brown county, for the benefit of the heirs or assigns of Alexis Gardapier.

The Committee on Private Land Claims reported the bill with two amendments. The first amendment was in line fourteen, after the word "authorized," to insert "to cause the said tract of land to be surveyed in the same manner as other private claims to lands in Green Bay have been surveyed."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line seventeen, after the words "to issue a patent therefor," to insert "according to the provisions of the fifth section of the act of Congress approved February 21, 1823, entitled 'An act to revive and continue in force certain acts for the adjustment of certain land claims in the Territory of Michigan.'

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

SLOOP-OF-WAR IDAHO.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of joint resolution No. 99.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 99) for the relief of Paul S. Forbes, under his contract from the Navy Department for building and furnishing the steam screw sloop-of-war Idaho, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It authorizes the Secretary of the Navy, as in his judgment he deems best, either to accept the steam screw sloop-of-war Idaho of the contractor, Paul S. Forbes, at the contract price of $600,000, or to transfer the vessel to the contractor, on the latter giving bond, with good and sufficient security, to be approved by the Secretary of the Navy, to refund to the Department, within six months from the date of such transfer, all advances of money made by the Government to him on account of the construction and equipment of the vessel.

Mr. RAMSEY. This case was considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs, and they came unanimously to the conclusion embodied in the resolution, and have made a report in the case, which, if read, will give as clear an account of the whole matter as I can possibly give.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs on this question is asked for, and it will be read if there be no objection.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. RAMSEY on the 31st of May:

The Committee of Naval Affairs of the Senate, to whom was referred the petition of Paul S. Forbes, praying for relief under his contract with the Navy Department, to build and furnish the sloop-of-war Idaho, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

The papers in this case show that on the 22d day of May, 1863, Paul S. Forbes entered into contract with the Navy Department to build a steam screw sloop-of-war, and to deliver her to the Government fully completed within a period of nine months from the date of contract, which vessel he also guaranteed should have a capacity of speed equal to fifteen knots an hour. The contract price for the vessel was the sum of $600,000.

It appears that instead of the vessel being delivered to the Government in nine months from the date of contract, she is not yet completely finished. And it further appears that the vessel fails also in the requisite of speed, and is not capable of making the fifteen knots an hour required by the terms of the contract.

The Navy Department admits, and your committee fully believe, that Mr. Forbes was actuated by patriotic motives in entering into this contract. He is a merchant and ship-owner, and has had a large number of steamers built for the merchant marine, and with marked success. At a time when the exigencies of the country demanded a large increase of the Navy, and when every effort in that direction was an effort for the public good, Mr. Forbes, fully believing that he would thereby do the country a service, came forward with his proposition to build the aforesaid vessel. He did not expect to make any money thereby, but he believed that he could, with his experience and energy, furnish the Navy with a superior vessel in a brief period, and thus assist the country materially in the conflict with her foes. The Secretary of the Navy, in a communication to the committee upon this subject, says upon this point, "That Mr. Forbes did not engage in this work from mercenary or pecuniary motives, I have always believed." "He persuaded himself, or was persuaded by others, that he could, in a brief time, build a vessel possessing superior qualities to any which the Navy Department could build."

Your committee are informed, and believe, that the vessel in question has cost Mr. Forbes some three hundred thousand dollars above the contract price, or some nine hundred thousand dollars in all. They are also informed that, with the exception of the engine, the vessel is well built, and that she is fully worth to the Government, notwithstanding the deficiencies of her engines, the amount of the contract price. Your committee, therefore, in view of this fact, and in consideration of the patriotic motives which prompted Mr. Forbes to enter into the contract, and also in consideration of the fact that the Government is enabled to profit by the knowledge and experience derived from such experiments, feel warranted in recommending, as they do, that Mr. Forbes be released from his contract for the construction and furnishing of the steam screw sloop-of-war Idaho, and that the Navy Department be authorized to purchase the vessel, when completed, at a cost not exceeding the contract price. Or if, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy, the interests of the Government may be better subserved, he is empowered to transfer to the said Paul S. Forbes the said vessel, when the said Forbes shall give good and sufficient guarantee that he will refund to the Government, within six months from the date of said transfer, all moneys advanced by the Government to him on his contract for the building and furnishing of the said vessel. Your committee, therefore, report the accompanying joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to inquire of the Senator who reports this resolution whether there is any objection to striking out the alternative proposition which authorizes the Government to purchase this naval vessel at $600,000, so as to provide simply that the Government may transfer all its claims to the vessel and release Mr. Forbes from his contract on his giving bond and security to refund the money that has been advanced by the Government. I presume we have no use for this vessel now, and it is just paying out $600,000 to a patriotic citizen, as it seems, for a vessel that we do not need. If he can make any use of her, and is willing to accept that alternative, and the Government can get back the funds it has advanced after waiting six months for them and allowing him the use of them in the mean time, perhaps that will be satisfactory to him and save the Government $600,000 for a vessel which of course we do not need now. We have more vessels-of-war now than we have any use for in time of peace, I suppose.

Mr. RAMSEY. If the Senator from Illinois carefully reads the resolution he will find that it is entirely in the option of the Secretary of the Navy whether to take this vessel, the hull being said to be worth the money, or to turn her over to Mr. Forbes on his returning to the Government the money advanced.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Have we any use for the vessel?

Mr. RAMSEY. I do not know. That is left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy. It may be possible that for this particular vessel he may have use, but surely he will not take her unless she is required for the public service. There is nothing obligatory on him in this resolution. It is at his discretion. If the Navy Department does not want the hull of this vessel, which is very good and worth the money, of course the Secretary will let Paul Forbes take her on his giving security to return to the Government the money already advanced. I think the resolution, in its present shape, is in no way objectionable.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to ask the member of the Committee on Naval Affairs in charge of this resolution, the Senator from Minnesota, whether, when this matter was considered by the Naval Committee, they consulted the Navy Department, and if so, what the conclusions of that Department were. This vessel, I think, was built under a special contract, the object of which was to introduce a new system of engineering applicable to the machinery of steam vessels, which is found, I believe, not to be what it was claimed it would be.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Committee on Naval Affairs were informed that Paul Forbes was willing to take the vessel off the hands of the Government and return to the Government all the money that had been advanced, some three hundred thousand dollars. I think that is about all that is substantially provided for in the resolution. There is no necessity on the part of the Secretary of the Navy to accept this vessel unless it is entirely agreeable to do so. If he does not want her, if the vessel is of no use to the Government, of course he will not accept her.

Mr. CONNESS. I asked the honorable Senator for certain information. If he is in possession of it, I should like to have it; if not, of course we cannot expect it. That was as to the views of the Navy Department upon this transaction.

Mr. GRIMES. I am not aware that the Committee on Naval Affairs have solicited the opinion of the Navy Department as to whether such a resolution as this should pass Congress or not, and I do not know that it is necessary that we should do it. The question before that committee was, what is due to the Government and what is due to Mr. Forbes, standing in the relation that he does to the Government? And we thought that the committee and Congress could decide that as well as the Secretary of the Navy; and I think the Secretary of the Navy would concur with us in that opinion.

The history of this ship is somewhat instructive. It will be remembered that at the commencement of the war we had no fast steamships. All the steam vessels of the Navy had auxiliary steam power, only to be used under emergencies, and the average rate of speed of the fastest of the vessels at that time was about eight knots. A clamor was at once raised (in consequence of the attempts to run the blockade established on our coast) against the Navy Department, assigning as a reason that the Navy Department had been exceedingly derelict in its duty of securing to the Government fast steamships. Among the persons who were most clamorous against the Government was a gentleman in New York by the name of Dickerson who was connected with several patents, among which was Sickles's cut-off, and who, although a lawyer, professed to be, and to some extent is, well acquainted with the theory of steam-engines. He had connected his cut-off with some paddle-wheel steamers belonging to the house of Russell & Co., in China, to run upon the Chinese waters, of which house Paul S. Forbes is one of the members, and is the active agent for them in this country, I believe. Mr. Forbes was induced, upon the representations of Mr. Dickerson, to believe that he could construct a vessel that would exceed in speed any vessel belonging to the Navy or that could be built by the Navy; and at a time when there was a great deal of excitement on the subject he came to the Navy Department and proposed to build a vessel of certain dimensions that should draw a certain amount of water, I do not now remember how much, and carry a certain amount of armament, and should steam at the rate of fifteen knots an hour. He entered into that contract. He was to receive for this $600,000, which was to be paid in installments. Of that amount $550,000 has already been paid.

The hull of this vessel is a most excellent one, as I understand, and as the committee are informed. It was planned by Steers, of New York. When this question was before the Senate at the last session upon the point whether or not we would make an advance to Mr. Forbes exceeding the amount that was allowed to be advanced by the Secretary of the Navy according to the stipulations of the contract, we were informed at the Navy Department that the hull of the vessel and the engine if taken out and used as old iron would be equal in value to the amount that we would advance by that bill; that is to say, $550,000. The vessel has been completed and has had two trial trips, and instead of making the speed that Mr. Forbes contracted for and which he anticipated, as did his engineer, Mr. Dickerson, and instead of beating the Navy Department vessels, it is only claimed by her friends that she makes somewhere in the neighborhood of nine knots an hour. The engineers of the Navy Department proper say that she does not make that much speed, but I believe it is not claimed that she does make more than that. Now, it is proposed that the Government take the vessel at $600,000, and the committee were unanimously of opinion that that was a fair proposition to Mr. Forbes and to the Government. It is my conviction, and such was the opinion of the committee, and I am satisfied that is the opinion also of the Navy Department, that the Government would not be injured in any regard by accepting it on those terms; but Mr. Forbes does not want to let the Government have her at $600,000. He wants the privilege of selling her, and thinks he can sell her to foreign parties or the representatives of foreign Governments for a considerable sum over $600,000, for she has cost him $350,000 in excess of the amount that he received under the contract. Hence the alternative in the resolution, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy, if he sees fit—leaving it discretionary with him—to allow Mr. Forbes to take the vessel, he paying back to the Government the amount that has been paid by the Government to him. It has been intimated by the Senator from Illinois, I believe, that we have no necessity for this vessel.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I inquired if we had.

Mr. GRIMES. We have not any immediate necessity for her. We have not any actual, immediate necessity for any vessel-of-war hardly, or but for very few; but the theory upon which we proceed is that we shall have vessels-of-war ready to hand in case of any great national emergency occurring. I am satisfied, from what I know, that the engines can be taken out of the hull of this vessel and new engines substituted in place of them, and she would be a most efficient and valuable vessel-of-war; and the engines that are now in her could be taken out and remodeled, and used for very valuable purposes by the Government.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Iowa if he, as chairman of the Naval Committee, if this were a new question, would now recommend the construction of such a vessel. I know that the policy of the Government is to have a navy, to some extent, in time of peace, to be ready for war; but would he think it advisable, with the Navy we have on hand, to recommend the construction of a vessel of this class at this time, if she were not already built?

Mr. GRIMES. That is a pretty difficult question to decide, and I do not know that I am called upon to decide it under the present circumstances. We have got to keep up wooden ships; they are much cheaper as cruisers, and they have got to be used for that purpose; and if I was going to build wooden ships, I do not know of any vessel that would be more efficient for the purpose for which we want to use them than this kind of vessels. I do not think, with the lights now before me, that I would put such an engine into her as there is in this vessel. The hull of this vessel is an excellent one. The hull alone has cost, I suppose, two or three hundred thousand dollars. That the engine is defective I have not any doubt; but it is my conviction that if her engine was taken out, and broken up and used, as portions of it might be for other purposes, and a new engine put into her, she would be an excellent, valuable, and efficient vessel, and would not cost the Government more than it would cost to build a vessel similar in design to this for the purposes of the Navy. I do not think that the Government would lose anything, therefore, in taking her off Mr. Forbes's hands; but Mr. Forbes does not want to let the Government have her. She has cost him $350,000 more than the contract price, and it is to favor Mr. Forbes, if he cannot make a satisfactory arrangement with the Secretary of the Navy, that this alternative is inserted in the resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As Mr. Forbes seems to want this vessel and has lost a good deal of money upon her, and even the chairman of the Naval Committee is not satisfied to advise us that he would undertake the construction of such a vessel at this time, I will move to strike out this alternative proposition so that the joint resolution will read:

That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to transfer the steam screw sloop-of-war Idaho to the contractor, Paul S. Forbes, on his giving bond, with good and sufficient security, to be approved by the Secretary of the Navy, to refund to the Department, within six months from the date of such transfer, all advances of money made by the Government to the said Paul S. Forbes on account of the construction and equipment of said vessel.

He seems to have been a patriotic citizen, and was engaged in this undertaking from patriotic motives, and now he thinks he can save himself by selling this vessel, and I would not, for one, desire to hold him to the contract, as I think the Government can have no immediate need for the vessel. I therefore propose this amendment so as simply to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to release him from his contract and transfer to him the claim of the Government to the vessel on his refunding the money advanced in six months. I make that motion, to strike out the alternative proposition.

Mr. NYE. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Illinois whether the Secretary of the Navy does not possess the power, aside from this resolution, of accepting the ship if he pleases. The object of this resolution was to give Mr. Forbes this alternative, as he had lost some three hundred and fifty thousand dollars any way in an experiment which has proved in the British navy to be entirely successful. I think the great trouble was that he attempted to make it too economical a ship, and in that way so lessened its power as to make it less efficient; but the principle upon which that power is applied has been recently applied in the British navy with great success. I hope the resolution will not be amended. It can certainly work no hardship, for the Secretary of the Navy would have the right to accept the vessel if he pleased without any law. We desire to give the Secretary the alternative, to allow him to take her if he chooses, or to transfer her to Mr. Forbes, if he has a prospect of selling her so as to save himself from the loss that he has incurred. I hope the Senator from Illinois will not insist on his amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY. There is some little variance in the character of the vessel from the vessel described in the contract. Her execution does not exactly come up to what was stipulated for in the contract. It is possible, for that reason, that the Secretary of the Navy might not be empowered, without some legislation, to accept the vessel. But suppose, for a moment, that Paul S. Forbes, for some reason beyond his control, was unable to accept the last of these propositions, and return to the Government the money advanced to him, and at the same time the Government really desired to take the vessel, why should they be debarred from doing so? I am satisfied that the committee, in the resolution which we have reported here, have presented a method of settlement which the Government ought at once to accept. If they do not, this thing will be presented here from year to year to the Government, and this opportunity will be lost to the Government in all probability.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There seems to be very little basis, then, for the assertion that Mr. Forbes is anxious not to have the Government take this vessel.

Mr. RAMSEY. I have not said so. I said that by possibility such might be the case, and I think the Government ought to protect itself.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That was given as a reason, I supposed, for the passage of the resolution, that this was a very valuable vessel, and the Government was making something by the contract, and Mr. Forbes did not want the Government to take it. Now, when we propose that the Government do not take it, upon whom there would be no obligation whatever to take it, I imagine, at this time, and when it is proposed to let Mr. Forbes take the vessel just as he wants to do, the objection is interposed that that may not satisfy Mr. Forbes, that after all he may not be able to take it. I was a little apprehensive of that, I confess. I have no doubt in the world, from the intimations thrown out by the Senator from Minnesota, that the Government of the United States will get the vessel at $600,000, if you leave in the first proposition; but if it really be true that Mr. Forbes is to be damaged thereby, let him have the benefit of his vessel. That is the way the statement was made. Certainly we shall not be troubled with this thing year after year, as the Senator from Minnesota supposes, if Mr. Forbes really does not want us to take the vessel. There is no danger of that.

Mr. RAMSEY. A misfortune might occur to him between this and to-morrow by which he would lose the ability to refund the money already advanced by the Government. That is possible. I have no doubt about his honest desire on the subject, or of his ability at this time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think the Government of the United States, from the intimations we have had here, can have no particular use for this vessel at this time, and in my judgment it will be a great saving if Mr. Forbes can dispose of her. I have suggested the amendment to the Senate, and if they choose to do so they can vote it down.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read at the desk.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was in line four, after the word "authorized," to strike out the words "as in his judgment he deems best, either to accept," and to insert the words "to transfer;" in line five to strike out the word "of" after the word "Idaho" and insert the word "to;" and in line six, after the word "Forbes," to strike out the words "at the contract price of $600,000, or transfer the said vessel to the said contractor, on the latter" and to insert the words "on his;" so that the resolution will read:

That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to transfer the steam sloop-of-war Idaho to the contractor, Paul S. Forbes, on his giving bond, with good and sufficient security, to be approved by the Secretary of the Navy, to refund to the Department, within six months from the date of such transfer, all advances of money made by the Government to the said Paul S. Forbes, on account of the construction and equipment of said vessel.

Mr. CRAGIN. There is one point in this case to which I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Illinois and others as a reason why his amendment should not prevail. The Government has already paid Mr. Forbes $550,000, or within $50,000 of the contract price. Now, suppose Mr. Forbes should conclude not to take this vessel, how is the Government going to get back this $550,000? Had they not better take the vessel and advance the remaining $50,000, if necessary, rather than lose all they have paid on the vessel?

Mr. TRUMBULL. They will have the vessel.

Mr. CRAGIN. You propose not to permit them to take it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is no obligation on the part of the Government to take it, but this resolution proposes that it may be transferred to him on his giving good and sufficient security to refund the advances made to him, which would hold him. I suppose there can be no trouble about that. The $50,000, perhaps, would be a sufficient margin to enable Mr. Forbes to dispose of the vessel. I have not looked into the statutes on the subject, but I can have no reason to doubt that the Government would have a lien on the vessel for the amount of these advances; that nothing could be done with it so as to deprive the Government of its claim.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not put this case on any such ground as that. Mr. Forbes is able to refund this money to the United States Government; but here are the facts: as a patriotic citizen, he undertook, without any particular regard to the amount the vessel was going to cost him, to make a ship of certain dimensions and with a certain speed. He made her. She cost him $350,000 more than he contracted for. We have paid him $550,000 of the $600,000 we agreed to pay if she should make the speed he agreed. She is a good vessel; and we propose to take the vessel, not paying him the amount that he expended over and above the contract price, but simply to take the vessel upon the terms we agreed to take her, and to forgive him for not making the speed he undertook to make.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The time within which she was to be completed was not complied with.

Mr. GRIMES. She was not to be completed until about the time the war was ended.

Mr. TRUMBULL. A year ago.

Mr. GRIMES. We simply forgive him, for and in consideration of the $350,000 that she has cost him in excess of the amount we agreed to pay him, for not having been able to bring her to the speed he contracted for; that is all.

The amendment was rejected.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

PRINTING OF A COMMUNICATION.

Mr. CONNESS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five hundred extra copies of the communication of the Postmaster General, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 23d of February, information relative to the establishment of a telegraph in connection with the postal system, be printed for the use of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to call up the unfinished business of the morning hour of yesterday, being the bill (S. No. 282) to reorganize the clerical force of the Department of the Interior, and for other purposes.

Mr. CONNESS. When this bill was up yesterday morning, the last action had upon it was in the nature of a motion—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will give way to allow a message to be received from the House of Representatives.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 37) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 77) for the relief of Ambrose L. Goodrich and Nathan Cornish, for carrying the United States mail from Boise City to Idaho City, in the Territory of Idaho, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHN H. FARQUHAR of Indiana, Mr. DONALD C. McRUE of California, and Mr. WILLIAM E. FINCK of Ohio, managers at the same on its part.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (H. R. No. 450) to reduce and establish the pay of officers and to regulate the pay of soldiers of the Army of the United States, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled bill (S. No. 203) to enable the New York and Montana Iron Mining and Manufacturing Company to purchase a certain amount of the public lands not now in market; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

PAY OF THE ARMY AND NAVY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CONNESS. I give way to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate order to be printed the bill (H. R. No. 450) to reduce and establish the pay of officers and to regulate the pay of soldiers of the Army of the United States, and upon that motion I wish to say a single word.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I hope the honorable Senator will not take up the remaining ten minutes of the morning hour. I want to dispose of this bill. The Senator from California has the floor.

Mr. GRIMES. When some subject was under consideration yesterday some animadversions were made upon the passage of a law here authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to allow a commutation to officers of the Navy. The Committee on Naval Affairs are as conscious as anybody can be that this system of commutation is a vicious system, and it was assented to by them very much with a view of bringing about a reform in this particular. A bill has now passed the House of Representatives reducing and fixing the pay of officers of the Army, and has just been sent to the Senate. It has been said, and I understand that some Senators entertain the opinion, that the officers of the Navy now receive much higher pay than officers of the Army. I simply desire to say, in behalf of the Naval Committee, for whom I am authorized to speak this morning on this subject, and in behalf of the Navy, that they will most gladly accept as the pay of the Navy this reduced bill fixing the pay of the Army for corresponding grades, and I trust that when the Committee on Military Affairs shall report back this military bill they will attach to it a section which shall give to officers of the Navy of corresponding rank the same fixed, precise pay, without commutations, that is provided for officers of the Army, and they will most gladly accept it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be printed; of course, when it shall have been referred to a committee.

CLERKS IN THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Now I must insist on going on with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CONNESS. I shall occupy but a very short time in what I have to say. I was proceeding to observe that the last action had on this bill yesterday was in the nature of a motion made by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NYE] to postpone its further consideration that it might be ascertained whether the so-called "departmental club," of which he gave us the history and proceedings, were to be benefited by the passage of this bill. To that view of the case I desire now to address a very few remarks. This is a proposition to reorganize—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that the bill is not yet before the Senate. The question is on the motion that the Senate proceed to its consideration. The Senate has not yet decided to take up the bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I presumed there was no objection to that.

Mr. WILSON, and others. Let the bill be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California addressed the Chair before the Chair had an opportunity to put the question to the Senate. Of course the Chair supposed that he wished to be heard on the question whether the bill should be taken up or not.

Mr. CONNESS. Not at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion before the Senate is to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 282) to reorganize the clerical force of the Department of the Interior, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. CONNESS. I was proceeding to say that this was a bill for the reorganization of the clerical force of the Interior Department, a Department that it appears comes under the condemnation of this so-called "departmental club" in their proceedings, and therefore if it were proper to take any notice in the Senate of the United States (which I do not admit) of the proceedings of this so-called departmental club, there is no propriety in the position taken by the honorable Senator from Nevada, so far as this bill is concerned, growing out of those proceedings. It is perhaps a matter to be regretted, in behalf of human nature, that any part of society, when drained to its dregs, should develop such a quality of dregs as the organization and proceedings of this "departmental club," so called, have given us. It is to be regretted, in behalf of human nature, that our kind should at any time show, and jump so quickly to show, subservency to the source of power, no matter what that source may be. I rise as much to say a word in defense of the President of the United States from any implied aspersion that may grow out of the proceedings, as they have been brought to the notice of the Senate, of this so-called "departmental club," as for any other purpose. I either mistake the character of the President of the United States or such proceedings as those from employes of the Government but excite his contempt. I cannot think otherwise. I do not say so in compliment to the President, but I believe it must be so. The practice of organizing these clubs composed of men in the employ of the Government and subject to be dismissed from day to day, and complimenting their superiors, is one more honored in the breach than in the observance, and I only regret that their proceedings have been brought to the notice of the Senate at all. I would not honor them with notice; they do not deserve it in any sense whatever; and that their proceedings, so discreditable to themselves, whoever they may be, should be made any excuse for any line of action on our part, in our legislation, is not, I hope, to be considered at all.

I believe that this bill should pass; and I accept what was so well said by the honorable chairman of the Finance Committee in regard to the Treasury Department, and he spoke to us from his experience and actual observation in that Department, that a reorganization like this which is now being made for the Interior Department is a public necessity for the Treasury Department particularly. Men of the highest administrative and clerical ability are called upon to perform the most arduous and responsible duties, and are so poorly paid that they cannot live in comfort in the city of Washington, much less in a condition of fair respectability. I think it is discreditable to the Government that it should be so. That the Government should lose from its high places its best and most admirable talent, its trained effectiveness, because we fail to extend a fair compensation to it, is something that we ought to put an end to. I hope, sir, that this bill will pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to postpone the bill indefinitely.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I hope the Senator from Nevada will withdraw that motion, and let a vote be taken directly on the bill itself.

Mr. NYE. I did not know yesterday what class of clerks this bill applied to. After the adjournment of the Senate I took a little pains to inquire into the subject, and I find that this "departmental club" has its existence in two of the other Departments, not in this.

Mr. SHERMAN. Which of the Departments?

Mr. NYE. The man who introduced the resolutions which I read yesterday belongs to the Second Auditor's office of the Treasury Department.

Mr. CONNESS, [to Mr. NYE.] Do not honor him with notice.

Mr. NYE. I shall not; but as the resolutions of the club recommend the removal or resignation of Mr. Harlan, of the Interior Department, I am satisfied that it has no connection with this bill. I therefore withdraw my motion and shall consent to let the bill pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to postpone being withdrawn, the question is, Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I desire to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question. Does this bill increase the pay of certain grades of officers in the Interior Department?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It does increase the salaries of some of the heads of divisions, and it also increases the salaries of the heads of bureaus.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Above the pay now given to officers of similar grades in other Departments?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No, sir; I think not, upon the average. I think the bill is right.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I find this state of affairs to prevail here: if we increase the pay of a single man of a particular grade, it is made the basis upon which we must increase the pay of every other man of the same grade in every other place. Now, if by passing this bill we are increasing the pay of certain grades of officers in one Department, so as to make it necessary to increase the pay of all other officers of the same grades in all other Departments, I am against it, because I do not think that in the present condition of our finances we should do any such thing. If we commence in this Department and run up the pay of certain grades of officers to a certain sum, we shall be called upon next week to run up the pay of similar grades of officers in all the other Departments to an equal sum.

Mr. COWAN. I understand that this bill does not disturb the pay of the different grades. It requires more clerks of a higher grade.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Pays them more.

Mr. COWAN. No, it does not increase the pay of the grades. Persons in the lower classes are to be paid as before; but it creates some additional chief clerks.

Mr. SHERMAN. Creates a new grade.

Mr. COWAN. It does not affect the pay of the old grades.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It increases the pay of the same officer with the same rank, as I understand it.

Mr. COWAN. I have not so understood it, and I was a member of the committee and heard all the various parties, and it was evident to me from their statements that we should have the same amount of work done and pay less for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think I can inform the Senator from Illinois how the matter stands. The bill adds a new grade of clerks, and gives them higher pay. It abolishes, substantially, the lower grade of clerks in certain bureaus. For instance, in the office of the Secretary of the Interior there will be one disbursing clerk, one chief clerk, one clerk of public lands, one clerk of Indian affairs, one clerk of pensions, three clerks at $1,800, four at $1,600, four at $1,400, and none at $1,200. The real effect is to raise the pay ten or fifteen per cent. In other words, it divides the pay of forty-six clerks, who are dispensed with, among those who are retained. It reduces the number of clerks, and divides the pay of those dispensed with among the others.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I quite agree with much that was said by the Senator from California, that the pay of these officers is too low at the present time—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is House joint resolution No. 127.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. By the courtesy of the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Howland], it is understood that the special order is to lie over informally for a few moments in order that this bill may be disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no objection be made and that be the unanimous consent of the Senate, the order of the day will be laid aside temporarily.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I designed saying but a word or two. I am quite satisfied that the pay of the clerks, not only in the Interior Department, but in the other Departments of the Government, is inadequate at the present time. That is not only true of the clerks, but it is true also of most of the officers of the Government. We have had before the Committee on the Judiciary petitions from all portions of the United States asking us to bring in a bill to raise the salaries of the district judges. I think they ought to be raised. I thought so two years ago, during the war; but the committee at that time—and I quite agreed with the committee then—thought it not advisable to attempt raising salaries when we were engaged in this great war. But the salaries of the district judges ought certainly to be raised, and a bill is now pending for that purpose. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] is correct in supposing that if this bill passes it will lead to a raising of all the salaries. I have no doubt we shall report a bill from the Committee on the Judiciary at this session to raise the salaries of the judges. I think they are the poorest paid of any officers in the Government, almost. If you are going to have competent men to fill judicial positions of high importance, you must pay them reasonable salaries. I shall not vote against this bill, because I am prepared for one to vote for an increase of salaries; but if this bill be voted down, we shall then understand that salaries are not to be raised. The amount of the precious metals has been so much increased, so much money is afloat, that it is not of the value it was when these salaries were fixed, and it seems to me that there is an absolute necessity upon Congress to increase the salaries of the public officers.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I feel inclined to vote for this bill, because it arranges the Interior Department by a reduction of clerks, and awards compensation to those who do the work and who must do it. I have no doubt a judicious change of the same kind applied to the other Departments would be just and proper. We should then retain the able, efficient, and working men in the offices who now do the business, and they would get an adequate compensation for it. I think we are in no condition to commence a general raising of salaries. I have no question that salaried officers are in general poorly paid; but it is much wiser legislation to give compensation to the men who do the work by dismissing men who do but little and who are of but little account to the Government. I fear, however, that if this bill passes there will be an application for an additional number of clerks. Some people are never satisfied with what they get while there is a chance of getting more, and appealing to Congress or anybody else who has the power to give. If there was any way to increase the capacity of the tax-payers it would be well enough to go into the business of increasing salaries.

This, I think, is a bill properly framed to give compensation to men who do the work and to get clear of those who do not work or do not know how to work. A great many persons in the public offices have got in there by outside influence. I presume such is the present condition of things. I know it was so in the Departments years ago. There were then always in the public offices a large number of individuals who were incumbrances to the public service and really retarded the men who worked and did the public business.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President, without making any argument I desire to say in this connection, for I have been in communication with the Secretary of the Interior and his Assistant, that it is my opinion that we should have a general bill systematizing employment in all the Departments so that efficient service might be properly compensated. All persons conversant with the business of the Departments know that about three out of five employees of the Departments do not labor during the reasonable hours of the day in the transaction of their particular business, and it is equally true that nearly three out of five do not know how to perform the labor which the public service requires. There should be applied to the Government service in the Departments something like the same rule that belongs to our officers both in the Army and Navy. Persons who have been disciplined in a special department and have acquired the knowledge necessary to perform the services required with skill, should be maintained in employment and should be entitled to promotion. I look upon this measure as an inaugurating measure in the same line; but a complete system of that kind should be devised by some persons who have the authority to devise these things, and made the law of the land. I desire to say this because it is an opinion of mine which I have long entertained, and which is, I think, the opinion of all informed persons who desire to see the public service properly transacted by persons intelligent about their particular business; and therefore I am for the bill.

The bill was passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 450) to reduce and establish the pay of officers and to regulate the pay of soldiers of the Army of the United States was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

GOODRICH AND CORNISH.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 77) for the relief of Ambrose L. Goodrich and Nathan Cornish, for carrying the United States mail from Boise City to Idaho City, in the Territory of Idaho.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives, and that the conferees be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 438) in relation to the courts of Washington Territory;

A bill (H. R. No. 621) to regulate and secure the safe-keeping of public money intrusted to disbursing officers of the United States; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 148) to authorize the distribution of surplus copies of the American State Papers in the custody of the Secretary of the Interior.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 127) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. DOOLITTLE as a substitute for the second section of the proposed article of constitutional amendment.

Mr. HOWE resumed and concluded the speech commenced yesterday. His entire argument will be published in the Appendix.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, the Senate will bear witness, and I have no doubt my colleague will cheerfully accord the same, that never upon any occasion has a word fallen from me calculated or intended to wound in the slightest degree the good name or good fame of my colleague. I think no such word ever escaped me, and if I know my own heart no such word will ever fall from my lips. But the remark which my colleague made when he concluded his sentence which had reference to me, that in my history I had, politically, been found where office or position brought the highest price is a remark which if not construed with more charitable feelings than most men are capable of exercising, might be supposed to contain some reflection upon the integrity of my purpose in my political action. Sir, I claim no infallibility; I am as liable to mistakes as other men; but what I do claim is that in what I have done in my political life I have intended to do right. I may have erred in not carrying those intentions fully into effect; but, sir, that I ever intended in the slightest degree to swerve in my political action for the sake of offices or the price of offices in the market, is to those who know me a statement wholly without foundation.

Mr. HOWE. My colleague does not mean to say that I have charged him with any such thing.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My colleague does not assume to charge it, but assumes to say that it looks like it.

Mr. HOWE. No, sir.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understood my colleague to say that from my course it would seem that I was the most fortunate of all politicians to be always where the offices could be obtained which commanded the highest price in the market.

Mr. HOWE. No; not even that, though that is very different from what my colleague was replying to. After stating the situation of parties and political affairs at these periods, I did remark, expressly disclaiming any idea of charging him with being untrue to his convictions, that it was a most fortunate coincidence that he had always happened to have the very convictions which at those different periods bore the highest price in the market.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, those words are equivocal. The inference to be drawn is substantially what I said, if not to cast an imputation, to raise a question as to the sincerity of the motives which have controlled me. Now, Mr. President, it is not pleasant for a man to speak of himself; it is not becoming on ordinary occasions that a man should speak of himself or for himself; but, sir, upon a point like this, I may be pardoned if I allude to other crises in my life in which I have been called upon to take important and decisive action in relation to my political course.

And first, sir, I refer to 1847. In the convention of the Democratic party of the State of New York, when we were in possession by force of arms of the territories of Mexico, and the question of their disposition was to be determined, after Mr. Polk, then President, had recommended the disposition of those territories in such a manner as to give to slavery a considerable portion of them—under these circumstances, and when the responsibility was upon the country, I, as a member of the dominant party of the country, (a party which had the Executive, which had both branches of Congress, which was in a large majority in almost all of the States,) had occasion upon my responsibility to take action upon the pending question raised by the situation of affairs; and that question was the same question which for twenty years has been the great issue, shall slavery be extended into the Territories of the United States or not? As a member of the convention of the dominant party in the State of New York I brought forward that resolution denominated the "corner-stone resolution," upon which we separated ourselves from the majority and the dominant party in the State, and organized what was denominated the Free-soil party of the State of New York. That corner-stone resolution stood at the head of the leading newspapers of New York and New England and Ohio, and Wisconsin, too, as the corner-stone upon which the Free-soil organization was laid.

Sir, for no purpose but to carry out what I believed to be the duty resting upon me and carrying forward the true interests of the country, we deliberately went into a great minority, abandoned the majority and office and all chance for office, all place and all thought of place, abandoned all to give ourselves to the principle which was involved in the struggle. What followed? The Democratic party was overthrown; General Cass, its candidate, who was in favor of what was called the diffusion of the institution of slavery by way of absorbing it and blotting it out, was laid aside, and General Taylor was elected. What then intervened? One of those things which seem almost, as we look back upon it now, as the special providence of Almighty God. The discovery of the gold mines of California happening just at this time carried the people of the free States by hundreds and thousands into that new Territory just acquired from Mexico; and they organized a free State government with a free constitution, came to Congress and demanded admission, and Congress dared not refuse, for California was the golden State, and a rising State on the west side of the Rocky mountains, and she could not be held against her will. She demanded admission; and the Senate of the United States, pro-slavery as it was, was compelled to yield to the demand, and California was admitted as a free State. That was the result of the organization of the Free-soil party of 1847 and 1848. It was a victory for freedom by the admission of that free State which gave in this Senate a majority to the free States of the Union.

What then occurred? There was got up what was called a grand compromise. All the great Whigs and all the great Democrats of the country in this body and in the other House got together and produced what was called the compromise of 1850, and then it was proclaimed by the great men of the country, "The slavery question is now forever ended; it shall never be agitated again; now the country shall be quieted; we shall hear no more upon that subject." The two parties went into the nomination of their candidates in 1852 upon precisely the same platform in that respect. The Whig party nominated General Scott, and they declared there should be no discussion of the slavery question at all countenanced or encouraged. The Democratic party nominated General Pierce, and they declared the same thing, so that upon this question in 1852—the time when my colleague charges upon me that I abandoned the cause which I had espoused in 1848 because he says I gave my support to General Pierce in 1852—both the great parties of the country occupied the same ground. It is a fact to be noticed also that the great majority of the Free-soil party with which I acted in 1848, in the State of New York, as well as in Ohio and Wisconsin, went into the support of General Pierce in 1852. There was only a little, small remnant of that party who voted for Hale, who was in 1852 the candidate of what was called the Liberty party. There were a few who did so. The honorable Senator who now occupies the chair [Mr. POMEROY] was one who adhered to Mr. Hale, and I believe the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] also adhered to Mr. Hale in 1852; but there were very few of the Free-soil organization either in Ohio or in New York or in Wisconsin who did.

Here was no abandonment of principle on my part. It is true I went upon the bench in 1853, having been elected in 1852, in the State of Wisconsin. From 1853 to 1856 I was constantly engaged in the arduous duties of judge of the first judicial district of Wisconsin, which at that time was the most populous and had the most business of any of the judicial districts of the State; and while I was on the bench I had sufficient regard to what I thought were the proprieties of that position not to engage publicly in political affairs; but from the moment the Democratic party, which had elected General Pierce on the pledge that the slavery question should not be reopened, proposed the repeal of the Missouri compromise, to every person who conversed with me on the subject I freely, openly, frankly declared in opposition to the project, and said that it would be the dissolution and the destruction of the Democratic party.

My colleague refers to the fact that in 1856 I gave my open adhesion and my public support to the election of Mr. Fremont, but says that I did not write a public letter or make a public speech until after the adjournment of Congress. You remember, sir—and I know you do, for you were a resident of Kansas at the time—that for long months here in Congress the very question pending was whether Congress would enforce the border-ruffian slave code of Kansas, or would repeal it. If Congress had repealed it, Kansas would have been a free State. I did not desire to go into political life or to go into a struggle. I was engaged in my profession, a profession that brings more profit and much more ease than any place like those we occupy here. I had no desire to go into it; but when the Congress of the United States, under the influence of the Senate of that day, determined that they could enforce that bloody code upon the Territory of Kansas, I could not withhold my declaration. Sir, it was like fire in my bones and in my heart. It demanded and would have utterance; and when the utterance came it came red hot in the denunciation of the infernal outrage that was thus practiced upon the people of that Territory; and as my colleague says—it would not be becoming in me to say it—the people of Wisconsin perhaps did feel grateful for what I did in the canvass of 1856 in denouncing the Democratic party and overthrowing it and trampling the organization under our feet which would justify and sustain an outrage like that.

Mr. President, I never sought alliance with the Republican party because it had offices whose price was high in the market—no, sir; never. My colleague refers to my course in Wisconsin. Sir, during the last six months, ay, more than six months past, in the State of Wisconsin no man has struggled harder than I have struggled to save the Union party, to save it to its platform, to save it to its principles, to save it in its supremacy. There is hardly a man in Wisconsin this day who does not know that the success of the Union party there is due to those men who in the convention at Madison united with me and agreed with me in opinion there and in resisting what was there proposed, to wit, to declare by the resolutions of the Union convention that the States of the South should never have representatives in Congress until they extended universal suffrage to negroes. Because we resisted that in the State of Wisconsin we saved the Union party and elected its candidates by nine thousand majority when the very proposition presented to the people based upon negro suffrage was voted down by nine thousand. Had we, consulting the public newspapers, consulting the denunciations and the clamor of the hour, been false to our position and false to the crisis, had we yielded to that clamor, the Union party would have been utterly overwhelmed in the State of Wisconsin at the last election.

Mr. President, it has been charged that it was through my instrumentality that that convention refused to adopt any such new creed or new platform which never had been incorporated as a part of the Union creed or the Union platform. I have been charged with the responsibility of that. If the responsibility of that rests upon me, then it is true that I had the honor of saving the Union party of Wisconsin in its struggle last fall. But has the course pursued by me there saved me from the denunciations of the public press? Not at all. For six months, from one end of Wisconsin to the other, ay, from Boston to St. Paul, by every one of a certain class of newspapers I have been denounced as a traitor to the Union party because I saved it from defeat. Sir, it is not the first time in the history of the world that men have turned in to crucify their saviour. So far as I am concerned, my political life may be ended; but the principles for which I have contended, the principles for which I have made the struggle, will live. Men may suppose that those principles are crucified; they may imagine that the doctrine of the right of the States to control their own institutions, so far, at least, as to be permitted to declare who shall exercise the right of suffrage within their limits, is crucified and buried in the tomb, with a stone rolled at the door; they may imagine that these principles are dead and buried and will never rise again. So far as individuals are concerned, it is of but little consequence. I, as an individual, may have met denunciation; perhaps I may be consigned to defeat; but what of all that? What care I, if the principles live? I tell you, Mr. President, and it is as certain as that the sun will rise to-morrow, that the great principles for which I have contended will live; their resurrection is certain; and those who stand in opposition to them will find that they are living, vitalizing principles; that they will have recognition, and you cannot keep them buried out of sight.

Mr. President, I have been betrayed, perhaps, into saying more than I would have said under other circumstances. I have no unkind words to my colleague, no questions upon the sincerity of his course, no imputations upon his motives. I only rose to say, in my own defense, that so far as my intentions are concerned, I intend to pursue the right, if I know where it leads; and, God helping me, I will pursue it to the end, be the consequences what they may.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the pending question before the Senate is, I believe, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE.] If it be the pleasure of the Senate, I should like to have the vote taken on that proposition now, so that I may have the opportunity of offering two or three amendments myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The question before the Senate is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the second section, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Several SENATORS. Let it be read.

The SECRETARY. The amendment is to strike out the second section of the proposed article, and in lieu of it to insert the following:

After the census to be taken in the year 1870, and each succeeding census, Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to the number in each State of male electors over twenty-one years of age qualified by the laws thereof to choose members of the most numerous branch of its Legislature; and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States according to the value of the real and personal taxable property situate in each State not belonging to the State or to the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would inquire if we did not vote on that direct proposition once before.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No, sir.

Mr. CLARK. It was submitted, but not voted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote has not been taken. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the vote will be taken.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 7, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, and Riddle—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Morriss, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomero, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Crewell, Dixon, Henderson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Saulsbury, Willey, and Wright—11.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. By the courtesy of the Senator from Kentucky I desire to offer another amendment. It is not the same as the last; it differs in this respect, that it bases representation upon male citizens who are voters, and not on male electors simply. I do not suppose it will give rise to any discussion. I merely offer the amendment, and ask for the sense of the Senate by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary read the proposed amendment, which was to strike out section two and in lieu thereof insert the following:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to the number in each State of male citizens of the United States over twenty-one years of age qualified by the laws of such State to choose members of the most numerous branch of its Legislature, and including such citizens as are disqualified by participating in rebellion. Direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States according to the value of the real and personal taxable property situate in each State not belonging to the State or to the United States.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I voted for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin, not that I believe that representation in this country ought to be based upon the voting population, but I voted for it as I thought it better than the proposition that is before the Senate from the committee. I think representation ought to be based upon population, and that taxation ought to rest upon the property of the country ad valorem; and now that this question has been raised in this country, I believe it will yet come to that before the question is finally settled.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall detain the Senate but for a moment to explain the reasons for the vote I shall give in opposition to what is my own deliberate judgment on the question now pending. The more I think of this question the more I am convinced that the true basis of representation in the present condition of affairs is the number of male citizens who under the laws of the States are allowed to vote. This proposition, it seems to me, is a simple one, plain and obvious, which puts a citizen in one State on a footing of precise equality with a citizen in every other State, which equalizes the political power of all citizens, and which will destroy all sectional animosity. If this amendment be adopted, a citizen of the State of Ohio has precisely the same political power with a citizen of the State of Massachusetts or of South Carolina; no more and no less. The same number would be required in each State to elect a member of Congress. The number of citizens could be easily ascertained by the census, and the census rolls could be attested very readily at each annual election. This proposition is simple, plain, and obvious; and yet under the necessity in which we are now placed I shall feel called upon to vote against it. My reason for this I will briefly state. In my judgment some change ought to be made in the basis of representation. The condition of the negro population in the southern States, now deprived of all political power, is such that to give to the white people of those States the right to vote for the negro population and represent them is to give them an undue advantage, one which we could not justify even if they had not been in rebellion.

There is no reason why the white citizens of South Carolina should vote the political power of a class of people whom they say are entirely unfit to vote for themselves. If there is any portion of the people of this country who are unfit to vote for themselves, their neighbors ought not to vote for them. The plain and obvious principle of representation is that every voter should vote for himself, and for no one else; those who have not the right to vote should be represented by the majority of the voting population, and not by their immediate neighbors. There is no reason, for instance, why because the State of Massachusetts has a preponderance of women a voter in Massachusetts should count more than a voter somewhere else. There is no reason why, because in the city of New York there is a very large element of unnaturalized foreigners, a voter in the city of New York should have more political power than a voter anywhere else. There is no reason why, because a white man lives in the South, where they have a large mass of negro population, a white man in the South should have more political power than a white man in Ohio. There is no reason why, because in Ohio we have a greater proportion of voters to our population than they have in other States, we should be deprived of political power. The truth is that every man who has the right to vote should be counted one, and the aggregate of votes should then be divided by the proper number of Representatives in the political body—the House of Representatives—in order to arrive at a true and correct apportionment.

That is a plain and obvious principle, and if that principle was adopted the southern States would feel no local jealousy. They could not feel any. No State and no community would have the right to complain. The laws of the United States would fix the naturalization of the foreigner; birth would fix the citizenship of the native; there could be no controversy. Then every citizen would stand equal before the law, with precisely the same political power, no more and no less. I say, therefore, that this is the only amendment to the propositions now submitted to us that I desire to make; but I feel bound by the action of my political friends to vote against this amendment. I place my vote distinctly on this ground: here are propositions upon the details of which men would naturally differ, and it was therefore necessary for those who intended to support the mass of the propositions to confer together and agree upon those which they could support. There must be at some point of every controversy of this kind some surrender of individual opinion.

Although my opinion is as clear as it can be upon any subject that this amendment is right in itself, both branches of it, yet as we were compelled to unite on some measure—and we must all yield some of our opinions upon various questions involved—there are five sections in this proposed article—I feel bound to vote against this amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, though in my judgment it would do more than any other to heal the difficulties by which we are surrounded. A majority of those who will support the propositions on which we are to stand believe that the measure in the shape in which it is before us is the wisest, and I am bound on that question to defer my own opinion to that majority who differ from me in order to secure the passage of this resolution. I am the more reconciled to this course because next to the proposition now submitted I think the present is the best that has ever been offered. Next to the simple, plain proposition of basing representation upon voters, the section before us is the best. It does recognize the equity of the rule I have mentioned. It bases representation upon population, and it excludes representation for a class of people that have no political power; but it stops short of the logical sequence of the principle. It endeavors to save representation for certain portions of our country where they have a population whom they deprive of the right to vote; but it deprives the South of representation for a population which has no right to vote. It is therefore to some extent unjust, and yet it is more just than any other proposition which has been submitted to us. For instance, the proposition which I voted for some two or three months ago, reported by the committee on reconstruction, proposed that if the South excluded any portion of the negro population from voting the effect should be to exclude the whole mass of that population from representation. This proposition is better than that. It is indeed better than any other except the simple, logical proposition of basing representation upon voters.

While I do not and cannot surrender my individual opinion on this subject, I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin simply because it is necessary to have an end to this controversy, and those who are expected to carry these propositions before the people must agree upon some platform, and I choose to stand by that which has been agreed upon by those who are expected to vote for some amendments to the Constitution. All those who believe that amendments ought to be adopted must confer among themselves and get the best proposition upon which they can agree, and then they must abide by it and stand by it. Although my friend from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] may say that that is the result of a caucus, let me tell him that he has submitted to such a result a hundred times, and would do it again. I would always rather submit to the deliberate judgment of a majority of those with whom I act than to seek the aid of my political opponents, uniting with a minority of my friends to make a platform that nobody would be satisfied with.

Mr. WILSON. After the remarks made by the Senator from Ohio I desire to say simply that I regard this amendment as a proposition to strike from the basis of representation two million one hundred thousand unnaturalized foreigners in the old free States, for whom we are now entitled to seventeen Representatives in the other House, and it weakens that part of the country that much. That is all there is in it. It is simply a blow which strikes the two million one hundred thousand unnaturalized foreigners who are now counted in the basis of representation from that basis, and takes the Representatives for that population from the loyal portion of the country for the benefit of the other end of the country that has been disloyal. That is the proposition, and I shall vote against it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that a remark only is necessary in reply to that. The two million of unnaturalized foreign population alluded to by the Senator is somewhat an overestimate. But take it at two millions; how long are they excluded? Only during a short period of probation—five years; and in most of the States the great body of them are promptly admitted to citizenship.

Mr. President, I ask you whether it is not just that those people who are denied political power should be excluded from the basis of representation. If it is right to exclude four million blacks in the southern States who are denied representation, is it not also right to exclude all other classes in every other State who are denied political power? We cannot go before the people of the United States and argue the question as it affects this State or that State, this community or that community. The amendment to the Constitution which we propose we must settle upon some fundamental principle—not judge by the way it will operate upon this community or that community, but as it operates on the whole mass of the community at large.

Now, I say that it is not unjust to exclude the communities in which two million foreigners in the process of naturalization live from exercising political power for them. As soon as our laws allow them to exercise political power for themselves they will become citizens, and they will vote; but the very same reason which excludes the four million colored population in the southern States who are denied by their laws all political power would exclude temporarily, during the short period of probation, the foreign population who are unnaturalized. But it must be remembered by my friend from Massachusetts that the great body of unnaturalized foreigners are women and children. Nearly all the men who come to this country are naturalized in five years. The exceptions are very rare. In an agricultural community like the West all foreigners are naturalized in a short period of time, except in some States where the policy of their laws is to prevent them from being naturalized by allowing them to vote without being naturalized. The most of the unnaturalized people in this country are women and children. Nearly all the men who have lived here five years have votes. The objection the Senator now makes, that two million foreigners would be unrepresented, disappears in 1870, because by that time all who have been in this country during the requisite period would undoubtedly be naturalized, and they would then be counted.

Mr. GRIMES. Others take their places.

Mr. SHERMAN. They are coming in. But ought they to be counted until we intrust them with political power? The Senator from Massachusetts has no more right to vote for a foreigner whom the laws of the United States declare to be unfit to vote for himself than I have, merely because he lives in Massachusetts. It seems to me that is not a fair argument.

Another argument has been often drawn into this discussion. I do not know that it is worth while for me to continue the discussion, because as I feel bound by the action of my friends I shall vote against this amendment. But there is another argument. It is said that the young and active men of all the eastern States, including Ohio, which now sends more abroad than it receives, emigrate westward, leaving their families behind them, and that it is unjust to deprive those families of political representation. So it would be taking a superficial view, but you must remember that these young men who go West themselves represent their families, and that they bring the principles in which they were taught back into this body and into the other House. They exercise political power for their families when they go to the West. The West gives these emigrants office, honor, position. Should not the West count for that? When a young man goes from Massachusetts to Minnesota, ought not Minnesota to have the benefit of his political power in her count of representation, when she gives him office and honor and power and patronage? Undoubtedly. Wherever the man votes there he ought to be counted; and if he leaves behind those who do not vote they ought not to be counted. He ought to be counted where he exercises his political power, so that a man in one State may be the same in every State, having the same political power. But I will not discuss this matter further.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I have a word to say. I am not exactly in the category of my honorable friend from Ohio. I do not wear the harness of caucus on this occasion, or indeed upon any other. I am opposed to any alteration of the Constitution in this point, because to me that is vital. But I am going to vote for the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin because I think it better than the original proposition and not worse.

It does seem to me there are most extraordinary notions of political power here, what constitutes it, where it is vested, and how it is wielded. What conceivable difference can it make to a citizen of Pennsylvania as to how Ohio distributes her political power? What conceivable interest has the honorable Senator from Ohio, or a Senator from any other State, to say to us whom we shall allow to vote and whom we shall not allow? They do not pretend that they have a right to say to us whom we shall elect and whom we shall not elect; and is not the elector just as much the choice of the community as an officer is the choice of it, except that the electors are chosen by a class and described by a general designation, whereas the officer is chosen by name to perform certain functions?

Mr. President, to touch, to venture upon that ground is to revolutionize the whole frame and texture of the system of our Government; to turn it over; to violate our own canons. What is the guarantee of the United States to the several States? It is that they shall have a republican form of government. Now we are told that a republican form of government is this, that, and the other. One man says it is "universal suffrage;" another man says it is "universal manhood suffrage," so as to throw out the ladies; another says it is "universal white suffrage," and so on. Who can agree as to what a republican form of government is? If gentlemen had read the original text and the approved commentaries thereon they would have found that the guarantee was such a form of government as the State itself should make. The State is the judge of the republican form of government, and not the citizens of the other States.

Then, if a State has the right to form its own government, and that is the republican form, by what right can one of the other States, or two of them, or ten of them, or three fourths of them, if you please, venture to introduce into the State a power from without in order to control its distribution of political power? If the effect of any such extra action upon a State would be to deprive it of a portion of its weight in the Union, that is a violation of the original compact; it is a violation of the very instrument upon which the Union was formed; it is putting the torch to the very fabric you wish to preserve; it is putting a mine under the very building you wish to secure. Are you to preserve these States if you are to regulate the weight hereafter that they are to have in the Union? Can half a dozen or a dozen or two dozen of these States undertake to shear of their political power the other States? Can you violate your own guarantee? When you say that nobody else shall deprive these States of the right of making their own government and distributing their own power as they please, can you do it? Can the guarantor himself with impunity violate his own guarantee?

Mr. President, I had intended to make some more extended remarks on this topic; and as I am on the floor now I may just as well say at this time what I have to say on the general subject. It is perfectly clear, I should think, to all wise people that the basis of representation, or the measure of political power and that which adjusts it among the States, should be something fixed, certain, determined. You cannot make a flexible standard. You cannot make a standard that is thirty-three inches to-day and thirty-six to-morrow, and the next day forty. You cannot allow a State to open and shut her valves and admit power or expel it at will. You propose to say that if she does not do certain things she shall not have but a certain amount of power. Suppose she wants power. She is made the arbiter of the power she shall have in the Union. Suppose she chooses to exclude it again, what then? Here we have a constantly shifting panorama upon which I do not see how it is possible that an apportionment bill can be framed. Population, however, is certain, fixed, determinate, a thing to be counted every ten years, and a thing to be encouraged, because if you make population the basis of representation then you encourage population; but if you make voting the basis, or if you make that the measure, then you encourage the degradation of the franchise. I am willing, on the part of my own State, that she shall be the guardian of the franchise within her limits. The people of our State are to be the judges of the persons in our society who are fit and proper to cast our ballots; and we are perfectly willing that all other States shall enjoy that privilege, because we believe that it is an inherent and essential privilege in every State.

But what will be the result upon us of the proposition before the Senate? We have in Pennsylvania about one hundred thousand negroes, and we have a Representative in Congress based upon them. What is to be the operation of this amendment? Just this: your whip is held over Pennsylvania, and you say to her that she must either allow her negroes to vote or have one member of Congress less. That is it; and it comes with very bad grace from a parcel of people who have no negroes among them; and that I think is the worst feature in all this business from one end of it to the other. Here are a parcel of States who have no negro population, and they are exceedingly anxious that the people who have them should let them vote. What is that their business? We have never known that they invited them that they might get votes. The negro is now as free to go to Massachusetts or to any State where he is allowed to vote as he is to stay in Pennsylvania or anywhere else. If he insists upon this privilege, he has the same right to go after it that I have, or any other man has, and he can go and get it. If I do not like the laws of Pennsylvania and they do not suit me, and I have not power and influence enough in the State to mold them to suit my particular desire, I can go to another State and another until I suit myself. But why people who are not interested in this thing, who have everything to gain and nothing to lose by it, can expect to maintain the Union by insisting upon propositions of this kind I confess is more than I can see.

This is not common justice in a common, ordinary transaction; and I do not know whether it would be considered fair even in a horse trade. The advantage is all on one side. It is like the Indian and the white man dividing the possum and the turkey. The white man said to the Indian, "Now you take the possum and I take the turkey, or if you do not like that, I will take the turkey and you take the possum." [Laughter.] "Why," said the Indian,

"you have not said turkey to me once;" and that is the way with this constitutional amendment. The States that have no negroes are to shear the States that have negroes of the political power they have according to the fundamental law, according to the ancient bargain made, and according to which the Union exists, and which is in fact itself the Union; that bargain which is bathed in the blood of two hundred thousand American soldiers, for which we have sacrificed six or eight thousand million dollars; that bargain now is to be amended in its essentials, and to be amended for the benefit of one section of the Union who have everything to gain by it and nothing to lose, and to the prejudice of the residue.

Mr. President, will the man who knows the value of this Union to these States, the man who loves it, who reveres it, and who believes that it will make his country the greatest republic on earth—will he be guilty of unfairness? And, sir, what is worse about it all, those States which are to suffer most, and the States within which it is to operate most hardly, are not heard; they are not allowed to come upon this floor and argue their case although this is a free country with a representative form of government, and, as I supposed, a republican form.

Mr. President, I consider this attempt as dangerous to the peace of the Union as the original doctrine of secession. Do gentlemen suppose that the people of the States affected will submit to this? Let me remind gentlemen of another thing. The Republican party existed over half the Union. It existed as a party north of Mason and Dixon's line. It was a minority party. When Mr. Lincoln was elected in 1860 there was a majority on the popular vote of more than nine hundred and thirty thousand against him. He was elected under the forms of the Constitution, and was really and lawfully the President of the United States; but under the workings of the Constitution it did so happen that there was that majority against him. In the States north of Mason and Dixon's line the majority for Mr. Lincoln, at the last presidential election, was about four hundred thousand, I believe. At any rate, nobody can deny but that very nearly one half of the people of the North belong to the Democratic party. There, too, I suppose, you may consider that the people of the South now belong, because your destinies are in their hands. They will inevitably sit in judgment upon you here in this Chamber. They will mete out to you, if you are not careful, the same measure you try to mete out to them. Now, I warn my fellow-Senators that we cannot afford this with this form of government of ours. Had we not better stand upon the Constitution as it is, where our fathers put it, that Constitution which we enforced at such cost? Think of partners after a difficulty, one partner trying to compel, and to compel under threats, the insertion of a new clause into the original articles of partnership. But can we compel it; and if we cannot compel it, what then? You know what it cost us to compel obedience to the Constitution as it is. You cannot compel obedience to the Constitution as it is not. You could compel obedience to a Constitution that was the law of the land, but you cannot compel obedience to a Constitution that is not the law of the land.

Mr. President, I am for dealing fairly. In the first place, as I have said before on this floor, I trust the American people everywhere. Why? I trust them because they are the foundation upon which this structure is built; and to say that they are to be punished into the proper shape or driven into the proper shape is to say that the whole rests upon a quicksand, rests upon a foundation which is distrusted, which begins to show cracks in the walls already if these things be true. I trust the people. I trust the people North. I trust the people South. I trust the people of all parties. Why not? Why is it that the South will sustain the Union now? Because it is her interest to sustain it. Why is it that we sustain it? Is it because we arrogate to ourselves superior virtue? Has the grace of God been more liberally bestowed upon us than on our brethren? Is that the pretense? We may be wiser, but surely I think nobody can say of the people or any part of the people that we are more honest.

Trusting the people, then, the people must be trusted everywhere, and what we do especially must be fair. It is a characteristic of our race, and one which has marked it for long ages, that there must be fair play. No man of our race will interfere even in his brother's quarrel in a fair contest. We must play fair. What have we been playing for? We have been playing for the Union and for the Constitution. What is the attempt now after we have won? It is to say that we will have neither except upon terms. Terms with whom? Terms with the very men we have been struggling with for years in order to compel them to assent to our terms—the Constitution and the Union.

I say again that we must be fair; we must allow to the States the rights which they reserved to themselves when they made this compact, and especially must we allow to them the essential rights, the rights that underlie the whole fabric, that are the basis of the whole structure, the first of which is the right to regulate their own domestic concerns. Have we forgotten our own platform? Let gentlemen who talk about party fidelity recur to the platform of Chicago in 1860; recur, if you please, to your Baltimore platform of 1864; and then you will see who are faithful to the original doctrines of the party and who are not. Shall we undertake now to say that we will regulate the ballot all over the United States, remodel the whole affair, redistribute the political power, and we do this right in the face of our own law? Who passed the act of the 4th of March, 1862? Who voted for it in this Chamber and in the other? Nobody gainsaid it; nobody thought of gainsaying it. And yet that law in force to-day is violated, trampled under foot and disregarded. By whom? By us. We who fought for the Constitution and for the law; we who proclaimed ourselves those who would see it enforced at all hazards violate it; we, in the face of our own law, to-day refuse to hear the people we are legislating for upon our floors. That law gives to the southern States, eleven of them, I believe fifty-eight members, and they have not one, and you have not the poor apology that is stuck into this amendment to the Constitution here, that these members engaged in rebellion, because the fact is that a great many of them did not; a great many of them engaged to suppress it; some of them shed their blood in that attempt, and some of them struggled through all manner of difficulties to be true and faithful, and yet they are excluded; they are not allowed to say a word here for their fellow-citizens. And this is fair! This is the way to deal with a partner! This the way to deal with men with whom you expect to live in peace and unity coming centuries! What is it all about? Where is the difficulty about it? Are they stronger than you? Are you afraid in the other House, with one hundred and eighty-three members now, that you cannot manage fifty-eight? Are we afraid here with fifty Senators that we cannot manage twenty-two?

Mr. President, the disguise which covers this proposition is too transparent. As I said before, the Republican party was a minority party. Its policy immediately upon attaining to power was to make itself a national party; was to throw out its lines and set its stakes in every quarter of the Union. Let it penetrate every hamlet from Maine to Georgia, from North Carolina to California. Let a network of both parties ramify everywhere, spread over the country, and then you may have a Union; and I may remark that the binding efficacy, the cement of the two parties interwoven like a network over the whole country, will contribute a hundred times more to keep it together than any other device, or even the Constitution itself. When this was violated, what was the consequence? When there ceased to be two parties all over the country, all over the length and breadth of it, what had you then? Rebellion; and rebellion will follow it inevitably, not only now, but in all time to come. Strike a line north of Pennsylvania and elect a President against the will of everybody north of the north line of Pennsylvania; or, in other words, go into an election and beat every man north of that line, and a rebellion is inevitable. You have the same difficulty then that we encountered in 1860. The election of Mr. Lincoln beat every man south of Mason and Dixon's line, or very nearly so. All parties and all factions were opposed to him. All had pledged themselves against him, and after the campaign waxed hot and the blood boiled, they had pledged themselves to resist; they were bound before the crisis came, and how could they prevent it? Thousands no doubt regretted it, but their lips were sealed. Thousands were unwilling to act, but still, under the influence of this mortification, they did act. It is a mortification, you observe, that reaches everybody; it reaches men, women, and children; it goes everywhere, and however trifling it may appear to a wise man and a cool man, yet it affects the people, and affects them in a most tender and vital point, and they resent it. They did resent it. I say again, that if under the same circumstances a candidate was to be elected who would beat all New England and New York, they would not submit, in my judgment.

Then I say it was the business of the Republican party to extend itself upon some common platform, not the platform of fairness exactly in the distribution of political power, because the Constitution was not based upon fairness in that respect. There was nothing fair in the provision that Rhode Island and Delaware should each have two Senators, and Pennsylvania and New York each only two. It was not built upon the principle of equality originally. Still we ought to stand upon it and maintain it; and in order to do that there should have been no going away from the original doctrine. We should have stood upon it and strictly and literally enforced it, and we should have had a right to enforce it, and could have enforced it in the face of the civilized world and had the civilized world with us. But that opportunity was neglected; the Republican party did not do that; and then it was driven to the miserable shift of either taking to itself as allies the negroes of the South, or what? Depriving the South of the political power which she enjoyed by virtue of the negroes. Do you think the world does not understand this? Do you think the people do not understand why this is? Do you think you can delude the people with the idea that this is honest on our part; that it is fair on our part, and that that is what we really mean? I tell gentlemen that if they think so they are mistaken. The people understand this exactly. Do you believe the people want, the mass of the Republican party want, such allies as those in the South? Do you believe they want to rely upon the aid they can get from negro suffrage in the South to hold the balance of power in this Republic? Go to Pennsylvania, go to Illinois, and ask them. When Pennsylvania, with her hundred thousand negroes, refuses them suffrage, why is it? And if she refuses to allow you to intermeddle with it, why is it? Do you pretend that you are improving the suffrage, do you pretend that you are making the institutions of the country more secure when you insist upon this? Who does so in the face of the civilized world? Are you bringing into the councils of the country more wisdom, more independence, more virtue? Nobody pretends it. Do you allow negroes to vote yourselves? You allow it partially in New York—a kind of emasculated suffrage there; you allow it partially in Massachusetts; absolutely nowhere; and yet you stand here and crack your whip over the head of the southern States who have millions of negroes in them, and you say they must let theirs vote when you will not let yours.

Mr. WILSON. They have the right of voting, absolutely, in Massachusetts.

Mr. COWAN. "Absolutely" if they can read the Constitution.

Mr. WILSON. The same as white men.

Mr. COWAN. Then it is not absolute even for a white man. That is the liberality of the reformers of the present age. After all this talk of political power and how it ought to be divided among men, how every man great and small, wise and foolish, should have his share of it, a poor devil who cannot write has none at all in Massachusetts. The honorable Senator from Ohio ought to have been reminded of that.

Mr. ANTHONY. Colored men vote in our State on the same terms with white people.

Mr. COWAN. Exactly. You put your restraints not only upon negroes but upon whites; but where is the restraint to be put on the people down South? You do not put any limitation there. You do not say to them, "If you let the literary negroes vote you may have all represented."

Mr. MORRILL. Suffrage is absolute in my State—unlimited I may say.

Mr. COWAN. I congratulate the honorable Senator upon it; and now all I wish is that he would go down to the Freedmen's Bureau—I believe the transportation is free—and ship up a hundred thousand negroes to Maine; take a hundred thousand of them there; I have no doubt they would be well treated. Then these philanthropic people would have an opportunity to exercise their skill. They would have an opportunity there to educate them and develop them, and they would see after awhile exactly what they could get out of them. If that were done, I could understand the philosophy of a movement like this. I believe I should agree to almost any new proposition if sufficient evidence was given to me that the people who urged it were honest in their designs, and had not some covert advantage which they expected lurking behind it. If Massachusetts had as many negroes as South Carolina, I could well understand her advocacy of this as being from the purest motives; but when I find her saying "You take the possum and I will take the turkey, or I will take the turkey and you take the possum," I do not understand that kind of talk to be fair.

And, Mr. President, I am opposed on principle to meddling with this matter. I am opposed to it again on the ground that to me it looks to be unjust, unfair, taking an unfair advantage of people at an improper time. Is this a time to amend the Constitution? I ask honorable Senators if in their opinion this is a time when the Constitution can be amended well and properly, because, as I understand it, if we are to amend the Constitution we must amend it in such a way as to be satisfactory to the people everywhere, not merely the people of Massachusetts or the people of Michigan, but to the people of Georgia and the people of Louisiana, to the people of all the States. Does any man want an amendment to the Constitution forced through here under circumstances of this kind, against people who are unable to resist, against people whom you will not hear, and in the face of a numerical majority in the country against you? Do you suppose that is going to be beneficial? I ask in all sober earnestness, is there anybody who supposes that that will be for the benefit of the country?

Again, suppose you pass this amendment to the Constitution, and suppose the southern States either for the purpose of getting themselves into line with you or for the purpose of increasing their political power under it, should admit the negro to the franchise, will your children and your homes and your governments be the more secure for that? What is the difficulty under which you labor to-day? Is it that you have not voters enough? Is it that the food upon which the demagogue fattens has grown scarce and he has grown thin? Or is it the reverse? Is it not because demagoguism is rife everywhere; and is not demagoguism rife just in proportion as you furnish it the material upon which to work? Degrade your franchise, put it down in the hands of men who have no intelligence, no virtue, and, what is worst of all, no independence—put it into the hands of men who have nothing to hope from it except in so far as they can use it for corrupt purposes, and shall we be safer then, I ask? Do you suppose that the people of the States in which there are negroes will send you more intelligent, more learned, more virtuous, and more independent Senators and Representatives here if you make this change than they would without?

Mr. WILSON. They will send more loyal men.

Mr. COWAN. "Loyal." What is "loyal?" I ask Massachusetts what is "loyal?" What is the meaning of the word? A fellow that votes with you! That is like the chap defining "orthodox"—"orthodox is the way I believe; heterodox is the way the other man believes." "Loyal" means an abolitionist, I suppose. At least I find that everybody who does not happen to be an abolitionist or tarred with that stick, is said to be disloyal. Loyalty, Mr. President, is a very simple word. Loyalty means obedience to the laws. It means legality. Legalis meant law as well as lex meant it. When a man alleges his loyalty to me, let me see his reverence for the Constitution and the laws. Show me a man who disregards either; show me a man who does not believe in the Constitution which brought this country to such a pitch of prosperity for seventy-five years and made us so great and so happy a people; show me a man that lays sacrilegious hands upon that instrument, especially when I know that half the time he does not understand it and that he never read a commentary upon it in his life; show me that man, and I show you one who is not loyal. Show me a man who for a temporary advantage, either for himself or his party, would set a foot upon one of his country's laws, and he is not loyal.

It is time we were beginning to understand the meaning of words in this country. It is time, now that the war is over, when passion has subsided and when reason ought to come back and resume her throne, that we ourselves should be reasonable. Let us look at this in the light of the past; let us look at it calmly and coolly as we survey it in bygone thousands of years, not as it looks to the eye blood-shot with passion, red with a rage that is hardly dying out. Let the lower stock indulge in passion if it is to be indulged in; but here in this the highest forum of the nation; here where, if anywhere, there should be justice and fairness, and that broad view over the whole country which takes it all in and which considers all the people as the people, virtuous, intelligent, independent enough to govern the country; let us here be reasonable, and especially let us know the meaning of our words.

Mr. President, I have another objection to this measure, and that is to that section which imposes a punishment upon people who have not been heard and who have not been tried and who have not been convicted according to law. If there is one thing above every other thing necessary to the maintenance of personal liberty—I mean your liberty, my liberty, and the liberty of every man, great and small, noble and ignoble—it is that no man shall be condemned until he is heard. Who could have dreamed that men educated as we have been, impregnated as we ought to be with the love of English literature, English law, and English history, could stand here for one moment and sanction a proposition of this kind, and particularly when we look back and see the consequences which fell upon them from their bills of attainder; and their bills of attainder were—well, I was going to say they were right compared to this, but that is not the word; they were not the one thousandth part as reprehensible as this, because when they undertook to inflict punishment through the medium of the Legislature, they took the criminal and named him by name; they described him, so that he could be known; they did not attempt to throw a drag-net over the whole country and to sweep in thousands of people and ostracize them, or punish them, make them eternal enemies.

Mr. President, if I wanted to sow the seeds of another rebellion, if I wanted to plant that fatal upas in this country, I would do it by means of just such a clause as that which deprives all men of the right to hold office who ever took an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and that without hearing them, without inquiring how they engaged in the rebellion, whether they were commanded in by a superior authority that they could not resist, whether they were forced in by actual physical force, whether they were deluded in, or how they got in. What, sir, punish such people! I have no word that will convey my sense of the impropriety and impolicy, to say no worse, of such a provision as that.

When I reflect upon the conduct of this Government toward those men at the very time when it should have been on the ground to rescue them, I am more and more astonished at our own folly in uttering a word upon such a subject. They owed allegiance to this Government. Did it owe them nothing? It owed them protection. Did it protect them? What did it do? Many of the Senators within the sound of my voice know that on the 4th day of March, 1861, when we came here, the United States, the great protector of the people, the sovereign authority of the land, that to which they all looked, and had a right to look, to preserve them their freedom of opinion at least upon subjects of this kind—that Government was that day ignominiously out of possession of seven States of the Union; had its feet on but two points in those States, I believe, Pickens and Sumter. Those were the only two points in the seven States that were held; and held how? So far from being able to protect the people, those places were scarcely able to protect themselves, and Sumter certainly was not.

Did we go to the rescue? Did the Government go and fulfill its part of the contract? Did it give them protection? History answers. No, sir, they were allowed to be driven into that vortex of rebellion, nobody to stand between them and the current that was sweeping everything with it. They were in, and now, because they were in and because they were in on account of the neglect of this Government to give them the protection they deserved, they are to be punished. It is time we looked at it. Why should we not look at it? Are we afraid to look it in the face? Are we afraid to do right? Can we not now "be just and fear not?"

Mr. President, let me suppose a case. An old man lives in the South, an old Whig if you please, struggling for the last thirty years against secession, fighting it in all its shapes from nullification down, voting for Bell and Everett, if you please, in 1860, or voting for Mr. Douglas, because I suppose that everybody admits that those who then voted for those men were not disunionists, were not secessionists.

That old man sits there surrounded by his family and surrounded by his slaves; slaves that were born beside him, slaves perhaps that his own mother nursed when she nursed him; slaves that he loved; slaves that he was kind to, and slaves that to-day would go to him for a favor perhaps far sooner than to anybody else. There he is, surrounded by his sons and his daughters. In December, 1860, a messenger comes in, a son, if you please, and he says, "Father, the State has seceded." "The State seceded! What! Gone out of the Union! Oh, we'll see about that. Where is the United States? Where are the United States officers? We shall have a halter about these fellows' necks before they know what they are doing. Seceded! Gone out of the Union! We'll see about that." The old fellow bustles about, and while he is bustling about another son comes in and says, "They have taken all the forts except Sumter, and all the United States officers are out of commission, every one; those that were true were frightened, and those who did not want to give up their offices have been threatened, and they have all resigned; there is no United States officer in South Carolina." What then? Where is your Government there to protect this man? He may have been a member of your Congress. He may have taken an oath to support the Constitution twenty times. He may have been a member of this body. What is he told? Where is he to go? He says, "I will see about this." He is an active, vigorous, energetic man, and he comes up here to Congress, and he finds Congress sitting at this end of the avenue, he finds the President sitting at the other end, and he tells them "South Carolina has seceded; you are out of possession; you cannot protect anybody; the whole people there are at the mercy of these secessionists. What are you going to do?" What did you do at either end of the avenue?

Mr. HOWARD. Ask Mr. Buchanan.

Mr. COWAN. Yes, and ask that Congress that sat here, too; ask that Congress did it pass any bill to authorize him to put down the insurrection; did it make any provision? The history of that Congress is written. "Well," the old man says, "I cannot do any good here; these people seem to be all demented; they have forgotten what the Government was organized for; they have forgotten its mission. They seem to think it has no function, that it is to remain seated here and do nothing, and that the people will still maintain their allegiance to it as against State governments and confederate governments; however, this will be all right yet." He goes down home and tells the boys and everybody that things will be better after a little; that there is a new President coming in; that Congress and the old President are fighting and have got to loggerheads; one will not do this and the other will not do that, and both are waiting for some new advent.

The 4th of March comes round. What is done then? The new President finds himself here without an army, without a navy, without a treasury, everything demoralized, everything at sixes and sevens, and for six weeks neither he nor his Cabinet knew what to do. What is the old man to do in the mean time? The stern old patriot, good Union man, says, "Never mind; things will come right yet; after awhile these people at the North will get started and then we will be set all right; the traitors will be punished and we shall be protected." In the meanwhile one of the boys comes in and says, "Father, I have got tired of being called a traitor; I cannot stand it any longer; my neighbors are joining companies and regiments; and I am sometimes actually in danger of being mobbed when I go out; here are Vigilance Committees and Precipitators and Knights of the Golden Circle, and it is hardly safe for a man to go out; but they have offered to make me colonel if I will take command of a regiment. I do not see that we have any hope at all; Mr. Lincoln is not going to do any better than Mr. Buchanan; here we have waited a whole month and he has not done a thing; there have been no supplies thrown into Sumter, no troops sent there, no strengthening of that post; this is a foregone conclusion; can we look any longer to the Federal Government? Four months have already passed; I guess I'll take the colonelcy." The old man says, "I do not like that, but I do not see very well what else you are to do; if this thing shall succeed and you are not in it, of course you will be damned forever and spotted as a Tory down to the latest generation, perhaps; I guess you had better go in." John goes in and takes a colonelcy; Jim goes in and is made a major, and Ben is made a captain, and so on; and about the time that is done they fire on Sumter and the North is on fire. Armies are in motion to go down and rescue these men after they have been in the toils.

Well, let us follow it a little further. Before our armies get within one hundred miles of this old man to protect him, to stand between him and the secessionists, he finds posted up on the wall a proclamation. What is that proclamation? Why that he is a sinner, a man who has violated a great moral law of God in the universe in owning slaves, and that his slaves that he owned, that he looked upon as his property, that he believed were his property, that had come to him from his father, if you please, were freed.

"Now," says he, "that may be; but I always thought that when a man committed a sin he ought to know it. I do not understand slavery to be a sin in itself. My father did not teach me so; my mother did not teach me so; the church did not teach me so; our people all around here did not believe so. Our people thought slavery in itself was indifferent; that if a master took a hundred negroes and made them happier than they were before, wiser than before, better than before, it was a virtue, and if he took them and made them worse it was a sin; and who dares tell me that I have been a sinner in this behalf? And what kind of protection is this that a Government is to afford me to allow the country to be covered with war and desolation for months on account of its neglect at the outstart, and then after doing all this I am to be told, true as I have been to the Constitution and the laws and the flag, that I am a sinner and to be bereft of my property? However, perhaps this is after all right; this is a great Union and a great country, and we can afford great sacrifices for it, and I will submit to this and be a Union man still." Then after war is over, after peace has come back, his sons are disfranchised, or rendered ineligible to office; every kind of ignominy is heaped upon him and upon them; they are punished without being tried, they are convicted without being heard; their apologies are not considered; they are not considered in court; they are not considered in the legislative hall; this old man is not allowed the poor privilege of a friend from his district to come here and offer the little apologies he may have for himself and his children.

That is an American citizen, a true man, a Union man; and this is the way we legislate for our fellow-citizens! This is the cement with which we propose to bind this Union again! This is the way we expect to extend the hand of fellowship to the Union men of the South! This is the thing we expect will secure to our children and to our children's children a future for the great Republic. Think of it! I hear gentlemen taking airings in history; we were treated to a dish of it this morning. I would advise gentlemen to read Prendergast's History of the Cromwellian Settlement in Ireland. Read the Partition of Poland. Read the suppression of all rebellions, and read where this operation has been performed successfully of putting down a rebellion and healing the wounds caused by it, and ask whether this is part of the machinery that was resorted to there. Go to Roman history; read it from end to end, and see whether when they conquered a people whom they wished to unite to themselves they imposed conditions, whether they said, "You must do this and you must do that, you must pass under the yoke." Never, never. If the Romans intended that a conquered people should live with them they made them their equals immediately; they gave them all the rights of Roman citizens; and what was their argument? "They will love us the better the better we treat them, and they will hate us the worse the worse we treat them."

Then, Mr. President, there is a fundamental principle, a principle fundamental in the hearts of Englishmen, I hope, and their descendants; fundamental in our history, fundamental in our traditions, fundamental in our beliefs, fundamental as our religion; it is that no man is to be convicted without being heard. How can you tell what a man has to say who was engaged in the rebellion? You refused to put the word "voluntarily" in. Do you propose to punish a man who was compelled to commit a crime involuntarily? And yet you do if he engaged in the rebellion.

Gentlemen tell us it is no punishment to say that a man shall have no voice and shall not be eligible to office. That might do to tell some of the verdant, virtuous districts out through the country, but it is a very singular speech here in the United States Senate, composed of forty or fifty men who have been all their lives struggling for offices, and have got very high ones at last. No punishment to say that a man shall not be elected to office! What kind of ideas of punishment must some people have? Do they think that punishment consists alone in pulling teeth or smashing thumbs in the thumb-screw, or putting boots on the leg? Is that the only kind of punishment you can inflict on a man? Is there not such a thing as setting a mark upon him, the punishment of the first murderer, sending him out to wander through the world like the man in the novel who had no shadow? Is it no punishment to put a wolf's head of this kind upon a man, to single him out, set him apart in the community, and label him "traitor, ineligible?" Do you know any men of our breed on the earth that ever submitted to that long? I should like some gentleman to consult his history and find when and where men of our race submitted to that long.

Mr. HOWARD. I refer the Senator to the Constitution of the United States, which declares that none but a natural-born citizen of the United States shall be elected President of the United States. That is one instance.

Mr. COWAN. Oh, that is a capital joke, Mr. President. Now, we have been bamboozled and fed on that kind of stuff for the last four years. That is an answer to the argument! I ask the honorable Senator if he believes there is a sane man in the world who thinks that has anything to do with my argument. It has no more resemblance to the case I put than a hawk has to a hand-saw—not a bit. Because all the people who are not born in this country cannot be President they are punished! Is that so?

Mr. HOWARD. I do not think so.

Mr. COWAN. I do not think so either. Nobody believes that that is any punishment or any stigma or anything else upon those people; but if I were to select the honorable Senator from Michigan and say to him, by law or otherwise, "You shall not sit upon a jury; you shall not sit in the Legislature; you shall not wear the ermine of a judge; you shall not be Governor of your State or Senator from that State," I should like to know what he would think of that. What would he say to his wife and children in explanation of that? "How does it come that our father cannot be a judge, so good a lawyer as he is? How does it come that he cannot go to the Senate of the United States, eloquent and learned as he is, and superior to the men whom we are obliged to send?" What would be his answer? "My children, I have committed no crime; my name shall come down to you pure and unspotted as it did from my own father; but I am the victim of a law which condemned me without hearing me, convicted me without a trial, and punished me not even by name, but by class."

I am reminded by my learned friend from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] that we ourselves made that a part of the punishment of treason; and the honorable Senators who think this joke is an answer to a ponderous argument, that this quip and quirk is to stand in the face of a great fact covering eleven States of the Union, voted for it. We ourselves made it a part of the punishment of treason. It is in the book; I need not read it. That is a fact; and yet we are told this is no punishment. I ask again, and I defy gentlemen to put their finger upon a single instance where our race submitted to this, or submitted to it long. Impose that upon the southern States, pass this bill of attainder through the medium of an amendment to the Constitution, and the seeds of rebellion are there, and they will grow, and the feeling of this injustice will grow with it; and if redemption cannot come the children of the men you render ineligible to office in a very short time will themselves make a mighty army, an army not to be conquered in a cause of that kind. No, Mr. President, let us treat these people fairly, let us give them their rights under the Constitution and the laws; and if they merit punishment, let us mete that punishment out to them by the law, not by bills of attainder or ex post facto laws, not by making a law as amendments to the Constitution. If we can maintain the Union at all, we can maintain it in that way. If we cannot maintain it in that way we cannot maintain it at all.

I am aware, Mr. President, that this is a foregone conclusion. I am aware that it was decided that something must be done, and I know how difficult it was to get that something into being, to get that unlicked bantling into shape. I know how long the period of parturition has lasted. And, Mr. President, I am afraid, too, that if it had not been from pride of preconceived opinions it would have been strangled by its own mother at the instant of its birth. I believe she would have been glad to get rid of it if it had not been for that pride. But it is here, it is to go through, it is to be proposed to the people; but relying upon the people, upon the sense of the people, I have no fears for the result.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE.]

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. WILLEY] has been called away for this afternoon.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 7, nays 81; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, and Riddle—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Creswell, Dixon, Henderson, McDougall, Nesmith, Poland, Saulsbury, Willey, and Wright—11.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Before the Senator from Oregon proceeds to offer any amendment I desire to offer one further amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator will excuse me.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Does the Senator offer an amendment in behalf of the committee? I supposed the committee's amendments were through with. I had two or three amendments I desired to offer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg to be excused from yielding the floor. I move to strike out the second section and substitute these words for it:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But whenever the right to vote at any election held under the Constitution and laws of the United States, or of any State, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have that printed.

Mr. CLARK. It is merely in a better form.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the opportunity of seeing it in print.

Mr. HOWARD. I can assure the honorable Senator from Ohio that the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon does not vary in effect the second section. It is a more condensed form in which the ideas contained in that section are expressed, but I am not aware that it changes the meaning and legal effect of the section at all. I hope, therefore, it will be adopted as it has been very carefully and thoroughly considered.

Mr. JOHNSON. So was the clause as it stands carefully considered. I ask for the reading of that amendment again.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should like my friend from Oregon to state in what the amendment differs from the section as it stands.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will state that in substance and effect it is the same as the original section; but the words "the right to vote" are substituted for the words "the elective franchise." It was suggested, with considerable force, that this section related to the apportionment of representation, and that the words "elective franchise" might be construed as exclusively applying to that subject, and that a State might claim that it was entitled to count persons as allowed to vote when it extended the elective franchise to such persons so far as the election of Representatives was concerned; and therefore the words "any election held under the Constitution and laws of the United States or of any State" were substituted so that electors could not be deprived of the right to vote at State elections. The object of the change in the phraseology is to require the State to allow those persons, before they can be counted in the basis of representation, to vote at elections held under the constitution and laws of the State as well as at elections held under the Constitution and laws of the United States; so that there is substantially no difference. There is a change in the phraseology; some of the sentences and words are transposed, the object being to make the section more clear and explicit and satisfactory than it was in the other phraseology.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the honorable member explain why it is that the words "which may be included within the Union," in the eighteenth line are omitted in the amendment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. They were omitted for the sake of brevity and because they added nothing to the sense of the section.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is the language of the original Constitution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is true. At that time, when the Constitution was adopted, there were States that had not been admitted into the Union, States that might not ratify the Constitution, and those words were intended I suppose to apply to those States that might ratify the Constitution afterward. At this time these words are not supposed to be applicable, and certainly the Senator will not contend that the words in the proposed substitute are not as full and as complete as the words in the original section, and they are altogether more brief. That is the only reason why those words were omitted.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suppose it is desirable that we shall know what is in this amendment, and of course we could not understand its full force by merely hearing it read. I move that the Senate adjourn. It is past the usual hour of adjournment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator will allow me, I should like to submit amendments that I intend to propose, so that they may be printed also.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to submit amendments to be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin proposes an amendment which he intends to offer at another time, and asks to have it printed. The order to print will be made.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The effect of my proposition is that each of these sections shall be submitted as separate articles, to be passed upon severally. That is the effect of the amendment of which I now give notice.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the pending proposition be printed, and that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order to print will be made if there be no objection. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to, there being 10 in favor of the motion and 19 against it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not expect to vote for this proposition nor the one for which it is proposed as a substitute, but still I presume that even the minority have some little say and do about an amendment of the Constitution. Yesterday afternoon there was no press upon the Senate to stay here and consider this resolution. We adjourned at an early hour, when the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] was making his speech, I believe about four o'clock. I suppose he was a little fatigued in making his speech, and some Senator proposed that we adjourn—I think it was the Senator who has charge of this measure—and there was no Senator who thought of questioning the propriety of the adjournment to accommodate the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HOWE. The adjournment was not at my request at all.

Mr. HENDRICKS. By no means; but the Senator yielded that the motion might be made; no further business was transacted in open Senate; we went into executive session for a little bit. Now, there is a proposition simply that we adjourn that a very important amendment may be printed. I do not suppose it is the purpose to pass this measure to-night. I have not heard that expressed. I do not want to discuss it myself; but I should like to know what is in it before we vote on it. If it is better than the original, I want to vote for it; if it is not better, I do not want to vote for it as an amendment. I have a right to know what is in it because my judgment stands before the country upon the two propositions. This is an amendment to the caucus proposition, and I want to know whether it is better or worse. I have to give an intelligent vote on the subject, and I find it impossible to know just what is in it by merely hearing it read. The language is changed materially.

Mr. JOHNSON. I certainly have no desire to delay the action of the Senate if their minds are made up on the question; but I do not understand this amendment, and I have had it and the original section in my hand now for some three or four minutes; at least I do not understand it as I suppose it is understood by the gentleman who offers it. It appears to me to be obnoxious to this objection, and if it be liable to this objection I imagine that the Senators who are now apparently in favor of it will correct it in that particular. That part of the amendment to which I refer says that whenever the right to vote at any election held under the Constitution and laws of the United States, or of any State, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such States, being twenty-one years of age, &c., a deduction is to be made. Now, sir, in all the States—certainly in mine, and no doubt in all—there are local as contradistinguished from State elections. There are city elections, county elections, and district or borough elections; and those city and county and district elections are held under some law of the State in which the city or county or district or borough may be; and in those elections, according to the laws of the States, certain qualifications are prescribed, residence within the limits of the locality and a property qualification in some. Now, is it proposed to say that if every man in a State is not at liberty to vote at a city or a county or a borough election that is to affect the basis of representation? I submit to the friends of this measure, and I speak it, as I am sure the Senate will believe me, in all sincerity, when I say as it is all-important that the provision which we are about to adopt, or whatever we may adopt, shall be as certain as we can make it, that we had better print this amendment and bring to the consideration of it in the morning a better judgment than we may be able to form, at least than I am able to form, at this time. I move, therefore, that the amendment lie upon the table and be printed.

Mr. MORRILL. A motion to print it has been agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; the order to print has not been made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not in order to move to lay the amendment upon the table.

Mr. ANTHONY. That would carry the bill with it, as I understand.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then I move that the amendment be printed. That answers the same purpose.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask that the amendment which I proposed to submit be printed also.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order to print has already been entered.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am a friend of this measure, and I expect to vote for it and every one of these sections. I think, however, that at this hour of the evening the friends of the proposition ought not to insist upon a vote upon it. I have never seen this amendment before; I have not examined it; it is entirely new; and when the Senator from Oregon offered it I really did not know whether it came from himself or the committee. Certainly we do not desire to take from the opponents of this measure the opportunity of judging it and examining it, and much less can we wish to take from our own friends the opportunity of examining the principles contained in it. It is now five o'clock; it is the usual hour of adjournment.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator allow me to offer an amendment before he moves an adjournment?

Mr. HENDERSON. I will give way for a moment until you present it.

Mr. CLARK. With the permission of the Senator from Missouri, if there is a disposition to adjourn, I wish to offer an amendment to strike out the fourth and fifth sections and to substitute what I send to the Chair, and I will state for the information of Senators that it is an amendment from the committee. I move that it be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order to print will be entered, if there be no objection.

Mr. HENDERSON. Now I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope that before we adjourn some understanding may be arrived at on both sides of the Chamber as to when we shall have a vote on this question. I think we should take advantage of the good feeling that is exhibited at present to come to some understanding on that point.

Mr. HOWARD. I trust we shall stay here a little longer to-day and make some further progress in the discussion. There are several Senators on the other side of the Chamber who intend to speak to the measure which is now under consideration, and I am anxious to make all the progress that is possible to-day and to-morrow; and I wish it understood that so far as it depends on me I shall expect that the final vote will be taken at least on Friday.

Mr. CLARK. To-morrow.

Mr. HOWARD. I say at least on Friday.

Several SENATORS. To-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope we shall not adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 11, noes 17.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I had a sympathy to-day for the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] when he announced to the Senate that his judgment was that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin was right; that of the two measures that ought to be a part of the Constitution rather than the proposition of the caucus, but that he could not support it; and he said that I had been placed in like circumstances a hundred times, and my political friends had decided for me how I should vote. I desire to say to that Senator that he is entirely mistaken upon that proposition. I never in my life cast a vote upon an important legislative measure because any body of men said I should; and I do not think I ever will. I am responsible to the people of the State of Indiana; and when it is proposed to change the Constitution of the country, I must be satisfied in my own judgment that the proposition is right, that it is the best proposition that is before the body, or that my constituents expect me to vote for it, else I cannot give it my vote.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask the Senator a question if he will allow me.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Has it ever occurred in the history of that Senator that when he became satisfied that he could not get what he wanted he voted for the next best thing he could get, or did he stick to the first and lose it, and let the other go with it?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not recollect ever to have been placed in just that embarrassment. I am practical in my views as a general thing, and do the best I can.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That, I suppose, is the case with the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not recollect any particular instance in which I was placed in the embarrassment the Senator suggests.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I can vary the form of my question.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator allow me to complete my answer? When a proposition is before a legislative body, and an amendment is proposed to it, and the amendment, in my judgment, is better than the original proposition, I am never so embarrassed as to say that I shall vote for the more objectionable of the two propositions. I do not do it, and my party never ask me to do it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose, then, if the Senator was satisfied that his vote would be thrown away on the first proposition but would have effect on the second, he would prefer to throw away his vote and thus lose both.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should vote for the proposition that my judgment approved. But so far as I have been connected with political parties I have never gone into any caucuses to decide upon any legislative measures. I have gone into caucuses to decide who should be the presiding officer of a body, and how the organization should be completed; I have gone into conventions for the purpose of establishing platforms for a political campaign; but to go into a convention of the members of the Senate or of the House of Representatives, in which a majority decides how the vote shall be cast, and that majority fixing it, a measure is brought before this body which two thirds must support before it shall pass, I say is exceedingly objectionable. That is the position that the Senator from Ohio admits himself to occupy to-day. Upon a measure that two thirds of the Senate, under the Constitution, must approve before it can be submitted to the people, he subordinates his judgment to the will of a majority of his party friends in a caucus. He says his judgment approves of a particular proposition. I think that is illustrative of the present condition of the Senate.

How the Senator from Oregon comes to offer an amendment at this time, I do not know. The amendment comes here. Whether he was authorized to make the proposition, whether there was some latitude allowed to him in the decisions, I do not understand. It seems to meet with favor. I do not want to vote upon it to-night; I am not ready to vote upon it; but I am willing to stay here and discuss the question until in the end we get to know something about it. As a part of my remarks, I ask that the proposition of the Senator from Oregon be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. As a matter of course, in making the observations I did, I did not seek the approval of the Senator from Indiana, and do not now; but I have no doubt, and I repeat the assertion, that he has frequently, very many times, in the course of his legislative experience, found himself compelled to vote for a proposition which contained some matter in it that was objectionable. Scarcely a bill passes any legislative body, but what, when a member offers an amendment and fails to carry it, he votes for the measure although he has failed to carry his amendment; and I think that the Senator, who is under pretty good discipline in the Democratic party, has often given way his opinion on minor matters in order to carry a great proposition. My position is precisely this: I believe that several amendments of the Constitution are imperatively necessary. One of the amendments proposed relates to the basis of representation. Upon that I have a clear conviction that the gentlemen who will vote for these amendments have fallen into an error. Either I am in error or they are. I still think more than ever that the simple true basis is the number of voters, citizens of the United States fixed by the law of the State; but that proposition is voted down by a majority of those with whom I act. I do not expect the opposite side to vote for any of these propositions, and I do not consider their opinion worth much, because they commence by opposing the whole proposition. I do not regard their opinion as entitled to much weight with me in fixing the terms of the amendment. When each proposition has been agreed upon by the majority of those expected to vote for the whole, and I am called upon to vote on the whole proposition and defeat the whole proposition, or vote for it with some clauses that do not exactly suit me, as a matter of course I will vote for them; and I have no doubt the Senator from Indiana would do the same thing if he were in my place.

Now, in regard to another matter, I do think that the attempt to press a vote on an amendment to the Constitution, which, although it is said only differs in form, none of us have had an opportunity to read, is made probably at this period of the day without sufficient reflection. Perhaps all of us will agree that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon—a change of phraseology as he says—is the better proposition; but certainly, having adjourned yesterday at half past three o'clock when one of our own political friends was speaking in order to enable him to take two days to make a speech, we can scarcely refuse an adjournment now to the minority in order that they may be heard.

Mr. CLARK. We adjourned yesterday at a quarter past four o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is now five o'clock, and two amendments are introduced to the Constitution, it is true, only varying in form; but to attempt to force a vote on them to-night is simply absurd. It cannot be done in a body organized like the Senate. I, however, sympathize with all as to the long time that has been occupied by this debate, and I think a time ought to be fixed for taking the vote. The Senator from Michigan having this matter in charge says that he expects a vote on Friday evening, and if he adheres to that I will support him in it.

Mr. HOWARD. I said "at least on Friday;" and I expect the vote to be taken in the morning.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will support him in that. If some general understanding can be effected by which the vote may be taken on Friday I have no doubt we shall be able to get through without being at all hurried in the mean time.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California has the floor.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator from California has not the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I yielded the floor to the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was not aware of that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not anxious about adjourning. I am entirely indifferent on that subject. If it is the pleasure of the Senate to stay here and discuss this measure this evening, I would just as lief go on now as at any other time.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to make a suggestion to him. I do not suppose anybody on this side of the Chamber, or in the Senate, desires to force a vote to-night, but we desire to make some progress; for I think all Senators will bear me witness that we have never been so much behind in matters before the Senate at any session as we are now. It is desirable for some of us to have a vote on this question on Friday by three or four o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSON. Say five o'clock.

Mr. CLARK. That would put it out of the power of some of us to go away from the city. It is necessary, I will say, that I should leave in the train on Friday evening, if I can. If we can have a vote by three or four o'clock on Friday—

Mr. JOHNSON. The train does not go until half past six.

Mr. CLARK. But we shall want something to eat after we get out of the Senate. If we can agree to take the vote by three or four o'clock on Friday, I shall be entirely content.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have a few remarks to make yet. I have repeated the expression so often that I do not care to do it again, that we ought to press the business that is before the Senate. I have expressed my desire that we shall not be kept here in the very hot months; but I have become almost indifferent about that. When I proposed this afternoon to adjourn, I thought it was a very reasonable proposition, especially in view of the fact that we had adjourned yesterday afternoon simply to accommodate a Senator who was addressing the Senate, and to allow him to occupy two days instead of one, and especially in view of the fact that that one Senator has occupied more of the time of the Senate than all the minority put together. I have also desired to agree upon some time when the vote shall be taken. I have always been ready to agree upon an hour for taking the vote on any proposition before the Senate; but I am entirely indifferent now, and would just as lief stay here for the remainder of the evening as not.

I wish to speak of one other proposition of ethics on the part of the Senator from Ohio. In his usual plausible and delightful style he said that he would go with his party friends for a proposition that did not command his judgment rather than go with the Opposition and a portion of his party friends for a proposition that did command his judgment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think the Senator quite states my position.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is about the idea. I was trying to give the very words the Senator used, and I thought I had them, but not quite. That was about the idea, that rather than be associated with Democrats in the right, he would be associated with Republicans in the wrong. I can only account for that on the part of so elevated a gentleman in morals and intellect by the fact that he has been associated with Republicans in so much that is wrong he has to some extent become satisfied with that condition.

The Senator laid down another proposition which struck me as singular. He said that if the southern States refused the right to vote to the negroes, and thereby said the negroes were not fit to vote, the southern people ought not to have representation for a class of men that they themselves said were unfit to be citizens. I want to know how the Senator is going to vote for this proposition if that doctrine be right; and it is not upon non-essentials, it is upon essentials. It is upon the most essential feature of this resolution—the relative representation of the States in the House of Representatives. It is not a non-essential; it is of the very essence of the resolution. The people of Missouri have by a most unjust, as I think, provision of their constitution said that one half of the people of Missouri are unfit to vote. How is it that the Senator will now, in amending the Constitution, continue to that minority a right to representation for the majority which they have by constitutional amendment declared unfit to vote?

Mr. SHERMAN. Do you want an answer?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Apply the principle. I am just discussing it. The Senator says that if the southern States elect to hold that the negroes are unfit to vote, they shall not be voted for upon principle; but upon principle if in Missouri a minority, by accidental power, excluding a majority, upon the ground that the majority is unfit to vote, the minority shall have a full representation for the whole. I want to know how that is. It is not upon a non-essential, not upon a matter of organization or political policy with which he agrees with his party, but upon a question of equality and justice in the representation of the States; upon the very merit and heart of this measure, if it has got any merit at all.

Mr. President, if it is the pleasure of the Senate to adjourn I will not occupy the Senate any longer at this time; but whatever is the pleasure of the majority is my pleasure on that question.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President—

Mr. STEWART. I withdraw the motion temporarily if the Senator from Kentucky desires to speak.

Mr. DAVIS. I have two or three amendments that I want to present, and should like to have the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon voted on before I move them.

Mr. SHERMAN. You can speak on that just as well.

Mr. DAVIS. I will adopt the course suggested by the honorable Senator from Ohio, and speak to the general proposition of my amendments.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 6, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SAFE-KEEPING OF PUBLIC MONEY.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back House bill No. 621, to regulate and secure the safe-keeping of public money intrusted to disbursing officers of the United States, with amendments.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act it shall be the duty of every disbursing officer of the United States, other than those connected with the Post Office Department, having any public money intrusted to him for disbursement, to deposit the same with the Treasurer or some one of the Assistant Treasurers of the United States, and to draw for the same only as it may be required for payments to be made by him in pursuance of law: Provided, That in places where there is no Treasurer nor Assistant Treasurer of the United States the Secretary of the Treasury may, when he deems it essential to the public interest, specially authorize, in writing, the deposit of such public money in any other public depository, or, in writing, authorize the same to be kept in any other manner, and under such rules and regulations as he may deem most safe and effectual to facilitate the payments to public auditors.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any disbursing officer of the United States shall deposit any public money intrusted to him in any place or in any manner except as authorized by law, or shall convert to his own use in any way whatever, or shall loan, with or without interest, or shall for any purpose not prescribed by law withdraw from the Treasurer or any Assistant Treasurer, or any authorized depository, or shall, for any purpose not prescribed by law, transfer or apply any portion of the public money intrusted to him, every such act shall be deemed and adjudged an embezzlement of the money so deposited, converted, used, loaned, withdrawn, transferred, or applied, and every such act is hereby declared a felony.

The amendments proposed by the Committee on Banking and Currency were read, as follows:

First amendment:

Strike out these words in the first section, in lines four and five: "other than those connected with the Post Office Department."

The amendment was concurred in.

Second amendment:

Amend the first section by inserting before the word "provided," in line ten, these words:

And all transfers from the Treasury of the United States to a disbursing officer shall be by a draft or warrant on the Treasurer or Assistant Treasurer of the United States."

The amendment was concurred in.

Third amendment:

Add the following as the third section of the bill: Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any banker, broker, or any person not an authorized depository of public money, shall receive from any disbursing officer or collector of internal revenue or other agent of the United States any public money on deposit, or by way of loan or accommodation with or without interest, or otherwise than in payment of a debt against the United States, or shall use, transfer, convert, appropriate, or apply any portion of the public money for any purpose not prescribed by law, or shall counsel, aid, or abet any disbursing officer or collector of internal revenue or other agent of the United States in so doing, every such act shall be deemed and adjudged as an embezzlement of the money so deposited, loaned, transferred, used, converted, appropriated or applied; and any president, cashier, teller, director, or other officer of any bank or banking association who shall violate any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of embezzlement of public money, and punished accordingly.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on ordering the bill as amended to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to a provision of this bill. It provides that certain acts shall be deemed felony. I have not examined the statute to know whether there is any general provision of law in regard to a mode of punishment for a felony where the punishment itself is not prescribed in the act. My impression is there is no such general provision. If not, there should be some provision of that kind in this bill, otherwise there will be no punishment provided. I am not prepared at this moment to submit an amendment because I do not know the degree of punishment which the committee desire to attach to the felony. I ask to have the second section read.

The Clerk read section two.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will prepare an amendment for that purpose.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask my colleague [Mr. HOOPER] whether it is the intention of the committee to change the law or the practice in regard to deposits made by collectors. It seems to me that one of the great evils which we ought immediately to guard against is the deposit of public funds in the national banks by collectors. They should be required to deposit their collections in the Treasury at once. We are paying interest on a large sum of money which is deposited in these national banks for no purpose whatever except to stimulate speculation and endanger private and public credit.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. In reply to the question by my colleague, I would state that we have agreed in committee to propose an amendment to the section of the banking law which authorizes the national banks to be used as public depositories by requiring at all times an amount of United States securities deposited in the Treasury equal to the amount of moneys deposited in the banks, and it is made the duty of the Treasurer, whenever the public money in any national bank exceeds the amount of securities held by him, to withdraw the excess and place it in the public Treasury.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am satisfied for the present, if the subject is to come before the House. But I wish to say now that it seems to me entirely unwise to pursue any longer this policy of making national banks depositories of public money when there are designated depositories of the public Treasury where the collectors of the various districts can place their money. In one district, as I know, a collector has deposited money in five national banks. And now the proposition, as I understand, to be presented to the House, is, that these banks are to deposit the security on which they will receive interest from the public Treasury, and then take the deposits which are made by the General Government without interest, and transfer them into the branches of the public Treasury as a temporary loan and receive interest upon them. I think it is time that this whole business should be ended.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with the substance of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOWWELL.] He will observe, however, that the bill under consideration applies only to disbursing officers. As he has been informed, the committee have under consideration the propriety of securing public deposits now in the hands of the public depositaries, and the only safe step at present, it seems to me, is to provide for the deposit of the public securities of the Government to the full extent of the money of the Government deposited in their hands. For myself, I say that within twelve months, or more speedily, if the condition of the country will allow, and the arrangements of business men will permit, I am with the gentleman in favor of depositing the public money in the sub-Treasuries of the United States. Those are the only places in which public moneys should be placed. I agree thoroughly and entirely with the gentleman from Massachusetts that the present system leads to a derangement of trade, and to speculation.

Let me cite an instance. The Government of the United States lends its money to a banking institution, and that bank goes out into the market and with the Government's own money buys up the Government notes and the due bills of the Government, realizing upon them six per cent. Now, what man would so conduct his private business? And yet the public money is absolutely at this day used for the purpose of buying up the public securities and bills due twelve months ahead, and upon those public securities the Government is still to pay six per cent. So nefarious a system cannot last long.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, resumed the floor.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me to make a statement?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish to state a fact that I learned at the pay department not long since. A disbursing officer in the city of New York drew his check on the Treasury for six or seven hundred thousand dollars—I do not remember the precise amount—and deposited it in a bank in the city of New York, which turned right round and loaned the money to the Government at a high rate of interest. The money was never actually taken out of the Treasury, but the check of this officer was deposited in the bank and the money loaned to the Government.

I agree, sir, with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] that it is high time that we put a stop to this depositing of the Government funds in national banks, to be again loaned to the Government, either by disbursing officers or collectors of the revenue.

As has been stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOWWELL.] there are plenty of depositories, branches of the Treasury. Let the funds as collected be deposited there, and transferred to the Treasury of the United States where they can be used by the Government as it needs them, instead of being used for speculative purposes by the banks. I hope some amendment will be made to the bill which will put a stop to the entire system.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill, as gentlemen will see, is merely to regulate the safe-keeping of the public money intrusted to the disbursing agents of the Government. In the bank bill to which this discussion would properly apply the gentlemen will have an opportunity to carry out the purpose which they propose. When that bill comes up I think it will be seen that there are some purposes for which it is expedient to use the national banks as depositories. I move the previous question on the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Let me offer my amendment; I have now prepared it.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw the previous question for that purpose.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. My amendment is as follows:

Add to section two the following:

"And upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for a term not less than one year nor more than ten years, or by a fine not more than the amount embezzled, nor less than $1,000, or by both, such fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court."

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I renew the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The amendment proposed by Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. If it was expedient, as I think it was, to add that amendment to the second section of the bill, I think it should also be added to the third section. I call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] to the matter, and I ask him whether the third section does not require some amendment.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not know about that. My attention was called more particularly to the second section.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. The change suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] can be made by unanimous consent.

No objection was made, and the bill was amended accordingly.

Mr. PLANTS. I would suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] another amendment which I think should be made. This bill provides for the punishment of any bank officer who shall receive on deposit any public moneys in the charge of any disbursing officer of the Government. I would suggest that the word "knowingly" be inserted before the word "receive."

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I now call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVAL STATIONS ON NORTHWESTERN LAKES.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs a bill to provide for one or more naval stations on the northwestern lakes, accompanied by a report in writing.

The bill was read a first and second time, recommitted, and with the report ordered to be printed.

COURTS OF WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary House bill No. 438, in relation to the courts of Washington Territory.

The bill was read. The first section authorizes the supreme court of the Territory of Washington to fix the times for holding the supreme and district courts thereof at such places as may be designated by the laws of said Territory.

The second section provides that the judges of the district court shall appoint a clerk for each court in the district, who shall reside and keep his office at the place of holding said court.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to offer an amendment to the second section. I move to amend it by adding the following:

And exercise the powers now provided by law for the clerk of the supreme court of the Territory of Washington, and be subject to all provisions of law not inconsistent with this act, applicable to the clerk of said supreme court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMERICAN STATE PAPERS.

Mr. HAYES, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Library, reported a joint resolution to authorize the distribution of surplus copies of the American State Papers in the custody of the Secretary of the Interior; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution directs the Secretary of the Interior to distribute by mail or otherwise four hundred copies of the American State Papers, second series, in seventeen volumes, in the following manner, namely: to each member of the Senate and House of Representatives of the present Congress, one copy of each of said seventeen volumes, and one copy to each public or college library which may be designated by the Joint Committee on the Library.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. HAYES moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title: "An act (S. No. 203) to enable the New York and Montana Iron Mining and Manufacturing Company to purchase a certain amount of the public lands not now in market;" when the Speaker signed the same.

INTEREST IN NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. DELANO, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be instructed to inquire as to the propriety and necessity of amending the law under which national banks are organized so that the rate of interest charged by such banks shall be uniform, so as to inflict upon any association attempting to charge more than the legal rate of interest such penalty as may be deemed proper for the purpose of enforcing a compliance with the legal rate.

Mr. EGGLESTON and Mr. KELLEY demanded the regular order.

NAVAL DEPOT AT LEAGUE ISLAND.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business of yesterday, being the consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 452) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to accept League Island, in the river Delaware, for naval purposes, on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to consent that this bill be postponed until after the morning hour, so that the regular reports of committees may be received, and thus the regular business of the morning hour will not be interfered with.

Mr. KELLEY. Does the gentleman mean that the bill shall be considered from day to day until disposed of?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have no objection to that.

Mr. KELLEY. I had hoped that the consideration of this matter might be closed to-day, so as not further to interfere with the regular business of the House. This bill has been the general order since the 3d of March last, and I hope the gentleman will not object to our going on with the consideration of this bill at once.

The SPEAKER. Unless by unanimous consent, if this matter is postponed until after the morning hour of to-day, the reconstruction measures, being special orders of an anterior date, will have priority.

Mr. KELLEY. I should hesitate very much about consenting to anything that might put this bill out of its regular position.

Mr. PIKE. I object to any postponement of the regular order.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, the bill now under consideration is one reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs of this House after very mature consideration and elaborate examination for the purpose of giving legislative sanction to a well-considered and often-expressed wish of our late President and of the present Secretary of the Navy. Indeed, I may say the entire Navy as well as the Department deem the acquisition of the magnificent donation offered by the city of Philadelphia a question of almost vital importance to the future Navy of the country.

The attention of Congress was called to this question by the Secretary of the Navy as early as the 25th of March, 1862, by a letter addressed by him to the Naval Committee; and from that time to this he has made no annual communication to Congress in which he has not pressed upon its attention the importance of the subject. In addition to these annual communications he has twice communicated specially with the Naval Committee, and once with the House through the Speaker, to urge the acceptance of League Island for a freshwater naval station.

This is not a local project. It was not suggested by the constituency I have the honor to represent, or the great city of which it is a part. The attention of that community was drawn to it by the Navy Department, which, having sent forth a commission to ascertain the most available site for an establishment for the repair and laying up iron vessels, the one that combined the most advantages with the fewest disadvantages, and having had its attention directed to League Island by that commission, inquired of the mayor of Philadelphia as to how title could be acquired to the island. The response of the mayor, in the name of the city, not only gave the requisite information but was coupled with a tender of the island as a gift to the Government for naval purposes.

The question was then brought to the attention of Congress by the Secretary and President, and was acted upon; but unhappily for the country it was, in view of certain local, and, as was supposed, rival interests, coupled with a provision for a commission of inquiry, such as I am informed will be again suggested to the House to-day as a dilatory measure. The commission resulted in a report made by honorable and intelligent gentlemen, and honestly made by the majority of them, which for ludicrousness of misstatement—if it were not for the gravity of the matter—has never been equaled in a state paper. The report was false in fact, false in inference, and false in conclusion, and was regretted, sir, by several of the distinguished men who signed it as profoundly as it can be by any man.

Do gentlemen ask how such a result could be obtained at such hands? I answer, we know something of the effect of a skillful resort to parliamentary rules; we know something of the results of political jugglery or shrewd political management; and we understand how resolutions adopted by that commission in the outset of its investigations that all questions of engineering and of physical facts should be referred to a corrupt or partisan engineer, led to the unhappy results to which I allude.

I will illustrate, sir, the corruptness, for he is not ignorant, of the engineer to whom those questions were referred. One of them was the question of the relative population lying within a given area adjacent to two designated points, New London and Philadelphia. That engineer reported (and this error runs through and colors the whole report) that New London had a much larger population within the given area than Philadelphia, because it embraced the immense population of the city of New York as a contiguous city; while there is not a gentleman on this floor who does not know that from Philadelphia to New York the distance is ninety miles, while from New York to New London the distance is one hundred and fifty miles; that the running time between Philadelphia and New York is less than four hours, while the running time between New York and New London is about six hours.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him to name the gentlemen who constituted the commission of which he speaks?

Mr. KELLEY. I will do so; and I will inform my friend that some of the gentlemen who signed the majority report now regret having done so; and it was by one of them that my attention was called to the matter of which I have just spoken, he having seen the absurd consequences of the statements presented by the engineer. The gentlemen constituting the commission were Professor Baché, the chief of the Coast Survey, Commodore Gardner, Commodore Stringham, Commodore Van Brunt, and Captain Marston, and W. P. S. Sanger, civil engineer. Professor Baché, who understood engineering very thoroughly, and Captain Marston, made a report dissenting from that of the majority.

In this connection my attention has been called to a pamphlet, the production of a gentleman the victim of a monomania, who believes it to be his mission to force the United States Government to establish its station for iron vessels in salt water at a beautiful sea-side village which is so exposed to sea airs in peace and foreign assault in war that no enterprising New England manufacturer has ever ventured to start a manufactory there—New London, which may have a village blacksmith shop, but which has not and never has had a manufactory; which by the census of 1860 was found to have a population of 11,100 men, women, and children, being some thousands less than the number of skilled workmen in metals then found in the city of Philadelphia. That enthusiast or monomaniac tells us that that commission reported against League Island and in favor of New London, and he tells us that the report was made by a commission one half of whom were Philadelphians. Sir, it was made by four officers of the United States Navy, one citizen of this District of Columbia, the distinguished chief of the Coast Survey, who had resided here for more than twenty-one years, and one civil engineer, and it is only true that one of those naval officers resided in Philadelphia.

That report, Mr. Speaker, false as it was in fact, theory, and conclusion, and deplored as its effects have been by some of those who signed it, prevented Congress from accepting the proposed gift, and led to a more thorough investigation of the subject.

The commission, misled by the engineer in whom it had confided, reported that League Island was a mass of alluvium deposited by two rivers at their confluence. Careful investigation, illustrated by boring the island, as Mr. Sanger would not do, though frequently solicited thereto, at numerous points over the five hundred acres of its surface, has shown that it has a surface of three feet to three feet and a half of clay, and then a substratum of clay laminated with fine sand, and that at from twenty to twenty-five feet you come upon coarse gravel and boulders. Thus science has verified the assertions at which that commission sneered, that in 1690 the London Land Company acquired title to League Island, known in the language of the day as "cripple land," signifying land which is in part covered by the tide and in part overgrown with sturdy oaks and other trees of the forest. League Island is part of the main land of Pennsylvania, and not an accumulation of alluvial deposit, as that commission, misled by a corrupt or partisan engineer, reported.

That report, so unfounded in fact, created an impression that the island would require ten feet of filling up, while four and a half feet of filling up will bring its whole surface to the level of the wharves of Philadelphia and the present naval station at that city.

The great want of the Navy before the war was wharfrage. With all our stations we had not wharfrage enough to lay up our small Navy. Since the war that want has been aggravated many hundred fold. But with the war there entered into our service a new element which makes League Island almost the only place in the country at which an economical and adequate station for the wants of the Navy can be established. There alone can be found in fresh water adequate water front for the laying up of our iron-clad ships. Salt water is the deadly enemy of iron. It not only gnaws into its vitals, peels it off, shell by shell, until it crumbles into dust, but it fastens to its surface all sorts of parasites and barnacles, so that an English ship returning from a two years' cruise had no less than ten tons of crustacea removed from her surface. These parasites diminish the speed of the vessel and throw the action of the salt water upon the few unexposed parts of the surface, where it bores literally, as if by mechanical power, into the sheathing of the vessel.

The gift which Philadelphia offers the Government is an island with river front on the Delaware to the extent of two miles and three eighths, on the Schuylkill front seven sixteenths of a mile, and on the back channel, delineated on this map, as gentlemen will see, and which is three hundred yards wide, a basin parallel with the island of two miles and five eighths of front. In that back channel or natural wet basin at this time are the river and harbor monitors, larger iron-clads, several double-enders, and other vessels, and they have remained there during one of the severest winters we have had in Philadelphia for many years alike secure from the effects of salt water and ice. The Naval Committee, I beg the House to observe, visited the island and examined those monitors and other vessels on the 17th of February, the coldest day of last winter, and found that they were undisturbed and unaffected by the floating ice of the river or the fixed ice of the back channel. Sir, that channel or basin is, I am assured by naval officers of experience, capable of containing the combined navies of the United States, England, and France. No nation in the world has its equal as a safe harbor for an iron navy laid up in ordinary; for no nation has such a body of fresh water accessible to the largest sea-going vessels.

It is said that it will require expenditure to fit up a station here. It will involve some outlay, but not such as gentlemen apprehend. To dredge the channel will fill the island to an adequate height.

There need be brought to it no cinders, slag, or gravel, even were we to engage in the Quixotic work of converting the whole into a naval station at the outset. To deepen the channel will, I repeat, supply the material with which to fill up the island. But the bill provides a fund with which to defray these expenditures.

We have the Philadelphia navy-yard, containing about twenty acres, which now obstructs the commercial growth and development of that city. The bill proposes to sell that yard, at the earliest day it can be done with convenience to the service, and to apply the proceeds, a million and a half or two million dollars, to the dredging out of the back channel, the filling of the surface of this island, and the construction of workshops.

There is no unusual appropriation asked for this work. On the other hand, it will gradually complete itself. What the Government wants at this time is wharfrage and space in fresh water in which to lay up its iron-clads in ordinary, and here it can have it without a dollar of outlay, for here they can lie for years as they have lain through the past winter. This want is supplied by nature, and the accommodations can be expanded and perfected from year to year without unusual appropriations.

But, sir, let me invoke the weight of authority. I voted yesterday for a bill against which my private judgment ran. I voted for it because a careful committee recommended it, and because every military man that I knew in the House, save one, and it related to military matters, sustained it. I submitted my individual judgment to that of the committee and those who knew more of the matter in hand than I did. So the Naval Committee, after a personal examination of the premises, after an elaborate examination of Admiral Smith, the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, of Commodore Turner, who is in charge of iron-clad vessels in the back channel of the island, and of Captain Fox, who has given years of consideration to this question and kindred questions, recommend this bill. But I propose to add a little force to the recommendation of the committee, sustained as it is by these weighty authorities.

To this end let me read a brief letter addressed by Admiral Porter to the chairman of the Naval Committee. I invite the attention of gentlemen to the admiral's views, as I apprehend that he is as capable of judging of a question of this kind as I or any other member of this House:

WASHINGTON CITY, May 9, 1866.

DEAR SIR: Mr. Fox informs me that some one is quoting me as being an advocate for placing a navy-yard at New London in preference to League Island. I do not know that my opinion is of any consequence, but if it is, permit me to say that I have been one of the strongest advocates in favor of League Island, and never considered New London or any other place so near the sea fit for a navy-yard. League Island can be made all that the Navy requires, and I fully endorse the pamphlet that was issued by the proprietors, and which I read with much interest.

I remain, respectfully, yours,

DAVID D. PORTER,
Rear Admiral.

Hon. A. H. RICE.

So, too, Commodore Stribling, who has been opposed to the acceptance of League Island, and who has been cited more than once by my adversary as against me in this matter, after he had made a thorough investigation of the facts, and disabused himself of Engineer Sangser's misstatements, says:

"MY DEAR SIR: I have received the pamphlet entitled 'Advantages of League Island,' &c., for which I thank you. It is a full and fair discussion of the advantages of that island for a naval station, dock-yard, and fresh-water basin for iron-clad ships and other vessels-of-war, and I am free to confess that it is now apparent to me that it possesses advantages over any other place named for that purpose, and I hope Congress will pass the necessary laws to enable the Department to commence the work upon the island, to make it such a place as the necessities of the service require."

I go still further in the same direction, and turn to a letter of Commodore Turner, who has been in charge of the island and channel and of the iron-clads and other vessels laid up there, and who has done whatever work has been done at League Island. So early as February 8, 1866, he wrote me as follows:

IRON-CLAD OFFICE, UNITED STATES NAVY-YARD,
PHILADELPHIA, February 8, 1866.

MY DEAR SIR: As it is possible that the "League Island" question will come up before long, and you are a delegate from this city, it is proper that you should be informed that a person calling himself "Bolles," an evident emissary and agent of the "New London" speculators, has been paying a visit to the vessels at League Island, and publishing his observations in a New London paper, giving garbled accounts of his conversations with the officers on duty there, for the purpose of prejudicing that locality and preventing its acceptance by an act of Congress. No doubt this man has been furnishing the enemies of League Island in Congress with damaging information, grounded, as he says in his published letter, upon the opinions of the officers employed there, which they, in essential particulars, deny. He made a second visit there, and was recognized at once, and ordered off, and we shall not be troubled with him again. I tell you these things that you may make use of them in case he should be cited as an authority when the subject comes up. In my charge and experience of that place I am so fully armed with unanswerable arguments in its favor, derived from personal knowledge of everything about it, that I think if the proposition to take it is to be decided in the Naval Committee before a bill is reported, I ought to be examined before that committee. I think it would be such an egregious and inexcusable blunder to let it get out of the hands of the Government, or to let the chance to get possession of it slip by, that I am very anxious to see it secured; and if it is not taken we shall have a pretty smart annual expense, I imagine, to incur for the accommodation of the vessels there when it is known that it is not the purpose of the Government to receive it. You may have seen extraordinary accounts in the recent French papers of the destruction of their iron-clads by the salt water in which they lie. They state if some protection is not invented to stay the corrosive process of salt water five years will use them up. This is a powerful argument in favor of fresh water, which our vessels lie in.

Very truly, yours,

T. TURNER,
Commodore United States Navy.

In accordance with the suggestion contained in his letter, Commodore Turner, in the presence of, and in conjunction with, Admiral Smith, the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, was examined very fully by the Naval Committee; and influenced by the opinion of these experts, of these scientific men, these men of naval experience, the committee agreed upon this bill and instructed me to report it to the House.

With a single remark or two I shall close. I ask gentlemen to note what this bill is. It does not propose a commission to ascertain the capacity of our country for establishing naval stations. It does not propose a commission to learn whether New England can contain more than three naval stations, for she has now three of the four now in operation. I grant you that the New York yard does not lie within the geographical limits of New England, but it lies east of the Hudson and at one end of the Sound, which is the great inland water of New England, known as the American Mediterranean, Long Island Sound; another of them is at Boston or Charlestown; the third is at Kittery, Maine. The only other available yard on the Atlantic coast is the one at Philadelphia, and in a brief note to me to-day Admiral Porter refers to its diminutive proportions as a reproach to the American people. I met him to-day, and fearing that the chairman of the Naval Committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RICE,] might still be absent, he placed in my hand this note:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 6, 1866.

DEAR SIR: Some one, I see, is quoting me as being opposed to the location of a navy-yard at League Island. I take the liberty of stating to you that this is not so. I have always been in favor of League Island. I consider the present navy-yard at Philadelphia a reproach to the country. We have not a single navy-yard that meets the requirements of the Navy. Some persons object to League Island owing to its distance from the sea. That is its chief merit; it is away from the attacks of an enemy. I hope that Congress will give us one decent navy-yard, and it can be done at League Island.

I remain, respectfully, yours,

DAVID D. PORTER,
Rear Admiral.

The navy-yard at Philadelphia, to which he refers, has one tenth the wharfage of the English naval station at the neighboring island of Bermuda. It has one twentieth of the proportions of the private ship-yard of John Laird, the builder of the buccaners of the southern confederacy.

The people of Philadelphia, in view of the new exigencies of the Navy, propose to give you nine hundred acres of land, and the back channel, being land covered with water, which, as I have said, by the construction of marine gates and a dredging-machine employed from month to month as you require it to reclaim the channel, you will have a station such as no other naval Power can have, and one unequalled by any save the growing one—I mean growing in perfection, not in dimensions—at Mare Island, on the Pacific coast, and have it, sir, without making now or hereafter an extraordinary appropriation.

The bill does not propose to establish a new naval station, it only proposes to enlarge, without expense, one that is almost useless from its want of dimensions.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 308) confirming the title of Alexis Gardapier to a certain tract of land in the county of Brown, and State of Wisconsin; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 99) for the relief of Paul S. Forbes, under his contract with the Navy Department for building and furnishing the steam screw sloop-of-war Idaho.

NAVAL DEPOT AT LEAGUE ISLAND—AGAIN.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I offer the following substitute for the bill reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY:]

Whereas various sites on or near the Atlantic seaboard have been offered to the Government of the United States for naval purposes, with special reference to the repair, construction, and laying up in ordinary of iron vessels; and whereas it is eminently desirable that the best site should be selected by the Government for the purpose named: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint a commission of not less than seven competent officers and engineers, whose duty it shall be to make careful examination and survey of each of said proposed sites, and to report to Congress the comparative advantages or disadvantages of each, and by the selection of which the public interests will best be promoted.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman permit me now to suggest an amendment?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will hear the suggestion.

Mr. HALE. I suggest to him that he insert after the words "said proposed sites," the words, "and such other sites as may be brought to their attention, and which they may deem proper for examination."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I accept that suggestion. I think the amendment a proper one.

Mr. KELLEY. I simply want to throw out this suggestion, that while I am not opposed to the appointment of such a commission, I do not see that the substitute is at all germane to this bill, which relates to a specific object. I regard his proposition as having no reference to the matter now before the House, and I reserve my opinion as to the propriety of it as an independent proposition, should it come up in that form.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Precisely; I did not ask the gentleman's opinion, nor did I think it especially valuable. I have submitted this substitute, and I believe it is within parliamentary rules of order, and with the permission of the gentleman I will now address myself to it.

Mr. Speaker, this project of taking three hundred and seventy-four acres of the mud bottom of the Delaware river, three feet below the surface of that river at ordinary high tide and one hundred miles from the ocean, and there and in such a locality establishing the great national navy-yard of the United States, is not now for the first time before Congress and the country. For four years, with a pertinacity as inexplicable as it is unwarranted and unexampled, that plan has been pressed upon the attention of Congress and the country by certain disinterested gentlemen in the Navy Department, backed up by certain no less disinterested gentlemen from the city of Philadelphia. That subject has been discussed again and again in both branches of Congress. It has been very carefully examined by a competent board composed of engineers and naval officers, ordered by Congress to be raised and selected, not to say packed, by the Secretary of the Navy. It has been examined very carefully by the Naval Committee of the last Congress. It has been discussed in the public press and by naval officers throughout the United States; and by all of them—Congress, the board of officers, the members of the Naval Committee, the press, and a large majority of the naval officers of the United States outside of the Navy Department—it has been met with but one conclusion up to this hour. I cannot more succinctly state that result than by quoting the conclusion to which that board of competent officers, selected by the Secretary of the Navy because of their special fitness for this duty, arrived after a very careful examination. It is as follows:

"Resolved, That in the opinion of this board the public interests will not be promoted by acquiring title to League Island for naval purposes."

That was the conclusion to which that board arrived; that was the result to which the Committee on Naval Affairs of the last Congress arrived with great unanimity; the only exceptions to which were, I believe, the two members from Pennsylvania, who, by the courtesy of the Speaker, were placed upon that committee.

And now, sir, here to-day, after this current of authorities all in one direction, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has, I will not say the hardihood, but at least the confidence, and confidence in his bosom is not "a plant of slow growth"—he has the confidence to stand up here and ask this Congress to adopt a bill which confines the examination of the site for a navy-yard to the precise locality which was rejected by the previous commission, and excludes from examination the one site that had been reported upon favorably by a commission, and all other sites throughout the country which may be proposed.

And while the gentleman has proposed a bill here for the purpose of limiting the inquiry to the Delaware river, and to one site only on that river, and that a site under water, he has himself abandoned his bill, and the theory upon which it proceeds, in the very argument by which he has sought to sustain it before this House. Because if there be any plan or principle at all to his bill, it goes upon the ground that the merits or demerits of a site for a naval station are not to be decided by arguments upon this floor, but must be decided by the examination of a commission of experts, and by that alone. And in that I agree with the gentleman. I do not think it a proper subject to be decided upon this floor, in this noisy Hall, and I think, Mr. Speaker, with all due deference to the House, never more noisy than to-day.

I do not think that these gentlemen here—some of them lawyers, some farmers, some merchants, and many of them engaged in business not connected with the subject under debate—constitute precisely the forum in which a question which involves considerations of topography, of soil, of currents, of tides, of adaptability for naval purposes, can be either argued or appropriately determined. The gentleman therefore was right. The Committee on Naval Affairs were correct when they authorized him to report a bill providing that such questions should be determined in their appropriate forum, to wit, by a board of experts to be raised by order of Congress. That is the theory of the bill; but the gentleman, instead of advocating the bill upon that principle, has wandered from it in going into an argument here as to the merits of the site which he proposes shall be examined.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not follow the bad example of the gentleman in engaging the time of this House in discussing the merits or demerits of the site in which my constituents are more particularly interested. By the substitute which I have proposed here, that and all cognate questions with reference to the site which I advocate and all other sites are to be determined by a commission, if the House shall consent to order a commission. But, sir, I must so far allow myself to be led astray by the example of the gentleman as to follow him a little in that part of his argument in which he addressed himself to the merits of the precise site which he now wishes the House to adopt.

Mr. Speaker, this question for the first time came before Congress and the country, as the gentleman has correctly stated, just four years ago, in June, 1862. About that day in June which corresponds with the day on which this discussion is going on, a bill was presented in the Senate of the United States authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to accept of the title to League Island, provided a commission should recommend its acceptance; and four years ago the advocates of other sites in that Congress, the Thirty-Seventh Congress, presented the precise counter-plan which I present here to-day. It was seen that it was an object for the Government of the United States to get the best site then proposed; and against the opposition of the Delaware interest, and the Philadelphia interest, a rider was attached to that bill and passed the Senate, ordering that the commission which raised should examine all the sites then proposed. History is said to repeat itself. Four years from that day we find the gentleman from Pennsylvania rising here and offering a bill to raise a commission to examine his site, and his site alone. To-day I stand here not advocating an examination of merely the site in which my constituency are interested, but offering as a substitute a proposition that the commission shall examine all the sites which have been proposed—a site on the Hudson, a site on the Patuxent, the site at Portland, the site at New London, and the site on the Delaware river, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania recommends, and a much better site in the Delaware river at Marcus Hook, fifteen or twenty miles below League Island, a site which has been recommended as having superior advantages over League Island by the competent head of the department charged with this very question, the Bureau of Yards and Docks.

Now, sir, inasmuch as I suppose this question is to be finally settled here in some shape to-day, and inasmuch as a record is to be made upon this question, and inasmuch as the Navy Department is quoted as being in favor of the plan which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has proposed to the House, I wish to have a final settlement of accounts before the American people, and to leave upon the record here the views of the Navy Department and the acts of the Navy Department with reference to this question, that this House may see how valuable, how disinterested the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy and the Assistant Secretary of the Navy is upon this subject.

Now, sir, when Congress at that time ordered a board of competent officers to make an examination, the question was between three sites then proposed—League Island, New London, and a site in Narraganset bay. By the law of Congress the Secretary of the Navy was directed to appoint a commission to examine all three sites, and report by the selection of which the public interest would be best promoted. The Secretary of the Navy selected, to constitute that board, three gentlemen who were either then residents or originally natives of the city of Philadelphia.

That was a disinterested board. It was an impartial board in its construction. It turned out at least that they were by the result. I speak now of the motives by which the Secretary of the Navy may be presumed to have been actuated. This was a board of six officers, three of whom were from Philadelphia, either by residence or nativity. The fourth man of that board of six was the engineer of the Department, himself supposed to be cognizant of the views of the Secretary. I make no complaint now of the construction of that board, because it turned out to be an honest and competent board. By a majority of four to two, the two being residents and natives of Philadelphia, that board decided it was not for the public interest that League Island should be selected, or even accepted as a gift.

Further, one of the persons put on that board by this disinterested Secretary was Professor Bache, who has been named already, and it is not therefore indelicate for me to refer to it, a man who before his appointment had written a letter, then on file in the Navy Department, in which he favored the selection of League Island to the exclusion of all other places. I go one step further on my responsibility here, and I take the responsibility of saying that while that board was proceeding to make that examination a letter was sent from the Navy Department to that board, a board of honorable officers of the Navy, a letter from the Navy Department stating that that Department expected the board to find in favor of League Island. Sir, Admiral Stringham, an honorable naval officer who presided over that board, then fresh from his victory at Hatteras, the first naval victory of the war—Admiral Stringham, like an honorable man, took up his hat and left the session of the board, saying that he would no longer sit on a board under duress as that; and it was only after that letter was withdrawn that he finally consented to continue on this board.

That board found that League Island was not a fit place, and they have spread upon this record, to be found in the document room, fifteen solid reasons why it was unfit for a naval station. For the first time the gentleman from Pennsylvania—let him settle with the gentleman whom he has slandered—charges that the engineer of the Department was corrupt enough to be operated on and influenced, and that through his influence the remainder of the board were corrupt enough to find objection against League Island contrary to the facts in the case.

Mr. KELLEY. I will ask the gentleman a single question, and it is whether the city of New York lies nearer to New London than to Philadelphia? I propose to test the integrity or corruption of that engineer by that question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not conceive that that is pertinent to the charge that an officer of the Government has been corrupt enough to find a report against the facts in the case. I will answer the question, howsoever, although the gentleman will bear me witness I did not interrupt him in the course of his speech; and he will have an hour in which to close this debate after he has locked up debate on the part of all others by the call for the previous question.

Mr. KELLEY. Nor did I denounce the terrors of any man's vengeance on the gentleman. He has not yet answered the question which will settle, in the estimation of every member upon this floor, the honesty of the engineer who made that report.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the gentleman had restrained his impetuosity I would have finished my answer. I say that New London, by water, is by many hours nearer to New York than Philadelphia. The question was one of transportation of the supplies and munitions of war for the defense of one or the other place. That commission found that for the defense of New London, for the protection of the site and accumulation of skilled workmen; for military purposes; for the transportation by water of munitions of war, New London is nearer to New York than Philadelphia. If a man does not believe that statement let him go by the Sound from New London to New York, and then from New York down the coast, up the Delaware river to Philadelphia, and if he has a watch or almanac he will know which is nearest.

Mr. KELLEY. One moment, and I will promise not to interrupt the gentleman again even if he denounces the vengeance of hereafter upon me. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Thank you. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. The question submitted to the engineer was not that indicated by the gentleman, but was the available force nearest to each point for defense. I will further ask the gentleman whether in these days during war we transport troops by water and circuitous water routes when there are railroad connections between the points; and if there are not within his knowledge railroad connections between Philadelphia and New York, and New York and New London; and whether Philadelphia is not but two thirds the distance from New York that New London is.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted by my friend I was upon the question of the construction of this board and the influence brought to bear by the Secretary of the Navy upon the board when they were in the progress of their examination. The fact was that the board was composed of those who were influenced by local considerations besides the influence brought to bear on them from the Department.

I now state what I think must be a surprise to this House, that after this board had made this report, under the law of Congress by which the Secretary of the Navy was required by the decision of that board to locate this yard at one point or the other, the Secretary of the Navy in his next report ignored the conclusion to which that board had arrived, and expressly said in his annual report, "I propose to accept from the city of Philadelphia the munificent gift of League Island unless Congress shall otherwise direct." And, sir, it will be borne in mind that the Senate immediately, by a very decisive vote, declared that the Secretary of the Navy should not take it without the consent of Congress. And I know it to be the fact that when I came to the Thirty-Eighth Congress efforts were made by the Navy Department to keep me off the Naval Committee—I having had no connection with the subject—an interference with the organization of this House which, if it had occurred in England two hundred years ago, would have sent a Cabinet minister to the Tower as a breach of the privilege of the Commons.

The Navy Department did not, however, succeed. But I found as my associates on the committee two members from Pennsylvania, rather an unusual thing in the construction of committees in this House. The question came before that committee in the last Congress, and for two months we were engaged in examining it both upon personal investigation and in the hearing of witnesses and argument; we heard everything that could be said in argument on the subject; we took testimony, and by a large majority the committee came to a conclusion reaffirming the opinion of the board of officers as contained in the report which I hold in my hand. I quote the language of the Naval Committee of the last Congress:

"LEAGUE ISLAND.—The committee entered upon an examination of this site prepared to find very many advantages in its favor for the proposed establishment. Its geographical position, its situation upon one of our largest rivers, and the advantage claimed for it of fresh water, its vicinity to a large city, and the skilled labor obtainable therefrom, its proximity to the great beds of iron and coal, for which Pennsylvania is justly famous, with other advantages, from the first challenged the attention of the committee, and were strongly pressed upon them during the examination by the friends of this locality. Allowing these their due weight, however, so many and formidable objections were developed upon a thorough investigation that the committee came to the conclusion "that the public interests would not be promoted" by its selection—many of the advantages claimed for it, upon examination, turning out to be quite inapplicable to other localities, and some of the objections seeming to your committee, from their very nature and magnitude, insuperable."

But we did not get decisive action in that Congress, although there was a strong pressure from the Navy Department brought to bear upon Congress in favor of League Island. The question then came to this Congress, and now, after four years of war to get League Island into the Union, or rather to get it into daylight, above the level of the water—a war which, in the language of a celebrated platform, has thus far proved to be a failure—it remains for Congress to say upon this day's debate whether it now shall be a success. The gentleman at last, negating all other sites, all the conclusions of the Committee on Naval Affairs, of the experts of the commission ordered by Congress, comes and presents his bill in favor of an examination of this site, and this site alone.

Now, I will ask the attention of the House for one moment to this bill. Let us see what its provisions are. It is a very artful bill. It does quite as much if not more credit to the gentleman's ingenuity than to his fairness and magnanimity. It holds the word of promise to the ear but breaks it to the hope. It assumes to provide that a commission shall first examine the site, (the gentleman not having the confidence to ask the House, upon its merits, to decide in favor of League Island,) and that the island shall not be accepted unless that commission shall report in favor of it as fitted for a naval station. Now, I say that the bill provides no such thing, but is artfully and designedly contrived, as I believe, to prevent any such thing. I say contrived, because the bill follows, for a certain length, the original bill presented to the Senate in 1862, and then switches off at a convenient point which provided for a thorough examination and survey of League Island.

What does this bill provide? In its substantive enacting clause it provides that the Secretary of the Navy shall be authorized to receive and accept League Island, and then qualifies it by providing that it shall not be accepted unless—what? Unless a commission upon a "thorough examination and survey" shall report it to be a good place for a naval station, as the other bill did? Not at all. It cunningly interpolates other language at that point and provides that it shall not be received and accepted unless "the acceptance shall be recommended" by a board of officers. Does it provide, or was it intended to provide, that that board should make "an examination and survey with reference to its adaptability for a naval station?" No, sir. Why then did the gentleman abandon the language of the first bill? By the first bill the board were required to examine and report as to whether it was a good place for a naval station. This provides that it shall not be accepted unless "its acceptance" shall be recommended by the commission.

What will this commission do? Finding a bill has been passed by Congress accepting the title of League Island, provided they shall recommend its acceptance, and knowing the wish of the Navy Department to be that it shall be accepted, and having the land offered to the Government, of course the commission will recommend its acceptance as a valuable donation to the Government—not specially for naval purpose, not for a basin for iron-clads, not upon "examination and survey," which they are not required to make, but as a "munificent" donation of six hundred acres of land, in the lofty language of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. DELANO. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for an inquiry?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It will be no interruption from that quarter.

Mr. DELANO. I wish to inquire what will be the probable expense of a naval station at League Island.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It will give me the greatest pleasure to answer that question in that part of my argument in which I shall address myself to that part of the subject. I hope I shall not forget so important a question; if I do I will thank the gentleman to remind me of it before I get through.

Now, if I can get the attention of the House for a very few moments, I will read from the report of Admiral Stringham. I do not pretend to offer myself as a disinterested witness on this question. Everybody knows the interest by which I am biased. I ask this House to believe nothing of my statements except it is corroborated by the testimony of disinterested witnesses or supported by sound argument. Now, if those who feel an interest in the American Navy and in so important a question as this will listen a moment, I will read from this report, signed by Admiral Stringham and three others of the highest naval authorities of this country. On page 16 of that report, I read the following:

"League Island is a reclaimed marsh, surrounded by a dry stone wall and embankment of earth, raised to exclude the river. A portion of the island was reclaimed many years since, and is known as the old meadow. We have no positive information on this point, but we presume that at the time the wall and embankment were built all the land worth reclaiming was embraced within the inclosure. Subsequently, and about eighteen years since, as we are informed, the inclosure was extended so as to embrace an additional area, now known as the new meadow. According to a plan which has been submitted to the board by a committee from the Board of Trade, this old meadow contains two hundred and nineteen acres and the new meadow one hundred and fifty-five acres."

My friend, who I suppose has studied Daboll's Arithmetic, by putting together these two sums, one hundred and fifty-five and two hundred and nineteen, will find the precise area of this island. If my mathematics are not at fault it amounts to only three hundred and seventy-four acres. Where, then, are the six hundred acres of valuable land for this grand naval station, according to the assertion constantly made by the Department, and which the gentleman has repeated here to-day? Sir, there are but three hundred and seventy-four acres there at best.

"On the north of the island, and between it and the main there is a channel." And here is the point where they propose to make a basin for our iron-clads. "There is a channel which, we are told, was of sufficient depth in former days to float large ships-of-war; now it is a narrow and shallow channel, not sufficient to float vessels of any size used by the Navy."

And Admiral Smith, whom the gentleman quotes, the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, told us in his testimony that the iron-clads which were there to-day were aground three feet in the mud; and I am credibly informed that the bottoms of two of them have been stove through during the past winter.

"Large areas of marshes have formed on the east and west ends and on the north side of the island, and the whole appearance indicates a constant and rapid accumulation from the immense deposits of the Delaware river. To raise the surface of the island"—and I call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] particularly to this point—"To raise the surface of this island to a height which would render it safe from the encroachment of high tides will require a filling of from nine to ten feet over the whole area; and if, as has been suggested, a line of wharf front be carried out to the twenty-three feet line," which is where the water in the channel is twenty-three feet deep. For bear in mind the face of this island is about three or four hundred yards from this channel, and the water along the front line of the island is not deep enough, and you must go out to the twenty-three foot line of depth before you can get a place for a vessel to lay in. And to do that, "will involve an additional filling of a space one mile long, and averaging four hundred and eighty-one feet wide and nineteen feet deep."

And then the report goes on to say, "To furnish the materials for this immense filling, which will amount in the aggregate to several millions of cubic yards, it is said that an abundant supply can be had from Red Bank, on the opposite side of the river;" that is in the State of New Jersey. They have to go over to New Jersey to get the necessary filling to build up this island. For bear in mind that the whole main land in contiguity to League Island is as low as the island itself, and is diked to prevent the water from overflowing it. There is no place there where materials can be obtained for this filling in, but they must go to New Jersey for it. I do not know whether it is free soil in New Jersey or not. I suppose not, for this report goes on with rather quaint humor to say: "There is probably an abundance of good material on the shores of New Jersey, but it must be purchased from the proprietors and transported across the river; a process which, in the opinion of the board, will involve an expenditure of at least one million dollars."

Now, everybody who came before the Naval Committee of this Congress agreed that there must be this filling to the extent of three, six, or nine feet. Assistant Secretary Fox—a very high authority upon questions of naval engineering, of course, he being a lieutenant in the Navy, and from a lieutenantancy having been translated to the Navy Department, and now, we hope, translated to a more honorable and comfortable position abroad—Assistant Secretary Fox himself agreed that it must be filled three feet. Admiral Smith, the chief of the bureau who has charge of this matter, testified that it must be filled to the level of the wall, or at least nine feet.

Now, to get rid of this objection of having to go to the New Jersey shore to get dirt for this filling, a most ingenious plan was suggested by Assistant Secretary Fox, whose name, even, is suggestive of ingenuity upon that subject. He suggested to the committee that this back channel, which had been filled up by the accumulation of the immense deposits from the Delaware, should be dredged out and spread upon the island, although the island is now so soft that you cannot put a building upon it with less than fifty or sixty feet piling from the surface. And in a letter volunteered to the committee—and he has written a great many letters to the committee, besides seeing its members, and a great many members of the House—in a letter to the committee he suggested that that plan ought to commend itself to the judgment of the committee on account of its practicability, economy, and healthfulness—an island upon which no man can live without shaking the clothes off his back with fever and ague; an island in reference to the healthfulness of which I wish to submit some evidence from a paper which I hold in my hand—it is a copy of the Real Estate, Railroad, and Business Guide of January 15, 1866, published in the city of Philadelphia, copies of which were sent to members of Congress during this session—a paper which advocates the claims of League Island, and appeals to the Philadelphia delegation to support that project in this language:

"Do not forget the advantages combined by nature to make Red Bank a fort of the first magnitude, and League Island, opposite, a shipping port, not to be surpassed in the world, from its advantageous location for the shipment of western or eastern produce, winter and summer, having always a sufficient depth of water, and the water at that point being brackish or saline, does not freeze."

This is the fresh-water site on the Delaware river, one of the chief advantages of which, according to the recommendation of a Philadelphia journal, is the fact that the water at this point is brackish or saline, and consequently does not freeze.

Then there is a statement in reference to the question of healthfulness. The writer goes on to say:

"This proposition, faithfully carried out, would make Philadelphia a commercial port second to none in the United States, nature having made the junction of the Delaware and Schuylkill, with its flat strip of land about seven miles in length, and an average of three miles in breadth, giving twenty-one square miles below the navy-yard for a shipping port and harbor of great magnitude, such as few other ports ever possessed—which, by the way, is scarcely fit from the surrounding miasma for anything else, not fit for the habitation of human beings—which, if built up for that purpose, malignant atmospheric disease is always first to attack such localities."

The gentleman is welcome to the authority—a paper published in Philadelphia and representing the claims of League Island. This journal says that the land is so unhealthy by reason of the miasma, that it is not fit for human habitation; yet Secretary Fox and the committee following him recommend to the House to dig out the back channel and put millions of cubic yards of mud and ooze and slime and vegetable deposit on that island, and the chief recommendation is on account of its healthfulness and economy. What the healthfulness of such a plan may be when the dog-star blazes in the firmament above us, I leave to conjecture rather than argument.

As to its economy, even according to the testimony of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, as given before the committee, he estimates the cost of filling up the island to the height of three feet with mud from this channel to be $900,000, and if it be filled up to the height of nine feet, as Admiral Smith says must be done, and as this commission says must be done, the cost will be $2,700,000. In addition to that Admiral Smith testified before the committee that if it should be filled with mud it would be necessary to place on top three feet of gravel in order to make a solid surface for teams and men. Hence, to the expense of $2,700,000 for placing mud upon this island there must be added a sum of $1,000,000 for placing gravel to the depth of three feet over that mud, making in the aggregate about four million dollars as the amount necessary to fill up this island; and when this is done you have an island for the first time above the water. There is a League Island then. It is brought into sunlight for the first time. Then you must pile every foot and rod of that ooze before it will be safe to put a permanent structure upon it, as is testified to by every witness, with one exception, Mr. George Davidson, of Philadelphia; all the other witnesses, including Mr. Secretary Fox, Admiral Smith, Commodore Turner, the members of this commission, and in fact everybody who knows anything about the subject or who is any authority upon the subject, acknowledge that you must pile all that part of the island used for heavy structures, and according to the judgment of this commission the piling must be on an average of thirty-two feet in depth, in some cases twenty-five, and in others fifty-six, making an average of thirty-two.

What is this piling? Admiral Smith explained the process to the committee. You must drive the piles within one foot or one foot and a half of each other. Then, where are you going to put the buildings? There must be cross-piling. On top of the timber there must be laid a foundation of cement and stone. When all this is done you have for the first time a foundation for your buildings. When before the committee the inquiry was put to Admiral Smith as to the probable expense of all this, that wise old man shook his head very sagely and said that he for one was not able to form even a conjectural approximation as to the expense, but he would say that it was the most expensive process known to naval or civil engineering. When this is done it will be necessary to build a quay wall of stone nineteen feet high and one mile long, and fill up behind that wall four hundred and eighty-one feet in width in order to get from the face of the island out to the channel of twenty-three feet, where vessels can lie.

These are facts which are supported by the testimony of men in whom we ought to have confidence, men who have been enlightened by long service in the Navy, the most competent minds in the country with reference to naval affairs.

Now, I say that nobody can pretend to conjecture the expense, or even approximate to it, of selecting this site for a naval station. I do not stand here and say that it shall not be the site of the great naval station of the United States. I propose in the bill which I have submitted to the House as a substitute for the report of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] that a commission shall be raised of honest men, of officers and engineers, to be appointed by the President, not by the Secretary of the Navy—and I commend the gentleman for his prudence in taking that authority from this Secretary and giving it to the President of the United States, and he may explain it to the Secretary in any way he pleases—a commission to which this subject shall be intrusted. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has much assurance, but he had not assurance enough to put this matter within the power of the Secretary of the Navy. He asks that the commission shall be appointed by the President, and so do I. The difference between his plan and mine is this: by mine this commission is required to make a thorough examination of the advantages and disadvantages of the several sites; by his it is confined to one, and that one the only one heretofore rejected by a competent board. I ask this House whether that is not a fair proposition. Is not the substitute a fair proposition? There are five places offered for this great naval station—one or two on the Hudson, one on the Patuxent, one at Portland, Maine, one at League Island, and one at New London.

By an amendment of the gentleman from

New York I have included any other site they may choose to examine and report on. Is not that a fair proposition? Has not the Government of the United States the right to have the best place for this purpose in the United States? Shall we be narrowed down by the Navy Department or the Philadelphia delegation to the examination of one site, and one site alone, and that the only site ever rejected by a competent board? Do I ask anything unreasonable? I do not ask you to accept New London. I do not ask you to examine New London alone. I do not, as I might, like the gentleman from Pennsylvania, confine the report of the commission to New London. I say examine all places, and let us have that which is best.

I will say one thing further. I do not think I betray any confidence. I believe I have the right to make the statement. It is this: when I first submitted my proposition to the gentleman from Pennsylvania he accepted it.

Mr. KELLEY. Does the gentleman speak of me?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I speak of and to you. Mr. KELLEY. Under a grave misrepresentation I was induced to accept it. As soon as I conferred with the gentleman whose opinions were said to have been given to me, and found I had been deceived, I retracted my acceptance.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know to what misrepresentations the gentleman alludes.

Mr. KELLEY. Those the gentleman made to me.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. This matter is getting a little personal between the gentleman and myself, and is away from the subject under consideration. After he presented his bill, I drew up my substitute and submitted it to him, urging it by the same considerations which I have just presented.

Mr. KELLEY. And by considerations which the gentleman does not present.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Wait a moment. I told him, as I now tell him, the proposition to establish the naval station at League Island would be voted down if put upon its own merits; that aside from any other consideration this House would not sustain it. I thought I was warranted in saying that my proposition would be acceptable to a majority of the committee as well as to a majority of the House.

Mr. KELLEY. All the gentleman says he represented to me he did, and more, and it was the more which controlled me.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will any man name to me an objection to my substitute? Will any man tell the House that it does not allow fair play? Certainly not, for it permits this commission to examine and report on all the sites which have been proposed.

I can see but two objections to it, which I can dispose of in a few minutes. One is that it may involve additional expense. How much? We had a practical application of that question at the last session of Congress. Twelve places were suggested as sites for a western iron-clad navy-yard. This Congress, though it was well known the Navy Department were in favor of Carondelet, did not confine the commission to that place, but directed them to examine all of the places. What is the expense of it? The whole expense of the commission which examined twelve sites at the West amounted to $2,500, including expressage, a stenographer, and the preparation of this report, and of that $2,500, $850 was given to a gentleman not connected with the military or naval service, Mr. G. W. Blunt, of New York, a civilian, and a very competent and able one for that purpose.

Under my proposition, the President is to detail military or naval officers and engineers to examine these sites. It will not cost $2,000. These men are entitled by law, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] well knows, to no compensation. There is an express law that officers detailed for such duty are not entitled to compensation. They get merely their mileage. Now, there are a number of military and naval officers, fresh from war on land and sea, who would enjoy such an expedition this summer. And, sir, they cannot be better employed at an expense of $2,000. What are they to do? To examine these different sites, and spread upon the records of the country for future use the advantages and disadvantages of all these places. We may need this information some day, and it will be worth all it costs. We may need another yard for this purpose besides the one at League Island or at New London; and we shall have valuable information spread upon the archives of Congress and the Department in reference to the comparative merits of these various sites. Is it not worth while to get that information at so cheap a cost?

The only other objection to my substitute is that it may involve delay. How much? This can all be done in two months. The first commission completed their inquiry in less than two months. And you can get no legislation upon this subject before the next session of Congress, whether you adopt my proposition or that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. No time will be lost, therefore, and we shall know more about the advantages and disadvantages of these places, and shall be prepared to act more intelligently than now. I cannot, therefore, see any objection to this plan. Maryland has offered a site, New York has offered a site, and Maine has offered a site, besides the two which we have been discussing. I ask the House whether they will adopt this scheme to examine this one site alone, and offer a cold refusal to the examination of other sites. This is a question of comparative advantages and disadvantages. The commission may examine League Island and say that it is a good place for the purpose, whereas if they went to these other points, by a comparison of the advantages and disadvantages they might determine which was the best place, which they cannot determine by an examination of one.

Now, one thing more. This House the other day set a precedent on this subject. My friend from Maine [Mr. LYNN] offered a proposition that a commission should be detailed to examine Portland harbor. It passed this House without opposition, and it has passed the other branch of Congress. It was urged in the other branch by a distinguished Senator from Maine, one to whom the country looks for his ability and patriotism as one of its leading men—it was urged by him and stated openly in the Senate, and is reported in the Globe, that he had asked the Secretary of the Navy to order a single officer to examine Portland harbor, and the Secretary declined to do so on the ground that he would not have any place examined but League Island. That was clearly stated by Mr. FESSENDEN. I presume I have transgressed parliamentary propriety in mentioning his name, but it is out now, and let it go.

Mr. PIKE. Mr. FESSENDEN's inference from the Secretary's remark is not the statement of the Secretary. The idea of the Secretary was that he had no authority to order such an investigation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Fortunately I have the record here, and I will read it and leave it without comment. Mr. FESSENDEN said:

"I endeavored to prevail on the Secretary of the Navy to have this site examined and reported upon. I could get no encouragement from him that he would allow anybody to examine it and make a report. He brought up certain objections, all of which, I thought, were entirely untenable. He was urged strongly to just get the facts, by a commission appointed by himself, who could say whether it was fit for this purpose or not, and how much it would cost, &c."

Mr. JOHNSON. He could have done that, if he pleased.

Mr. GRIMES. He had not the authority. Mr. FESSENDEN. He could send down any man to do it, if he had chosen to do so. He did not say he had not the authority; he did not make that a point. He could have sent, not a commission, but an engineer—there are engineers in the employ of the Navy Department—or any one of his officers to look at it, and there would be no difficulty about it. I could not prevail upon him to do it. Finally a letter was handed to him by a gentleman, and he made the reply, substantially, that until the question of League Island was disposed of he would not have it examined."

He did not say that he had not authority. He did not make the point which the gentleman says he did make. I appeal from the Representative from Maine to the Senator from Maine for the accuracy of my statement. Further on in the debate Mr. FESSENDEN said:

"As I stated before, I have made every effort to get some information on the subject, to let somebody look at it who was capable of judging, and who was an officer of the Government—just to that extent, no more—and make a report. I have utterly failed, because the Secretary of the Navy will not look at any place except League Island. That is the fact about it. He will not even permit the Department or himself or anybody else to have any information on the subject."

If that does not bear out my recollection of the statement of the Senator, the House will see it and make the necessary correction.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman from Connecticut allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes, sir; certainly.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. This difference between the gentleman from Connecticut and the gentleman from Pennsylvania is a surprise to a portion of the Committee on Naval Affairs. I supposed, and I understand that my colleague on the committee from Ohio [Mr. LE BOND] supposed, that the committee agreed to the proposition which I understand the gentleman now to be urging; that the final conclusion of the committee was to include other places in the investigation as well as League Island. I wish now to know why it is that that proposition was changed, and we find these two gentlemen at loggerheads to-day.

[Here the hammer fell, Mr. BRANDEGEE's hour having expired.]

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Allow me one moment.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move that the gentleman's time be extended thirty minutes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, no; I do not want more than three minutes.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to explain this matter.

No objection was made to the extension of time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am very much obliged to the House for its courtesy.

Mr. Speaker, there is nothing I dislike so much—and my experience, though short, has brought that conviction home to my mind very forcibly; next to a personal explanation, which gentlemen sometimes indulge in with newspapers in their hands, there is nothing I detest so much as to have controversies arise in discussion as to the action of a committee.

In the first place, as everybody knows, it is unparliamentary to allude to anything that has happened in committee; and in the second place, it always arises from a misunderstanding or misrecollection; there is apt to be, at any rate, a hesitancy about stating the private conversation that has occurred, which makes it a very delicate business. However, inasmuch as this matter did not, as I understand, occur in the committee, but in the House among the members of the committee, I think I ought to state what my understanding of it is.

I was absent from the committee at the time the vote was taken. I was present and took part in the discussion and examination of witnesses. But when the day came which had been fixed upon for taking the final vote I was necessarily absent to attend the election in Connecticut, and with the permission of the committee I was to record my vote and to send a proposition from home embodying my views as to the result the committee ought to arrive at. I sent in my proposition. I was not present when the vote was taken, and I am bound to believe that the gentleman from Pennsylvania was authorized to report his bill. I was not authorized to report my substitute as the result at which the committee had arrived. On my return, after seeing the bill and noting the objections to it to which I have alluded, I drew up the substitute I have now offered, believing that the House would not reject so fair a proposition.

There was just this difference between the substitute which I have now offered and the one which I submitted to certain gentlemen of the committee about which we may perhaps hear from the chairman of the committee, [Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts.] In my original substitute I proposed that the report of this commission should be final; that is that it should not be submitted to Congress, but that the Secretary of the Navy should be authorized, indeed that he should be directed, to accept the title to that site in favor of which the commission should report, and I consulted with the members of the committee, and very generally with the members of the House in regard to it. I thought then I was authorized to say, and I now believe I was authorized to say, that a majority of the committee favored my substitute; I do not wish to embarrass the committee at all, but I think they will so show their preference when they come to vote here; and I informed the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] that by accepting my substitute a fight might be prevented here, and I knew what a fight on this subject was, for I had been in one.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I am—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] will be allowed to answer the interrogatories I propounded to him; for I desire to know why it is that there is such a controversy about what has been the action of the committee. I thought I knew what that action was, but there seems to be a controversy between the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] in relation to it.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I am very willing the gentleman should finish all he has to say on that subject.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As I was going on to say, I thought a majority of the committee favored my substitute; that is to say, while they would not withdraw from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] his right—and I think he had an undoubted right—to offer the bill which he has presented as the report of the committee, yet when the question came before the House they would suggest, or by their votes they would so act as that my substitute should meet the favorable consideration of the House. I thought they would vote for my substitute.

It was at that point I saw the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY], and suggested to him that in order to obviate this most excitable and harassing question, involving as I thought it did, and as I now think it does, the motives and action of the Navy Department to some extent, involving a great deal of feeling, though I hope nothing that will cause a final rupture between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself, for we are too old campaigners to allow a little ripple of this sort to disturb our future friendship—I suggested to him that in order to avoid all this he had better accept my substitute, as I thought it would meet the approval of a majority of the committee and of the House.

Now, I do not know that I ought to go further and state that the gentleman busied himself an entire morning hour going around and trying to get his entire delegation to agree to my substitute, and he finally reported to me through the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts] that he accepted my substitute, and that it would be the thing offered to the House upon which we all could agree. That is all, so far as I have had anything to do with it.

Now, in reference to the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE], I understood him to ask me how it is that the report of the committee, which he understood to include other sites, is not now the report of the committee, but the gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. KELLEY] presents as the report of the committee that which does not include but one site.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. And also why it is that neither of the gentlemen are now advocating what the committee finally agreed to report to the House as the result of their action upon this subject.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That I know nothing about; I have stated all my knowledge upon this subject.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would ask the gentleman if the substitute which he now offers is the one to which he and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] agreed, and to which the committee gave their assent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is precisely the same, with this slight difference: the original substitute allowed the Secretary of the Navy to accept the title to the site in favor of which the commission should report. To that it was objected by many whom I accounted my friends in this matter, that it would be better for the commission to report to Congress; that we should hold in our hands at a subsequent session of this or some future Congress the right to determine which site to select. And in that regard, I have modified my proposition; perhaps I have not acted wisely. And now I state that I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RICE,] the chairman of the Naval Committee, proposes to modify my substitute by incorporating the original proposition, that the Secretary of the Navy shall at once accept the title to that site in favor of which the commission shall report. To that I shall have no objection whatever, if it shall meet the approval of a majority of this House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman has failed to answer the precise question which I propounded to him, and that is this: why is it that neither the gentleman from Pennsylvania nor the gentleman from Connecticut are to-day presenting the precise proposition to which the committee, as a whole, gave their assent?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why, Mr. Speaker, I never thought that I had authority from the Naval Committee to offer this substitute as the bill of the committee. I never so understood the matter. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] was deputed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to present his bill as the bill approved by the majority of the committee. I do now present my substitute, and I have no right to present it, as the proposition agreed to by the committee. I present it as my own proposition; and I rely upon the support of only those gentlemen of the committee who may agree with me in thinking that this is the best proposition, all things considered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Why does not the gentleman present the precise proposition which was agreed to, instead of presenting a new one? It was certainly agreed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Connecticut to make the report of the commission final. I know that I argued on the other side, and desired that the commission should report to Congress and that the approval of Congress should be necessary; but under the influence of both those gentlemen, I yielded my own opinion upon that point. Why is not that report advocated to-day by either of those gentlemen?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why, Mr. Speaker, what a position we should be in here if the gentleman from Pennsylvania should report one proposition with the authority of the committee, while I should report another proposition with the authority of the committee, both of us being mouth-pieces of the committee, both having the right to the floor to move the previous question—making "confusion worse confounded." I never supposed, nor did any other gentleman of the committee, except, perhaps, my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] that I was the spokesman of the committee upon this measure. All that I did was this: the substitute which I have now offered, varying only in the point to which I have alluded, I carried around to different members of the committee to ascertain whether they would agree to sustain that substitute in the House. And I must say, if my friend will permit me, that I never understood that he agreed to it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Did not the gentleman understand that the members of the committee individually agreed to that proposition, provided that it was satisfactory to the gentleman from Connecticut and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and that it was to be considered as the action of the committee?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Most distinctly, sir, I say that I did not so understand. Even if I had so understood, that understanding would have fallen to the ground. I never relied upon it after the gentleman from Pennsylvania notified me, as he will do me the credit to bear witness, that the committee insisted that he should not abandon his bill but should press it, and that therefore he would not accept my substitute.

I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] whether he did not so distinctly inform me.

Mr. KELLEY. With the permission of the gentleman from Ohio, I will make a brief statement of the circumstances in question.

Mr. Speaker, it cannot be more painful to the gentleman from Connecticut or any other gentleman to be involved in a personal controversy or to be under the necessity of making a personal explanation than it is to myself. Such things are always disagreeable. I have my own very distinct recollection of all this matter. I never considered the substitute which has to-day been proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut. I never saw it in its present form. The proposition was at no time submitted to me. I read it for the first time this morning, when I obtained it from the Clerk's desk after the gentleman's personal allusion to me. It does not contain the provisos or lead to the result contemplated by the substitute, to the consideration of which I was invited, and to which, under false information, I was constrained to assent.

On the 3d of March last, as the organ of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I reported a bill which had been maturely considered by the committee. That is the bill now under discussion. That, without any, the slightest modification, is the bill on which I have spoken to-day. It stands precisely as it came from the hands of the committee. After the gentleman had returned from Connecticut (for, as he has stated, he was not present at that time) it was suggested to me that he had a substitute which referred the question to a scientific or naval commission, and made the finding of that commission absolute in so far that it would be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to accept the site indicated by the commission. I dissented from it. I desired to stand on the action of the committee. I had no doubt that a fair commission examining all the sites would report in favor of League Island, but inasmuch as the committee had reported a specific bill I preferred to stand upon it.

I was then informed, Mr. Speaker, that without consultation with me several members of the Naval Committee had changed their opinion. I ask for the ear of the gentleman from Connecticut. I was then informed that several members of the committee had changed their opinions on the question, and instead of sustaining the bill which I as their organ was to report, or had, I believe, reported to the House, would sustain his substitute. It was suggested by the chairman of the committee that by my accepting it under the circumstances a contest might be avoided. He also suggested other considerations which I will not indicate but will say they did not relate to me, my personal comforts, or my sensibilities. I did not yield, but being assured by the gentleman from Connecticut that gentlemen upon whose support of the bill I relied because they had been earnest for it in committee were against it—thus assured, I yielded; and having done so, I waited on the two members of the Naval Committee on this side of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Ohio, to know whether, if the bill were abandoned, they would accept and sustain the substitute.

I was surprised, and I am pained to state it, that when, after all this, I waited on the gentlemen of the committee, of whose change of opinion I was thus positively assured, who I had been distinctly told were against the bill and for the substitute, I found them for the bill and against the substitute. I hastened at once to my colleagues of the committee, to whom I had expressed a reluctant assent to accept the substitute, and retracted it. One was the member of the committee from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] whom I now see in a neighbor's seat, and the other was the member from New York, [Mr. DARLING,] unhappily not now in his seat. When I found the members of the committee were not determined, as I had been informed they were, to abandon the bill and accept the substitute, I hastened, I say, to such members of the committee as I could see, and let them know that I had been deceived; the deception having doubtless been practiced through mistake, of course, which was unintentional. Under these circumstances only did I consent to support the substitute. If the substitute now pending were accepted by any member of the committee, as the gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Ohio seem to suppose, I beg to assure them that it is not known to me. It is not like the substitute brought to my notice by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, which provided for a commission to examine certain sites and make a report which should be final, and the Secretary of the Navy should be bound to accept the site so selected.

I resisted it because I was not willing to put the power of Congress in the hands of a commission, and especially after having seen how an able, honorable, and honest commission could, by adopting a false rule of procedure, be practiced upon by a corrupt and designing man as in the case of the first commission by the civil engineer. So there never was an agreement obtained from me to assent to this substitute. There never was an agreement obtained from me to assent to the substitute exhibited by the gentleman from Connecticut to the members of the committee, except that obtained fraudulently. Of course I use the word fraudulently, as we do conspiring, confederating, and agreeing when preparing a bill in equity. I do not charge the gentleman with moral fraud, but I think his enthusiasm for a poor cause so far carried him away that he misapprehended the remarks of the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Maine, as he may those of other members of the committee.

Mr. LE BLOND. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the bill which is now before the House is not the identical bill that the committee agreed to report.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. LE BLOND. Has the committee at any time agreed upon any other proposition than the one now before the House?

Mr. KELLEY. Never.

Mr. LE BLOND. That, Mr. Speaker, is my understanding of the action of that committee, and I say now that I have no recollection of ever being counseled by any member of the committee in reference to the compromise measure now pending.

If I have been spoken to it was outside of the committee-room and it has escaped my recollection. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] will remember whether he or any other member of the committee ever spoke to me on the subject. I have been from the beginning after full examination in favor of the proposition that the committee reported and no other, and I am so yet.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Now, Mr. Speaker, this matter has narrowed down to a result to which I think it had arrived before this personal discussion arose, and proves the truth of what I started out with asserting, that these questions of the action of the committee, resulting ultimately in personal controversies, have but very little to do with the subject under consideration, and generally, to use a very expressive but common phrase, come out of the same hole at which they went in. It seems to be agreed now, precisely as I have stated over and over again on this floor, and as the House will bear me witness that I have stated, that the Committee on Naval Affairs authorized the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to report this bill and no other. I have so stated, and so I think the House understood me. I have never been authorized, and have not claimed to have been authorized, to report from the committee any bill whatsoever. The gentleman from Pennsylvania alone was authorized to report a bill, and he has done so. But after that report was made, upon private consultation with members of the committee on this floor, and not as a committee in session, I inferred that a majority of the committee were in favor of my proposition, but not as the action of the committee formally. That I have distinctly asserted before. When the question came up here they thought that my proposition was the best for the country and for this special purpose which we are engaged to-day in debating.

Now, sir, with reference to what the gentleman from Pennsylvania asserted with regard to the action of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRIDGEMAN], and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LE BLOND], I do not recollect having any conversation with the gentleman from Ohio, but I distinctly remember a conversation with the gentleman from Wisconsin, and unless I am greatly in error he did not assent to my proposition. And so I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to assert that when he applied to the gentleman from Wisconsin he was in favor of the original bill and against my substitute, and has been so from the beginning.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I believe I stated that I was in favor of the original proposition limiting it to League Island, and settling the question in committee. Afterward I was applied to by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. BRANDEGEE], and asked if I would consent to his substitute which had been presented by him in committee, and rejected by the committee, if it was agreeable to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I told him I would. Afterward I saw the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and he told me that he was satisfied with that. I informed him that I had received that information from the gentleman from Connecticut, and if it was agreeable to him I would consent to the substitute. I did speak to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. LE BLOND], and stated to him in substance what had been stated to me, and he said he had no objections to it if it was agreeable to both of the gentlemen. What surprised me was to find neither of the gentlemen advocating that proposition. I did think the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] was bound in good faith, if he presented any substitute here whatever, to present the precise one to which the committee, not as a committee I grant, but as individual members, could give their assent. For that proposition I felt under obligations to vote in the House, notwithstanding I had voted against it in the committee, because I supposed that it was a harmonious arrangement between those two gentlemen who had been fighting this matter before the committee, and I hoped it would preserve the union that had existed before between those gentlemen. I was desirous of seeing that harmony and friendship continued between them, and hence I am surprised at not seeing it exist to-day.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. This whole matter is running empties. [Laughter.] I do not allude to the gentleman so much as to this interlarding discussion, which has no bearing on the question before the House. The gentleman is surprised that I do not now present the proposition presented by me to the members of the committee as a compromise proposition. Why, that proposition was predicated on the fact that the committee was to be unanimous in its support. Was I bound to present that precise proposition, which was a compromise, after I was notified by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] that neither he nor a majority of the committee would sustain it?

But this has nothing to do with the question before the House. No matter what this committee think or say. This committee do not know any more about this question, Mr. Speaker, than you or any other sensible man on this floor knows. We know some of the facts that come before us, but there is not a man on the committee who from experience or investigation is more competent to locate a naval station than any other man on this floor. I profess to have some knowledge of this question myself; I have made it somewhat my study; but I declare to you to-day if it were left to me alone by authority given by the United States to select the site for the great navy-yard of the country I would not know where to locate it. I would hardly dare to locate it at New London, although I believe that is the best place on the continent, and I found that belief upon the authority of nineteen twentieths of the officers of the Navy and the report of this able commission. Even Admiral Smith, chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, testified before the committee that with his life-long experience on this subject, having never been consulted by the Department with reference to League Island, he would not know to-day where to locate a navy-yard for these vessels. And I maintain that there is no member of the committee who has examined the subject in this and the last Congress who to-day, upon the testimony in regard to League Island, would be willing to put his ban upon it without a further examination by scientific experts.

Now, is it a matter of importance to get the best place? If it is, let the commission decide where that place is and report upon the relative advantages of the different sites. To see that the Government should have an opportunity of getting the best place is the duty of an American Congressman. If you confine its selection to this mud-hole on the Delaware river, it is quite certain that the commission will report in favor of it. I say, without claiming to be either a prophet or a naval expert, that you will expend millions in the present and untold millions in the future upon that place and finally abandon it as entirely unfit and ill-adapted for the purpose proposed.

Sir, if your iron-clad fleet should be located a hundred miles from the ocean up that tortuous stream, obstructed by ice for three months every winter, in some great day of naval conflict, when the enemy is thundering at the gates of your Atlantic cities, (far distant may that day be,) you will regret too late the folly which has locked up your iron defenses for safety one hundred miles from the ocean. If that is an argument, if they are to be placed a hundred miles from the sea-board for safety, in the name of Heaven what are these iron-clads for? What are these invulnerable vessels built for but to be posted on the sea-coast to meet at the outpost an enemy's fleet and to guard against hostile attack the commerce of the nation? If they are competent to defend themselves, they can defend the station where they are located; and that station, as I maintain, any honest, competent commission will decide is New London, from which they can readily go in the event of a naval attack to the defense of those cities and those coasts which they were expressly designed to defend, for which defense they are alone useful. I leave the question to the House.

Mr. O'NEILL. I am sorry my friend from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] confesses that he does not know where to locate a navy-yard. I am sorry to learn that after all his pertinacity and toil and investigation he does not yet understand this subject, and that he is just as ignorant of it to-day as he was three years ago, when he was first appointed on the Committee on Naval Affairs. Now, sir, notwithstanding all the ingenuity of the gentleman, notwithstanding all his efforts to lead the House to believe that he is governed entirely by patriotic motives, and is acting entirely without prejudice, my word for it, if the location of a navy-yard for iron-clads was left to him, in less than no time he would locate it at New London, in his own congressional district, in the State of Connecticut. He would not look beyond the limits of his small town, but would in his prompt and instant decision proclaim to the world that the most eligible position for a naval station for building iron ships, repairing them, making their armature, and laying them up, was in that rock-bound harbor, with its salt water and its two hours' distance from the open ocean.

Now, he tells you that the question of the safety of a fleet from the attacks of an enemy is not a question to be considered by this House, and talks about the mud-hole at League Island, and all that. But I can say from personal inspection of this great New London harbor, having passed through it a number of times, and having consulted with his near neighbors, that the entrance is through a channel with a rocky bottom; that while you may perhaps get a sailing or other vessel safely up it by means of a steam tug, it is utterly impossible to accomplish such a feat in any other way, especially to the point where it is said this navy-yard should be located. And when you do get one up there by any means, you cannot protect it against the attack of an enemy.

Talk to me about New London harbor! Why the gentleman's substitute for the bill reported from the committee and his whole argument means New London, and nothing else. Sir, in the very entrance of the harbor there is a rock, which one of my fellow-travelers, and I presume from his knowledge of the locality one of my friend's constituents, pointed out to me and told me was so bad that it would take all the powder in the country to blow it to pieces, and that it had always been considered an obstacle to the commerce of the place. This, of course, must be removed, and many others, perhaps, if you would locate a navy-yard there. These projecting rocks and the hidden ones are indeed dangerous to navigation, and I find in a newspaper published only three or four weeks ago an account of an accident which happened to a vessel, either in coming in or going out, by running on to this rock, and a steam vessel at that. It was one of the New London line of Sound steamers, the State of Maine. If one of your large and powerful steamers cannot avoid such an accident in a harbor to which it makes frequent trips, how can you expect naval vessels occasionally coming into New London to escape such dangers?

I have been led aside somewhat from my original plan of speaking upon this subject on account of the remarks of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. BRANDEGEE], growing out of some misunderstanding between him and my colleague, [Mr. KELLEY]; which, however, now seems to be settled entirely by a statement of the fact that this bill, Printer's No. 102, is the one which was authorized to be reported by the committee. And it is upon this bill that I will continue my arguments, hoping to convince the House of the propriety of its passage, and most respectfully asking after its due consideration that it may be passed.

But let me first refer to some things which have been said by my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. BRANDEGEE]. And although I know my colleague [Mr. KELLEY] will very well defend himself against the attacks made upon him, yet the manner of the gentleman appeared to be so vehement and impassioned that I deem it necessary here to ask attention to what has fallen from him.

The members of this House who were members of the Thirty-Eighth Congress will perhaps recollect the discussion that then took place upon this subject. The gentleman from Connecticut now but repeats the same tenor of argument which he adduced then. He made the same attacks upon the commission which was appointed by the Secretary of the Navy; he made the same attacks even upon some members of the committee of this House, which was appointed with a view to consider this as well as all other matters relating to naval affairs. He attempted to hold up to scorn and suspicion the motives of the commission of naval officers who examined the subject and reported upon it, and questioned as he does now the reliability of their acts because they happened to have been born in certain portions of the country. Now, are these the arguments by which to convince this House?

I will read you the names of this commission, and show you how near to Philadelphia or League Island they were born and how much their local inclinations and feelings could be likely to affect their judgment. I find by the Navy Register that Commodore Stringham, now rear admiral, was born in the State of New York; Commodore Gardner was born in Maryland; I think Commodore Van Brunt was born in the State of New York, but I have not had time to find his name in the Register; my friend from New York [Mr. BERGEN] informs me he was born in New Jersey. I am pleased to be corrected. It is not important to this argument where they were born, but it is one of the petty means used here to create a prejudice against the minority of the commission. These are the gentlemen who signed the majority report, much to the delight of my friend from Connecticut. Not one of them, however, was a Pennsylvanian. Engineer Sanger was also with the majority. Massachusetts claims him as one of her sons. I will not stop to discuss him, my colleague [Mr. KELLEY] having already done that.

And I assert boldly that if I had time to look over that report I could prove from it to the satisfaction of members of the House that in every requisite for a naval station for the building of iron-clad vessels, for their repair, for their armature, and in all other necessary respects the majority of that commission have given a report in favor of League Island. I do not mean to deny that the bottom of the Delaware river is muddy as they have said, but I mean to say that in all the requisites for a naval station, and especially for a navy of iron-clads propelled by steam, League Island on the Delaware river is the best and safest point upon our coast.

Sir, I find appended to the report of the minority of the commission—and I am sorry to go over this ground again because I believe these reports were fully discussed in the last Congress—the name of Commodore John Marston, a most worthy officer of the Navy; an officer to whom the gravest responsibilities have been intrusted at various times; who has commanded ships and commanded fleets; who, it has been charged by the gentleman from Connecticut, is from Philadelphia, but who was born in Massachusetts. Only one of those six gentlemen, members of that commission—Professor Bache—was a native of the city of Philadelphia.

But, sir, suppose that they had all been born in the city of Philadelphia; suppose that they had all been born within two miles of League Island: is it to be imagined that they, sworn officers of the Navy, would not perform their duty aright to the Government? Sir, if there are any men connected with the service to whom I would intrust a question as to what is right or wrong, what is suitable or unsuitable with reference to the general good of the country, I would not hesitate to place confidence in the officers of our Navy and of our Army. It seems to be the study of their lives to be governed by the best and the noblest motives, and prejudice seldom enters into their decision when any matter is officially submitted to them.

The gentleman speaks of this question having been before the House some four years. Why, sir, of course it has been here four years. The natural consequence of the breaking out of the rebellion was to bring it up as a demonstration of the wants of the Government in reference to a suitable naval station. And he is surprised that the members cannot see that the harbor of New London is the place for erecting a navy-yard in which to build iron-clad vessels. Why, sir, the question of New London has been here as long as League Island. I well recollect reading the discussion in the Thirty-Seventh Congress. If I remember rightly it came before the House toward the close of the session by the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and then the relative merits of League Island and New London were considered. The superiority of New London as a location for a naval station was then insisted upon, as it has always been insisted upon, by the gentleman from Connecticut and others representing the interests of that State. During the last Congress he and others, members and citizens, urged its claims in every way.

Sir, I am not surprised at this. I never believed that the citizens of this country had no right to impress their views upon their Representatives, or that those Representatives, if convinced, had no right to urge those views upon Congress. I think the gentleman and his coadjutors performed no more than their duty by presenting the views of their constituents on a question in which they were interested. But, sir, the claims of League Island are not to be prejudiced by any such argument as that they have been heard and presented for years.

Mr. Speaker, there is another attempt in my estimation to make difficulty in this House or to create prejudice. The gentleman speaks of the formation of the Committee on Naval Affairs. He speaks of it in this Congress, and he refers to it in the last Congress. No member from Pennsylvania has complained of the formation of the Committee on Naval Affairs in this Congress, the last Congress, or the Thirty-Seventh Congress. Now, the committee of the last Congress reported against League Island. They considered it and must have acted on their best judgment. They considered it with the light which was then thrown on the question. We have now other information, and I refer to one strong point, the letter of Captain Fox, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, in regard to the back channel. The Naval Committee of this session had this point investigated, and it may have induced the report of this bill and the recommendation of its passage.

My colleagues have never complained of the action of any Committee on Naval Affairs. They never complained of the action of the commission instituted in 1863, a majority of which it has been urged preferred New London. That majority performed its duty according to what then seemed, I presume, to be its honest convictions. Notwithstanding the report, the House would have adopted League Island as the location but for one reason. The cost, sir, prevented its favorable action—and I then most clearly understood the views of members—not at all because of the unfitness of the place. I need scarcely say that it was believed that all the money which the Government could command would be needed to bring the war to a successful conclusion. On the question of locality and its eligibility in every way for a naval station I think the House itself was satisfied that League Island was the best.

I am sorry to prolong the discussion on these points, but it seems to me to be necessary that the gentleman's charges should be refuted, because they are calculated to excite prejudice. I think he referred to the Navy Department molding the Committee on Naval Affairs to suit its own views. He alleges that every effort was made to keep him off the committee. Now, he may be the most able member from his State, but he must not forget that there were other members from Connecticut on that committee before he came here. I know nothing about the wrangle and squabble of members for places on committees.

As I have said before, I have been drawn from the line of remark I intended to follow in discussing this subject. I intended to give a brief sketch of the creation of the Navy. I designed to take the House back to revolutionary times, to the Algerine war, to the war of 1812, and to the Mexican war. I could have shown that for some time after the commencement of the revolutionary war not a vessel belonged to us. I could have shown the struggles in the Continental Congress to create a navy. I could have shown that in the beginning of the war of 1812 we had a navy of but very few effective ships, which had to be repaired at a very great expense. I could have shown that at the commencement of the rebellion we had not enough national vessels to contend against the rebels and their sympathizers.

It brings me to this point: in looking over the history of the Navy I find that it was not an unusual thing for localities to make gifts for the purpose of establishing navy-yards. I think navy-yards were not established until about the commencement of this century. It was provided that certain places should have the building of certain vessels-of-war. Hence we see the presentation of land by States to the Government for the purpose of navy-yards is not by any means a new thing.

The gentleman from New London has certainly urged with great earnestness its claims as the best-place for this naval station. But he has told you nothing in reference to the indefensibility of New London. He endeavors to stigmatize League Island as a mud-hole, but says nothing of its perfect defensibility. He endeavors to show that the distance of League Island from the sea is one hundred miles. For the sake of his argument he makes it twenty miles more than it really is. He perhaps has never traveled along the Delaware river. He knows nothing about its distance from the ocean. I really believe he prefers to remain in ignorance of everything connected with it. I can in no other way account for his well-worded abuse and depreciation of its countless merits and advantages.

But, sir, let all that go. The gentleman does not tell you of the great defect of New London. I speak on this question as if the gentleman's substitute provided only for the establishment of a navy-yard at New London. I look at it in that way and in no other. One great defect of his favorite place is the want of facilities in procuring labor. The site suggested is three or four miles from a city with a population which I will not say is insufficient to fill up a blacksmith shop with skilled workmen, but where you certainly cannot get a supply of the mechanical labor required. It is a city which, from natural causes, cannot hold a population exceeding twelve thousand. You cannot possibly extend its limits so as to provide for an increased population, it being so surrounded by high hills of hard rock that its growth must forever be impeded. It is not, therefore, a fitting place for the great naval station for such a navy as the United States will require.

But, sir, one great advantage of League Island is that an enemy's fleet could not reach it.

Mr. LE BLOND. With the gentleman's permission, I would like to make a single remark.

Mr. O'NEILL. Not just at this time.

Mr. LE BLOND. It would come in appropriately just at this point.

Mr. O'NEILL. I would rather the gentleman would wait; I do not intend to detain the House long.

Now, sir, as I have said before, the proposition of the gentleman from Connecticut is in effect a proposition to establish a navy-yard at New London, and nothing else. The gentleman cares nothing about the proper requisites for such a great yard. He knows that his locality is not the place for a naval station of the character desired. His object is to place it in the harbor of New London, among the rocks. Sir, that is no place to build iron-clads; you cannot get the material there out of which to build them without going to an enormous expense, and the salt water would corrode them when built.

Now, a word as to the question of filling up League Island so as to secure a proper foundation for the necessary buildings. It will not cost much. The gentleman says you must go to New Jersey for material. Yes, I say you can go to Red Bank, in New Jersey—which is immediately opposite—only a mile or two off, and get as much gravel as you want, and bring it across the Delaware at a trifling cost. There is plenty of material coming from the iron-works of Philadelphia for filling up that part of it which the committee terms, I think, "marsh land." I know something about that island. It happens to be in my district, and I have been upon it many times. There are five or six truck farms upon it; and there are buildings upon it which have stood for years.

The gentleman speaks of it as being an unhealthy location. Talk to me about League Island not being a healthy location! The gentleman might as well tell me that one half of my district is unhealthy. Sir, I am well acquainted with the immediate neighborhood of the island, and I can truly say that I am not mistaken in denying this charge of want of health. It is healthy and inhabited by people who live to good old age, and who will be much surprised to hear of it being sickly.

I want a fair and proper consideration of the bill. I am anxious that a proper naval station should be selected, and desire the House to vote on this bill understandingly. Let us pass it, and start a great yard, one equal to all the requirements of the country. What is the use of having another commission appointed? We have had commissions heretofore, and in spite of their reports Congress has never decided against League Island and never will upon such arguments as have been presented by its enemies.

Why should we distrust the Secretary of the Navy? Has he any interest in League Island? If he felt as the gentleman from Connecticut does, being from Connecticut, he would establish this navy-yard at New London; and it is because he will not do that that my friend does not like the Secretary. Captain Fox, the Assistant Secretary, is, I believe, a citizen of Massachusetts, and I think the heads of nearly all the bureaus in the Department are from New England; yet I am not unwilling to take their views on this subject. I am not even unwilling to take the views of Rear Admiral Smith, to some extent. I know, sir, that those officers of an older generation do not see the fitness of the Delaware river for a naval station; for when they held commands in the Navy sailing ships only were used, and it did take some time to come up to Philadelphia. That is the secret of their opposition. Well, sir, they have done honor to their country in their time; but they are passing away, and it is too late in the day, after this question has been so thoroughly discussed, not only in this House and in its Naval Committee, but in the Navy Department, for us to hesitate to establish a navy-yard for iron vessels in a river of fresh water, with ample depth of channel, near skilled labor, and near the coal and iron necessary to be used in their construction, and where ice, even in the coldest winters known, is no insurmountable obstacle. We have an ice boat which has always kept the channel open.

The gentleman has referred to the relative distances of New London and Philadelphia from New York. I do not know where he gets his geography or his scale of distances. I believe New London is one hundred and fifty miles from New York. I know it takes all night to get there from that city in the steamboat; and by railroad the distance is about the same, for it takes nearly the whole day to reach it. Does the gentleman know how far it is from Philadelphia to New York? To be sure, going by steamboat down the Delaware the distance may be a little greater than from New London to

New York, but by railroad communication we are only ninety miles from the latter city.

Why, sir, the gentleman does not know his map. Let him look at it, let him measure the distances as I have done for the purpose of giving facts to this House so as not to deal in imagination and guessing for the sake of success. I should be ashamed of myself if I thought I was actuated in this matter by mere local interests. I believe that League Island is the place for a navy-yard, because it is in every way accessible to every thing which is needed to be used for building a navy such as we should have. We have a channel in front of League Island of twenty-three feet and more in depth. It is two and a quarter miles in extent upon the Delaware river. There is a channel of some eighteen or twenty feet in depth, and some five eighths of a mile in extent on the Schuylkill, and also the back channel which is also two and a quarter miles long of some fourteen or sixteen feet deep which furnishes a grand national basin. I am speaking of the depth of the channels at high water, of course. I believe that this is a place intended by nature for some such purpose as this.

Now, the gentleman from Connecticut desires that we shall go to New London for this navy-yard, where we would have to blast out thousands and thousands of tons of rock in order to obtain a basin. That, sir, could never be done, and yet the gentleman talks about it as the place most suitable for building ships, but never mentioning its salt water.

Besides, we all know that we want iron and coal for building a navy; those are the great materials to be used in the construction and for the motive power of iron vessels propelled by steam. And would you go to New London to be near supplies of coal and iron? The gentleman cannot show me any line of railroad or canal, or any means of access to it, by which you could reach those articles within one hundred miles as near as they are to League Island. He cannot have the hardihood to attempt seriously to convince any one that the location he would select is in such close proximity to everything which enters into the completion of an iron navy as the point designated in this bill.

League Island lies at the mouth of the Schuylkill, at its confluence with the Delaware, both of which rivers are navigable by nature and by art. There is a canal all the way down the Schuylkill, from the Schuylkill coal regions to within five miles of League Island, and the Reading railroad running along the side of the canal. There is the Lehigh Valley railroad, connecting at Bethlehem with the North Pennsylvania, leading into the Lehigh coal and iron regions. There are also means of access from League Island into the same regions by canal and tidewater navigation along the Delaware and Lehigh rivers.

And is timber any nearer New London than it is to League Island? No, sir; the means of getting timber to the former place are not so great. For the live oak of the State of Delaware and the yellow pine of the Carolinas, what are the means of communication with League Island? Beside the Delaware bay and river, there is the Delaware railroad, which now extends almost the entire length of that State, and before long will be extended into Virginia along its eastern shore. And will it be argued that League Island possesses all these advantages, that New London is still nearer to all these materials than it? Why, sir, anywhere, in any direction, by any means of communication, canal, railroad, river, or bay, for any of the materials which are so necessary in the construction and repair of naval vessels, iron or wood, League Island is many miles nearer than New London.

Sir, I hope, I believe that this House will decide the question upon principles of justice and right. We are acting for the best interests of the whole country. And we are urging the passage of this bill because we believe that League Island is the best place for this naval station.

It seems that a great many naval officers who have looked into the matter within the last two or three years have changed their minds materially. I am under the impression that my constituent, Commodore Turner, was not a warm advocate of League Island two years ago. Yet we have his letter setting forth the reasons why it should be preferred, stating among other things its healthfulness and its easy approach. So, too, with Commodore Stribling, who, although stationed at Philadelphia, was not at one time favorable to League Island, yet he has since written a letter in its favor. That letter has been read by my colleague, [Mr. KELLEY.] This is another illustration of the change which has taken place in the views of prominent naval officers, one great reason being, no doubt, the importance of the basin afforded by the back channel, a basin that can be made three hundred and fifty yards wide, and deep enough to float the navies of the world.

The gentleman from Connecticut refers often to the mud of the river Delaware. Well, sir, we do not pretend to say that the bottom of the river Delaware is of rocks, and we thank Providence that it is not; for if it were so, we could not urge the adoption of League Island as the location for the naval station. Sir, we have the advantage of the mud, if you choose. At high tide we have twenty-three feet or more of water in the channel of the river Delaware; and we have besides that six or eight inches of yielding mud which does not hinder the progress of a vessel. The largest vessels of the Navy and of the merchant service have come not only to League Island, but to the wharves of the city of Philadelphia. I know that in one instance, a few years ago, the ship Cathedral was unable to get into the port of New York because she could not get across the bar; but that ship was brought in safety to our wharves.

And I will state also that at one time a project was on foot to bring the Great Eastern to Philadelphia, a party agreeing to undertake to accomplish it; but the project was abandoned, I believe, in consequence of some hesitation on account of the insurance. There is an ample depth of water for any vessel. The records of the Navy Department show that those drawing the most water and having the largest armaments have not only been at the present Philadelphia navy-yard, but many of them were built there and have with ease gone out to sea through the Delaware river and bay. Vessels propelled by steam are not delayed. Six or seven hours will take them to the capes, and even under the most adverse circumstances of wind and weather a sailing vessel can make the distance in about double that time.

Thirty-five or forty years ago the foreign commerce of this country was done at the wharves of the city of Philadelphia. At that time they were crowded with shipping from all parts of the world. That was the emporium for the China trade and the London trade. It was not until the sagacity of Governor De Witt Clinton suggested the construction of the Erie canal that that trade began to leave that city and go to New York. The Delaware river now, as then, is of sufficient depth of channel for either merchantmen or national vessels. None of either kind are constructed, or are likely to be constructed, whether of iron or wood, which cannot navigate her waters.

But, Mr. Speaker, to return to the question of defensibility, which is, in fact, the important question. You must locate your naval stations in positions where they can be defended at a low cost. Where is the location that can be as easily defended as the city of Philadelphia and League Island adjacent to it? An enemy's ship could not successfully make its way up that river. Its very length is its defense. There are the two defensive works, Fort Delaware and Fort Mifflin. Besides there are numerous places along the shore of the river (not high bluffs or towering mountains) upon which batteries could be placed. It would be impossible for a foreign enemy to approach Philadelphia by sea. And, sir, you could not blockade the city of Philadelphia or League Island.

It would take the combined navies of the world for such a blockade as would prevent effectual access to or from them. The bottom of Delaware bay is composed of yielding mud so that you cannot anchor a blockading fleet there, and you all know its great width. A blockade of Philadelphia and League Island to be complete renders a blockade not only of the Delaware bay necessary but also a blockade of the Jersey coast and of the Chesapeake bay. You must also blockade New York. I repeat, it would take the combined navies of the world to do this. Suppose it was attempted, you can get from League Island to New York through the Delaware and Raritan canal, which has a width and depth sufficient to enable us to take a monitor of five hundred tons into New York harbor. You can also get them through the Delaware and Chesapeake canal to Baltimore. And I appeal to my friend from New Jersey [Mr. NEWELL] that to make a blockade of that coast effectual you must blockade it entirely. Still we would have access to it by the Camden and Atlantic railroad. Thus we would have means of outlet for our monitors by these canals, and we would have the whole West to furnish us with its products, thus rendering a threatened blockade futile and without result.

League Island can be shown most incontrovertibly not only to be a place of safety for our iron-clad vessels, but also the very best in which to build up a navy. Now, I judge from what I have seen in this House that facts, and facts only, will be listened to, and they seem to me, as far as presented, to be all in favor of that location.

I say that on the question of defensibility, on the question of fresh water, on the question of the depth of water, freedom from ice, and on the question of cheapness of living, and the facility of procuring materials, you can find no place to compare with it. It looks to me as if nature planted it there for some great national use. New London is out of the question on account of salt water.

All who have examined it state this as the great and insurmountable objection as far as iron vessels are concerned. Salt water destroys them.

The gentleman from Connecticut seems to suppose that a rocky point is the best place for a navy-yard. Such is not our experience in the past. Look at the Brooklyn navy-yard, most of which is made ground. We do not want to carry vessels up a steep hill or to cut deep basins through solid rock. It is not necessary when we have other places which do not require this enormous expenditure of money. Go to the Charlestown navy-yard, in the district of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and you will find that a great portion of it is made ground. It is necessarily so, for you want a navy for water and not for land.

At the outset of my remarks I alluded to the fact that the gentleman from Connecticut made no argument of the defensibility of New London against a foreign navy. He could not make any such argument. The history of the country points out some facts in reference to the defensibility of that location. It could not resist a foreign navy during the war of 1812 which blockaded it any more than during the revolutionary war, when it was burnt to ashes by the British, whose fleet and transports reached it in one night's sail. It is just as easy of capture now as it was then.

One word about the expense. Why, sir, $900,000 was expended in repairing and fitting out one ship of our Navy. I refer to the Vanderbilt. Yet you talk about the cost of constructing a navy-yard at League Island such as no other nation in the world will or can have. It is so clear that I do not think it needs argument. I do not think this House would hesitate for one moment in reference to the expense when the city of Philadelphia offers to give to the Government six hundred acres of land. It certainly would not if the land were adjoining the present navy-yard.

We do not ask for a new navy-yard. We expect the present one to be transferred to League Island when completed. The present yard is now surrounded by the city. It is almost in the center of the city. The Government can sell it for probably $2,000,000, although it contains but fifteen or sixteen acres, and in its stead you will have a navy-yard of some six hundred acres in a much better location. We are not asking for a new navy-yard, but only desire that you will locate one in fact but as an extension of the old yard. These six hundred acres now offered as a gift will be worth in a few years millions of dollars to the Government. Commerce is pressing down the river toward League Island. Wharves for the accommodation of private business are being built along the banks of the Delaware.

Sir, would you select for a naval station New London harbor which is famous for nothing but its nearness to the ocean? We do not want a new navy-yard, much less do we want one located among rocks and salt marshes. It may have the proximity to the sea to recommend it as regards health, but a consumptive could not live there, and men working hard from morning until night in the shops would suffer from the climate, whereas in the neighborhood of Philadelphia they would be living where health abounds.

One word as to the defensibility of League Island in comparison with New London. I tell you there is but one way of deciding this question, and that is upon the facts. With the natural and artificial defenses in the Delaware river in the revolutionary struggle, it took the British fleet eight long weeks to get up to Philadelphia. And I will appeal to my friend from Delaware if it is not true that in the war of 1812 time and again the British cruisers were driven off the capes by our batteries, and yet Commodore Decatur was shut up by blockade of the enemy in the harbor of New London for weeks upon weeks with his ship after he had captured the Macedonian.

[Here the hammer fell; but by unanimous consent the gentleman's time was extended, and he proceeded, as follows:]

Mr. Speaker, it is hardly possible to do justice to this subject in one hour, especially after injustice has been done to it for an hour and a half by the speech of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. BRADDEGE.]

Sir, we need such a navy as the lesson of the late rebellion has taught us, a navy built of iron, and we need a naval station at a point where we cannot only build, but equip our iron-clad vessels. Does this House know that during the late rebellion not one ship was fully equipped in the navy-yards of the country? Now, sir, let us have a yard where we can have a foundry, where we can make our ordnance and everything great or small which enters into the completion of a man-of-war. Look at the losses we have suffered; millions of dollars claimed by contractors for extra work on vessels and their machinery.

In the midst of the speech of my friend from Connecticut a bill for the relief of a contractor for loss upon the Idaho is messaged from the Senate to the House. We will find claims amounting to twenty or thirty million dollars of this character, all occasioned by want of proper legislation on this subject.

In 1862 the Secretary of the Navy suggested in a report, and has made the same suggestion in every succeeding report, the necessity of locating a navy-yard for iron-clads, and yet here after nearly five years with half a dozen or more navy-yards we have none fitted for this purpose. We ought to have a navy worthy of such heroes as Farragut, Du Pont, Winslow, Cushing, and others, but we can never have it until we select the place at which to build the vessels.

Mr. Speaker, one word and I am done. As I said before, I started out to state facts, and have endeavored to confine myself to such. I wish to say, sir, for my colleagues of the Pennsylvania delegation and for my own more immediate colleagues of Philadelphia, that we are not urged to the support of this measure by any local interests or considerations. We endeavor to do our duty without the prejudice of locality. If a better site can be found for this purpose anywhere in the country, select it and establish your naval station there. But let us, for the sake of those who have honored our flag in the naval service, take such measures as will place the Navy upon a proper footing for all time to come. For this we ask you to pass the bill just as it was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 282) entitled "An act to reorganize the clerical force of the Department of the Interior, and for other purposes," in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

An act (H. R. No. 37) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending 30th of June, 1867; and

An act (H. R. No. 459) granting a pension to Anna E. Ward.

PRINTING OF TESTIMONY.

Mr. CONKLING, from the joint committee on reconstruction, reported certain testimony relative to Louisiana, Texas, and the Indian Territory, and moved that the same number of copies be printed that was ordered to be printed of the testimony heretofore reported from the same committee.

The motion was referred to the Committee on Printing, under the law.

NAVAL DEPOT AT LEAGUE ISLAND—AGAIN.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to submit to the judgment of this House, in a word or two, and a word or two only, whether it is not idle for us, in the consideration of this bill, to discuss the comparative merits of League Island and New London or Portland and some localities on the Hudson. It seems to me that the arguments of the learned gentleman from Pennsylvania were entirely irrelevant. If they had been put in the form of a plea, I think I would have demurred to it; and I might have done so with perfect safety.

The bill does not call upon this House to adopt any particular locality; it does not call upon this House to act at all upon its own judgment. It is well known, and has been well said in this debate, that we would not any of us feel competent to select a locality for this purpose. The bill calls for the appointment by the President of a skilled and experienced board to make an examination of League Island and the marsh lands, and make a report to the Secretary of the Navy; and it would require the Secretary of the Navy to act upon the recommendation or report of that board.

Sir, as it seems to me, there is but one single point in this case; and I invite the attention of the House to that point, as I understand it. The simple question is, whether this commission or board shall not have free scope to examine other localities. Now, when in point of fact it is well known, and must be well known to every member of the House, that it is believed by a large portion of the community that there are more eligible sites for a navy-yard than League Island, I ask the House if the substitute of my colleague contains anything more than a fair, reasonable, and just proposition.

I think I know, and it must be well known to the members of this House, that a large proportion of our people believe that there are other localities much more advantageous to the Government as sites for a navy-yard than League Island. This being the fact, the only point in this case is, whether this board shall not have its hands untied and have an opportunity to examine such other sites as are suggested in the substitute.

This being the only question, it does appear to me that all this discussion with reference to League Island and all this talk about the demerits of New London are entirely foreign to the question before the House. The substitute only asks that this board shall have an opportunity to examine other sites when they go out to examine League Island.

If League Island is the best and fittest place for a navy-yard, Philadelphia has nothing to fear. Why should the members from Pennsylvania tremble so much in the apprehension that this House will do a just thing and give the commission power to examine other sites? They cannot suffer by it. It will give satisfaction to the people, and will give better satisfaction to the members of this House. I repeat, that gentlemen ought not to object to giving the commission power to examine these other sites.

Mr. MYERS obtained the floor.

Mr. LE BLOND. With the permission of the gentleman, I will occupy the attention of the House for a few moments.

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LE BLOND. I do not propose to argue this proposition in detail. I think the debate has already taken a much wider range than the bill warrants. I have no doubt that if I felt disposed to argue this proposition in detail, I could throw a great deal of light upon the subject. My peculiar location fits me especially for the duties of the committee I am upon.

I live upon a canal near a large reservoir containing a body of water covering some acres in extent, and which is some seven or eight feet deep, I believe; and I have seen floating on it at one time as many as twenty little fishing smacks or boats. Of course gentlemen will see at once how peculiarly qualified I am to act upon this subject. [Laughter.] And I have no doubt the Speaker of this House knew this fact, or I would not have been put upon this committee.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. And it was fresh water.

Mr. LE BLOND. Yes, sir, it was fresh water; and that gives me a very decided advantage over many gentlemen here. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the real issue before this House is whether it is to the advantage of the Government to continue at Philadelphia the navy-yard which is now located there, or to remove it to League Island, a distance of about seven miles. Of course, when this subject came before the Committee on Naval Affairs, there were also presented the advantages and disadvantages of League Island as reasons why the committee should report favorably or unfavorably in reference to this change. League Island, some six hundred acres in extent, is tendered to the Government free of charge for the purposes of a naval station. The citizens of Philadelphia are anxious that the navy-yard should be removed from their midst to this place, and many of the Government officials ask that the change may be made, for the reason that no more territory can be acquired where the navy-yard is now located to meet the additional requirements of the service in consequence of the increase of the Navy.

The Committee on Naval Affairs, after having examined this question, both by personal inspection of the site and by the taking of the testimony of many witnesses, have come to the conclusion that it would be to the advantage of the Government to change the location of this navy-yard from Philadelphia to League Island. And hence they have directed the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to report to the House the bill now under consideration.

Now, I do not see that the proposition reported from the committee and the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] conflict at all with each other. His proposition is that a commission shall be appointed to examine all these sites for a naval station and report which, in their judgment, is the preferable site. Gentlemen seem to have got the idea that if the proposition reported from the committee be adopted by Congress that will preclude any action in regard to establishing a navy-yard at any other point than League Island. That idea, I think, is entirely erroneous. This Congress may adopt both propositions, for they do not conflict with each other. In the proposition reported from the committee we are simply called upon to determine whether or not it will be to the advantage of the Government to remove the navy-yard from its present location at Philadelphia to League Island, the land at League Island being given to the Government by the citizens of Philadelphia.

The other proposition is simply to appoint commissioners to examine all these sites and report upon their availability for the purposes of a navy-yard. It may be found necessary to have another navy-yard. The proposition of the committee is not to create or establish a new navy-yard, but to change the location of one already established. If the proposition of the gentleman from Connecticut should be adopted as an independent proposition, the commissioners may make their examination and if they find that it will be for the interests of the Navy that another navy-yard should be established at New London, they can report in favor of that, and the Government can go and build one there should it be deemed advisable to do so. That is my understanding of the true position of the question now before the House for their action at this time.

Mr. WRIGHT. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] if the proposition of the committee does not involve the expense of having two navy-yards, the one special object of this bill being, as I understand it, to provide a sanctuary, a place of safety, for our iron-clad Navy.

Mr. LE BLOND. I answer the gentleman that it does not. It is simply proposed that the location of the navy-yard now established shall be changed from Philadelphia to League Island. The property now possessed by the Government in Philadelphia can be sold, and the proceeds of the sale can be applied to the expense of locating the yard at League Island. The proposition is whether the Government will accept as a gratuity six hundred acres of land when it shall suit the convenience of the Government to make the transfer. And the proposition of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] does not conflict with this in any way whatever, for the commission he proposes to have appointed may go on and examine other sites, and if they deem it necessary to have another navy-yard, they may report in favor of New London or any other place.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to ask my colleague [Mr. LE BLOND] if he considers that the condition of this donation to the Government will be answered by simply transferring the navy-yard now located at Philadelphia to League Island.

Mr. LE BLOND. Certainly it will.

Mr. SPALDING. That is not my understanding of it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will give way to me for one moment I desire to ask a question. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LE BLOND,] my colleague on the committee, whether the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, who appeared before the committee as a witness as well as an advocate in behalf of League Island, did not distinctly state that the one great advantage which League Island offered, by reason of which it had commended itself to the favor of the Department, was its adaptation for the construction, repair, and docking of iron vessels; and, furthermore, whether he did not state, in answer to a question, that it was the intention of the Department, if League Island should be accepted, to make it the iron-clad station for construction and repair?

Mr. LE BLOND. Of course that was one of the reasons assigned why that was a desirable location. It was urged that the back channel rendered it a desirable place above any other that had been presented to the attention of the committee. That is one of the reasons why the committee agreed to the proposition as it now comes before the House, but it was not the sole consideration on which the committee acted.

Mr. MYERS. I hope that all this will not come out of my time.

The SPEAKER. It will come out of the gentleman's time.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, we will extend your time.

Mr. LE BLOND. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me one moment further, I wish to say that, as a matter of course, after the Government shall have changed the location of the navy-yard from Philadelphia to League Island, the yard at the latter place will, as the necessities of the Government may require, be enlarged. But there is no requirement of that sort in this grant. The Government may, as its judgment may dictate or the exigencies of the times require, make this a naval station for iron-clads, or a simple navy-yard, such as there is at Philadelphia at the present time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I desire now to ask my colleague on the committee one other question. Inasmuch as he has argued that these two propositions are not necessarily conflicting—that both may be adopted without interfering with each other—I ask him this question: supposing League Island to be accepted, does he believe that there will be any necessity for a new yard anywhere else, or does he believe that Congress or the Department would be in favor of a new yard anywhere else?

Mr. LE BLOND. I cannot, of course, say what Congress would do or what the Navy Department might do in reference to this matter. I do believe that League Island offers advantages of which it is of vast importance that the Government should avail itself.

I believe that, by the change of location, that navy-yard can be made to answer the purposes of the Government for a long time to come. I state this simply as my own opinion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is what I supposed, and hence the adoption of the bill advocated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, proposing the acceptance of League Island, necessarily conflicts with a proposition for the examination of any other site, because if League Island be once accepted no other site will be deemed necessary by the Department, either in the immediate present or in the indefinite future.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] give way for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. MYERS. I will.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move, then, that the House adjourn.

Mr. RAYMOND. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to withdraw that motion for a moment that I may make a report from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I yield, with the understanding that it will take but little time.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. RAYMOND, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. RAYMOND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN TREATIES.

Mr. RAYMOND, from the same committee, reported back Senate joint resolution No. 69, making an appropriation to negotiate treaties with certain Indian tribes, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I insist that this bill, making an appropriation, must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that a Delegate is not entitled to make such an objection as will prevent the joint resolution from being now considered.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HALE. I object to the joint resolution at the suggestion of the Delegate from Dakota, who wishes to be heard on it.

Mr. RAYMOND. I have reported this joint resolution under instruction of the Committee on Appropriations. I have no desire to prevent any member or Delegate from discussing it who may desire to do so. It is a subject which ought to be canvassed.

The SPEAKER. The objection comes too late, as the joint resolution has been read a third time.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Let me ask the Chair a question. I would like to know why I am sent here if I am not to be permitted to attend to the interests of my constituents.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will answer the question. The gentleman is sent here as a Delegate to discuss the merits of all questions in regard to the Territory of Dakota or elsewhere, but he is not entitled to a vote.*

Mr. BURLEIGH. This affects the interests of my constituents more than almost any bill during this session. It relates to the naturalization of these Indians.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I only yielded to the gentleman to bring in one bill, and on condition that it was not to take up much time. He has brought in two and claims the right to the floor. I insist the gentleman has violated his obligation to me.

Mr. RAYMOND. The gentleman may insist on that; but I insist that I am now entitled to the floor upon this bill. I have not the slightest intention to call the previous question, to insist upon the passage of the joint resolution at this time, or to do anything else which can be disagreeable to the gentleman from Wisconsin. I will yield to a motion to adjourn.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. That is all that I wish. I desire simply to move to adjourn. Let the House decide whether it will agree to it. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at twenty minutes after four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. CULLOM: A petition signed by A. Johnson, and others, citizens of Springfield, Illinois, in favor of an increase of duty on manufactured marble brought into the United States.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE: A memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Milwaukee for an act authorizing the building of a bridge across the Mississippi river.

By Mr. FARNSWORTH: A petition and remonstrance of certain railroad companies in Illinois, Iowa, and Missouri, relative to bridges over the Mississippi river.

By Mr. GARFIELD: The petition of Hon. G. B. Northrop, of the Massachusetts State Board of Education and the principals of the Massachusetts normal schools, asking for the establishment of a national bureau of education.

By Mr. HOLMES: The petition of A. M. Holmes, and others, citizens of Madison county, New York, for repeal or modification of law imposing tax of ten per cent. upon banks paying out the notes of State banks after July 1, 1865.

Also, the petition of A. M. Holmes, and others, citizens of Morrisville, Madison county, New York, for establishment of bureau of national insurance.

* Objecting to unanimous consent is exercising the highest prerogative and power of a member.

By Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY: The petition of G. W. Elliott, for payment for losses sustained by him at the hands of the Union Army during the late war.

By Mr. RITTER: The petition of heirs of William M. Wooten for pension.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 7, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the petition of Captain Robert Ritchie, of the United States Navy, praying to be relieved from the action of the retiring and advisory boards of the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of R. L. McElree, of Mississippi, praying for compensation for the alleged destruction of his property by United States troops; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORGAN presented the memorial of Hayward A. Harvey, praying for a further extension of the patents granted to the late Thomas W. Harvey for the manufacture of wood screws; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. MORGAN. I present the memorial of George W. Colby and others, lately officers of the Union Army, now engaged in planting cotton in Alabama, remonstrating against an increase of the tax on cotton. These petitioners state that prior to embarking in this business they made their estimates of probable success upon the basis of taxation then in force. They saw in those estimates a prospect of gain, perhaps sufficient in itself, certainly so in view of patriotic results, should they succeed. They have had many and peculiar difficulties to encounter in the outset of their experiment, arising from the uncertain growth of seed long laid by, but which had necessarily to be used in planting, from several years' neglect of the lands to be cultivated, &c. To such an extent are their investments depressed by these causes that they look mainly to the result of future years for legitimate gain from their endeavors. They now see, with alarm, this result threatened by an overwhelming increase of taxation, an addition of one hundred and fifty per cent. to the basis on which their labors were begun. They therefore pray that the proposed tax of five cents per pound on cotton may not be levied. I move that this memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I present a memorial of the Commissioners of Emigration of the State of New York, remonstrating against the passage of the bill to amend an act entitled "An act to encourage immigration," &c. As that subject has been acted on, I move that the memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of H. Trowbridge's Sons, praying that an American register may be granted to the bark Golden Fleecce, and also a petition of Bennert & Brown, praying that an American register may be granted to the Prussian-built bark Marget, reported a joint resolution (S. R. No. 104) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue American registers to the barks Marget and Golden Fleecce; which was read and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 481) to amend an act entitled "An act to encourage immigration," approved July 4, 1864, and an act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. VAN WINKLE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was recommitted a bill

(H. R. No. 464) for the relief of John Gordon, reported it without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 171) for the relief of Reuben Clough, reported it without amendment, and submitted a written report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred sundry petitions and memorials praying for the enactment of just and equal laws for the regulation of inter-State insurances of all kinds, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the select committee to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 357) to aid in the construction of telegraph lines, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes; which was read and passed to a second reading.

GOODRICH AND CORNISH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. CONNESS, Mr. MORRILL, and Mr. BUCKALEW as the committee of conference on the part of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 77) for the relief of Ambrose L. Goodrich and Nathan Cornish, for carrying the United States mail from Boise City to Idaho City, in the Territory of Idaho.

GREATHOUSE AND KELLY.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I am instructed by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 338) for the relief of Henry Greathouse and Samuel Kelly, to report it back without amendment; and as it simply authorizes the Postmaster General to settle the account of these persons equitably, I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which proposes to direct the Postmaster General to adjust and settle the claim of Henry Greathouse and Samuel Kelly for carrying the mails of the United States on route No. 16001, from Placerville to Idaho City, and on route No. 16002, from Fayetteville to Placerville, in the Territory of Idaho, from July 1, 1864, to July 1, 1865, and to award and pay to them for that service such sum as may be in accordance with the principles of equity and justice.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not know but that this bill is all right; but it is a kind of legislation I never like, to authorize and require the head of a Department to settle a claim on principles of equity and justice, without specifying the amount, without having any limitation or any restriction whatever upon it. It is a kind of legislation that we have not generally approved, and I never like to vote for it. If the committee have examined this matter, and know what the amount of the claim is exactly, and it can be defined, then I am very willing to vote for the bill; but if it is an undefined, undeterminable thing, I would rather that it should be investigated.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The case is simply this: these parties carried the mail for a considerable distance in California and Idaho without authority from the Department, but at the request, I believe, of the postmasters along the line. They carried it in four-horse coaches, and carried it at certain times under very great disadvantages. They have come here and asked compensation for this service, and, as I understand, the Postmaster General is perfectly willing to give them compensation, but does not feel authorized to do it without the action of Congress. This bill simply authorizes the Postmaster General to pay them such a sum as he shall deem equitable under the circumstances. I suppose he would pay them what is authorized generally by the Department for similar services in that portion of the country. I think there is no amount fixed.

Mr. HOWE. What is the distance over which this mail has been carried?

Mr. VAN WINKLE. My impression is that it is about two hundred miles on the two routes.

Mr. HOWE. A daily mail?

Mr. VAN WINKLE. No, sir; a weekly mail, I think.

Mr. HOWE. For how long a time?

Mr. CONNESS. One year.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. About a year.

Mr. HOWE. I believe it is contrary to the usage of Congress to allow the heads of Departments to settle such unliquidated claims. It seems to me we ought to have some limit to the amount that shall be paid for this service. It seems to have been a voluntary service. I should like to know what sort of a community was supplied by this mail—something about the value of it to the public. I should judge by the statement of the Senator from West Virginia that it was an object to the proprietors of the line to run a coach for the sake of passengers, and that they were carrying the mail as a matter of accommodation to somebody. Who was to be accommodated by it I do not know, for I do not know anything about the character of the country.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I do not wish to press the bill upon the Senate at this time if they do not feel prepared to act upon it. I am willing to let it go over in order that Senators may have time to examine it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

LAND TITLES IN ST. LOUIS.

Mr. HARRIS. The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 15) authorizing documentary evidence of titles to be furnished to the owners of certain lands in the city of St. Louis, have instructed me to report it back with a recommendation that it pass, and if there be no objection on the part of Senators I desire to have the bill put on its passage now.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 15) authorizing documentary evidence of titles to be furnished to the owners of certain lands in the city of St. Louis was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It is recited that within the city of St. Louis there are many lots, tracts, pieces, and parcels of land which were confirmed by the act of Congress of June 13, 1812, on the ground of inhabitation, possession, or cultivation of the same prior to December 20, 1803; that in some cases there is no adequate documentary evidence of these confirmations; that in consequence of the death of the ancient witnesses, who knew the facts of inhabitation, possession, or cultivation, the owners of these lands, in cases where there is no adequate documentary evidence of confirmations, are without complete evidence of title as against the United States; and that persons holding grants and confirmations of lands in St. Louis, under other acts of Congress heretofore passed, may in some cases be without perfect documentary evidence of those grants or confirmations by the United States, and difficulties may hereafter arise therefrom, to the great injury of such persons; and it is therefore proposed to enact that the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Missouri may, by proper decree, declare released, granted, relinquished, and conveyed by the United States, in fee-simple and in full property, all of the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to any lot, tract, piece, or parcel of land within the city of St. Louis, Missouri, to the person or persons having the best claim or claims to the same; but this is not to authorize the court to declare released, granted, relinquished, and conveyed any land within any wharf, street, lane, avenue, alley, or other public thoroughfare, or within the boundaries of any land which has heretofore been granted or assigned by the United States for the use or support of schools, or within the boundaries of any land heretofore lawfully confirmed or lawfully granted by the United States, where full, sufficient, and complete documentary evidence of such confirmation or grant now exists of record.

Every person desiring a decree in his or her favor is to file a petition in the district court, asking for such decree and describing the land for which it is desired; and the United States and all persons claiming such land adversely to the petitioner (if there be any such adverse claimants) shall be made defendants in the cause; and if any party shall be a minor under the age of twenty-one years, a guardian ad litem shall be appointed by the court. The court is to have full and complete power, jurisdiction, and authority to hear, try, and determine all questions arising in the cause relating to the claim of the petitioner, the extent, locality, and boundaries of the claim, and all other matters connected therewith or concerning it; and also to have power to make, prescribe, and enforce such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper to carry the act into full and complete execution. A copy of every petition, and a copy of the writ or process thereto attached, shall be delivered to the district attorney of the United States for the eastern district of Missouri by the marshal for that district, which delivery shall make the United States a party to the cause specified in such petition, without any other or further proceedings, notice, service, writ, or process; and the district attorney is to make such defense for the United States as in his opinion the public interest may require; but no answer or other pleadings filed by him in such cause shall be required to be verified by oath or affirmation.

For the purpose of more completely describing, identifying, and defining the boundaries, situation, and locality of any lot, tract, piece, or parcel of land sought to be released, granted, relinquished, and conveyed under the act, the district court may cause an accurate survey, plat, and description thereof to be made at the expense of the petitioner; and all of the expenses and costs of all suits under the act are to be paid by the respective petitioners, and the payment thereof may be enforced by execution or otherwise. Every decree which shall be rendered under the act in favor of any petitioner is to be deemed a full, sufficient, and complete release, grant, relinquishment, and conveyance, in fee-simple and in full property, to such petitioner, and to his or her heirs and assigns, forever, of all of the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the land described in the decree.

Whenever the district court or the circuit court shall render a final decree concerning any lot, tract, piece, or parcel of land the court shall cause to be transmitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office a full, true, and complete transcript of the final decree, and of the description or survey of the land. Any party to any final decree rendered by the district court in any suit or cause commenced under the act may appeal to the circuit court of the United States for the district of Missouri, at any time within one year from the time of the rendition of the final decree, and not after that time; and on the granting of the appeal, a full, true, and complete transcript of the final decree, and of the petition, and all other pleadings and proceedings in the cause and of the evidence therein shall be transmitted to the circuit court. When the appeal shall have been completed, the circuit court shall have full and complete jurisdiction over the cause, and may allow the pleadings to be amended if necessary, and may admit new parties if necessary, and shall hear, try, and determine the cause de novo, without regarding any error, defect, or other imperfection in the proceedings of the district court, and shall render such final decree therein as the facts and the justice of the cause may require. In case of any difference of opinion between the judges of the circuit court upon any question arising in such cause, the same may be certified to the Supreme Court of the United States for its decision thereon as in other cases.

All the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to all of the wharves, streets, lanes, avenues, alleys, and other public thoroughfares which are situate, lying, and being within the corporate limits of the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, are granted, relinquished, and conveyed by the United States, in fee-simple and in full property, to the city of St. Louis, and to the successors and assigns forever of that city; but no individual rights or titles acquired previously hereto shall be in any manner impaired or prejudiced hereby.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 654) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, in which it requested the concurrence of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 37) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867; and

A bill (H. R. No. 459) granting a pension to Anna E. Ward.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 356) for the relief of the United States Express Company; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 106) authorizing the promotion of Captain Robert Ritchie to the grade of commodore on the retired list; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 438) in relation to the courts of Washington Territory—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (H. R. No. 621) to regulate and secure the safe-keeping of public money intrusted to disbursing officers of the United States—to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (H. R. No. 654) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866—to the Committee on Finance.

KANSAS AND NEOSHO VALLEY RAILROAD.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 285.

Mr. SUMNER. How much time will it take?

Mr. HENDERSON. We have had it under consideration here before, and there is but one amendment now to consider.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 285) granting lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Kansas and Neosho Valley railroad, and its extension to Red river.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I have some objections to this bill, and if it is the pleasure of the Senate to hear those objections now I will proceed to present them. This bill proposes a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Kansas City to the southern boundary of the State of Kansas, and contemplates the extension of the road through the Indian Territory down to the northern line of Texas. The question is, under all the circumstances ought Congress to make this grant of lands? I think not; but these bills pass so much as a matter of course in this body that I am reluctant to say anything against it. I do not believe that if Senators understood the exact force and scope of this bill it would pass; but I have not much expectation of eliciting sufficient attention to secure the full understanding of the measure.

To the State of Kansas there have been made the very largest grants of land, I believe, that have been made to any State in the Union; and the Senate will be struck by an examination of the map with the enormous amount of land that has already been granted to the State of Kansas. I have a map of the surveys of that State, upon which are extended the different roads to which grants of land have already been made. Senators have but to examine this map a moment to see how much of the State remains yet to be granted. It is not a question of how much is granted, not a question whether lands ought to be granted, but whether there is any place left to put a road upon, and whether there are any lands remaining to be granted.

Senators will observe that there is already a grant connected with the Pacific road, starting from Kansas City, running westwardly through the extent of the State. That is ten miles on each side of the road, I believe, and perhaps twenty. I am not sure.

Mr. POMEROY. Ten.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Ten miles on each side, and I think then, if for any cause portions of the lands have been sold or otherwise appropriated, the difference may be made up within a distance of perhaps twenty miles. Then, sir, there is a grant from Atchison by the way of Topeka and Council Grove to the southwestern corner of Kansas, being a road extending from the northeast corner of the State or very near that, in a southwesterly direction to the southwestern corner of the State. That is a grant of alternate sections for ten miles on each side of the road, and then the difference to be made up from a larger extent of country.

Then there is a road from Fort Riley, in a southeastern direction, to a point on the southern boundary, or near that, where that road will intersect a road for which another grant has been made. Then there is a grant for a road from Leavenworth by the way of Lawrence, thence in a southerly direction to the southern boundary of the State of Kansas, in the direction of Galveston bay, in Texas. Senators have but to look at this map prepared at the General Land Office to see the extent of the grants already made to the State, until now I presume that one half of the vacant lands in the State of Kansas are at $2 50 per acre.

The Senator from Missouri takes an interest in this particular road to which it is now proposed to make a grant, and I presume because it is proposed to run near the Missouri line. Now, sir, to understand the claim that Missouri may have upon this particular road I will call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there has already been made to the State of Missouri a grant of lands for a railroad running in a southwestern direction by Springfield. That was a grant of alternate sections, as I recollect, for six miles on each side of the road, with a right to make up any deficiencies within a distance of fifteen miles on each side of the road. That road runs down to the southwestern part of Missouri, takes much of the public lands in that portion of Missouri lying to the east of Kansas and near the State line.

The road for which it is now proposed to make a grant to the State of Kansas is to run from Kansas City in a southern direction to the southern boundary of the State. That road is to run almost parallel with a road to which there has already been a grant made. We have already made a grant for a road running from Lawrence in a southern direction to the southern boundary of the State. That road is just thirty-six miles west from the eastern boundary of Kansas. A road to which we have already made a grant lies just thirty-six miles west of the boundary line of Kansas; and now it is proposed to grant lands to construct a road between that road and the Kansas boundary line. There is not room between that grant already made and the eastern boundary of Kansas to make a full grant. By reference to the map before me it will be observed that the grant already made extends to within about fifteen miles of the State line, and it is proposed to place another grant upon the map of Kansas, which through its whole extent will lap on the grant already made, and in that part of Kansas not leave a single foot of land, I presume, at $1 25 an acre. I know the Senator from Kansas the other day said that this grant amounted to but little, perhaps not more than seven or ten thousand acres of land in the State of Kansas.

Mr. POMEROY. Not five thousand.

Mr. HENDRICKS. He says not five thousand. Shall Congress pass a bill making a grant of land where there are not to exceed five thousand acres of land? What is the purpose of such a grant? It is really not to endow the State and the company with lands, because there are none to grant, comparatively; but it goes before the commercial world as a grant of land, and gives a credit to the company to which that company is not entitled; and, while there is nothing to grant, it will enable the company to go into the market and sell its bonds upon the representation that it is a land-grant road. That is all the effect it can have. It will enable the company, as I think, to impose on the moneyed men of the country. The admission made by the Senator that there are not more than five thousand acres of land in that part of the State of Kansas, is an admission that we ought not to pass this bill.

I had a table the other day showing the exact amount of land that has been granted to the State of Kansas, or as nearly as it could be arrived at, but I have mislaid it.

Mr. HENDERSON. It will be found on page 168 of the report.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is stated there at two and a half million acres. That is not the table that I referred to, which gives the grants in detail. That two and a half million acres, as I understand, is independent of the Pacific railroad grant, as I think another table shows that two and a half million acres have been granted to the roads in Kansas, besides the Pacific railroad grant, which runs the entire extent of the State of Kansas, from the east to the west.

Mr. HENDERSON. That table includes the Pacific railroad grant.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No. The two million and a half of acres do not include the Pacific railroad grant, as I understand. This is two and a half million acres granted to the other roads. Until we know how much is given to the Pacific railroad we cannot say how much has been granted to the State of Kansas. The Senator from Kansas says that the State of Kansas did not receive what was granted to the Pacific road. Was not that a grant of land in the State of Kansas to make a very important railroad through the State; and shall not the amount of land appropriated for the construction of a first-class road through her entire limits be charged to the State of Kansas? That is not to be questioned. Independently of that magnificent grant to the Pacific railroad, there have been two and a half million acres granted to that State. Now it is asked to make an additional grant, commencing at Kansas City and running for a distance in a southwestern direction, and then in a southern direction, so as to run through the eastern tier of counties in the State of Kansas.

I have another objection to this grant. I think it conflicts with a grant already made. We made a grant on the 3d of March, 1863, to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of a road "from the city of Leavenworth, by the way of the town of Lawrence, and via the Ohio City crossing of the Osage river, to the southern line of the State, in the direction of Galveston bay, Texas, with a branch from Lawrence, by the valley of the Wakarusa river, to the point on the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé railroad where the said road intersects the Neosho river," of "every alternate section of land designated by odd numbers for ten sections in width on each side of said road and each of its branches." By that act we granted the alternate sections to aid in the construction of a road from Leavenworth to Lawrence, and from Lawrence to the southern boundary of the State of Kansas, in the direction of Galveston bay. I ask Senators, what is the meaning of that language in the act of 1863—"from Lawrence to the southern boundary of the State of Kansas in the direction of Galveston bay?" To understand the force and purpose of that language, it must be considered that at the time Congress used it it was known to Congress that the State of Texas was constructing a road from Galveston bay in a northern direction to the northern boundary line of that State; and this road to which the grant was made in 1863 is intended to be the great connecting road between the Missouri river and the Texas road; so that there shall be an entire line of railroad from Leavenworth, on the Missouri river, to Galveston bay, in southern Texas. When completed it will be one of the greatest lines of railway in the western country. It will pass through the great agricultural region on the Missouri river, and connect with Galveston bay in the south. Everybody, on a moment's inspection of the map, will see the importance of that work; and by the grant of 1863 it was the purpose of Congress to facilitate the construction of that great connecting road. Is it now the purpose of Congress by a competing grant to defeat that great work? It has been commenced, and through the agency, as I understand, of the Pacific road, it has been built from Leavenworth to Lawrence, and surveys have been made south of Lawrence in the direction of Galveston bay. The purpose of the company to which the State has transferred this grant is, as I understand, to prosecute the work. The grant was made three years ago. Very little of the work, if any, has been done south of Lawrence, but the road has been completed from Leavenworth to Lawrence, and surveys have been made at least for a portion of the distance from Lawrence toward the State line.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will inquire of the Senator what company built the road from Leavenworth to Lawrence.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I stated to the Senate a moment since that that portion of the road from Leavenworth to Lawrence had been built through the instrumentality of the Pacific railroad. It is called the Pacific railroad branch, I believe. The land grant is to complete that work from Lawrence to the southern line of Kansas, to make a connection with the Texas road so as to reach Galveston bay. Three years have passed and only the line from Leavenworth to Lawrence has been built. It is not important to inquire whether it has been built by this company or that company. The only important inquiry is, has it been built? So much of the road contemplated by the act of Congress has already been built, a distance, I believe, of about thirty miles, and surveys in a direction from Lawrence south have been already made. The question that I now present to the Senate is, is it the purpose of the Senate to provide for a competing road running not further than thirty miles from the road to which we have already made a grant? The northern terminus of the proposed road is Kansas City, and that is about thirty-six miles from Lawrence; and that is the greatest distance that these two roads can be apart at any one point; and then at the southern boundary of Kansas this bill provides that there shall be a junction of the two roads. Then we shall have two roads progressing at the same time: the one from Lawrence to the south line of the State of Kansas, and the other from Kansas City, a distance of thirty-six miles, according to the public surveys, coming down until it joins the road to which we have already made a grant, their greatest distance apart being thirty-six miles, and forming a junction at the south line. How far—

Mr. HOWARD. I believe the morning hour has expired, and I must therefore take the liberty of calling up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to have a vote taken on this bill, if possible. We have had it before us for three days, and I should like to dispose of it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This bill will have to be discussed to some extent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to have the special order laid aside informally for a few minutes until we pass this bill.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no doubt the honorable Senator would like to have it laid aside, but I am of a different opinion, and therefore I must insist on proceeding with the order of the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. House joint resolution No. 127 is now before the Senate, and upon that joint resolution the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] is entitled to the floor.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 127) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. WILLIAMS, to strike out the second section and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

Sec. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But whenever the right to vote at any election held under the Constitution and laws of the United States, or of any State, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

Mr. DAVIS addressed the Senate for nearly four hours. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. HENDRICKS. If no gentleman desires to speak, I was requested by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] to take the floor for him, as he wishes to address the Senate on the question; and unless some gentleman proposes to address the Senate now I will move an adjournment.

Mr. CLARK. I will inquire of the Senator from Indiana if he will not withdraw that motion and let us come to a vote on the amendments. We perhaps can take a vote on the amendments without debate, and then go on with the debate on the resolution in the morning, and thus save a little time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana withdraw his motion?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is withdrawn, and the question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] to strike out the second section of the resolution and insert a substitute.

The question being put, the amendment was declared to be agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask for a division. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair declared it carried.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask for a division.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those in favor of the amendment will rise.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to say just one word before the division. I will not take up any time. The object of this amendment is to secure nothing more nor less than is secured by the second section of the original proposition, and it is not pretended by any gentleman that it will accomplish anything additional to what is included in the section as it now stands. I will state a fact in reference to my own State, and then the Senate can do with it what it chooses.

This amendment reads:

But whenever the right to vote at any election held under the Constitution and laws of the United States, or of any State, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, &c.

Now, we have in our State an election for school directors, a general election held in every municipal township throughout the State of Missouri, at a certain time. At that election there are qualifications prescribed that we deem absolutely essential to keep up the common-school system in our State. For instance, property holders only vote for school directors, because the tax for building the school-houses is only imposed on property holders. There is an election also for school trustees. The school directors divide the congressional townships into districts for school purposes, and those trustees are elected by the persons who have children to send to school. Now, if it be intended to exclude all persons who cannot vote at those elections from the basis of representation, I apprehend that not only will the negroes of my State be excluded under the proposed amendment, which will lose us a member in Congress, but it will exclude two thirds of the whites of the State of Missouri. I desire to know whether any such construction can be given to this proposition.

It has been said, in reply, that the proposition as it now stands is subject to the same objection. I think not; because no court will construe, and Congress cannot possibly construe, the meaning of "the elective franchise," as generally used, to apply to such elections as that. I, at least, prefer the language of the original section to this amendment. I do not want to put myself in the way of what has been determined by the committee; but I do not desire to vote for a proposition that a sound and reasonable argument can be made against. I see no use of it. We do not accomplish anything whatever by it. Of course it may be left to Congress hereafter to say, under the section as it now stands, whether "the elective franchise" has been refused or not, and of course they will apply it to the general elections for political offices. But the language of this amendment is, "whenever the right to vote at any election." That language is not used in the original section. There is an election in my State where individuals are denied the right to vote unless they have a property qualification. The section which it is now proposed to strike out and to put this in lieu of it does not contain this objectionable language. It does not say "at any election." Therefore the inference will be that it applies only to those general elections at which political officers are elected, members of the Legislature, Governor, judges, &c. I prefer that this amendment should not be adopted. I do not think it ought to be the desire of members of the Senate to put any gentleman in an indefensible position in his own State where the laws of his State are of such a character that he cannot defend himself against a reasonable, rational opposition.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is in error in one particular, in saying that there was no difference between this amendment and the section as originally reported.

Mr. HENDERSON. In design.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is no difference in design; but the difficulty is, that as originally reported the provision was, in my judgment, and in the judgment of others, quite imperfect, for this reason: its language was, "if the elective franchise shall be denied or in any way abridged." The preceding clause was that "Representatives shall be apportioned" in such and such a manner. The subject-matter of the clause is simply the apportionment of Representatives in Congress. Then it goes on to say, "if the elective franchise shall be denied." It is a very common and well-received rule of construction that the words in a sentence must, if they can be naturally, limited to the subject-matter of the provision itself. Therefore it might be held, and in my judgment it might be properly held, as the section stood originally, that if the elective franchise was granted in the election of Representatives to Congress and denied in everything else, that denial in everything else would not have any effect on the basis of representation, and under that construction the provision would not accomplish the purpose which was designed, because it was designed to cover the whole; and therefore it became necessary to change the language. The committee decided that it was advisable to change the language, and we decided on the language that is found in the amendment now before us. If other language can be found that is unobjectionable, and that would cover it, of course we are not particular about that.

I do not think the amendment is open really to the objection that my friend has stated. It is intended to cover the election of officers generally; but if all those arrangements which are made with reference to minor matters are looked to, it would be impossible absolutely to give it any practical effect, because you never could tell what the numbers were that were disfranchised, if you please to call it disfranchisement, by any provision of the kind that he speaks of. If it would be held to apply to the election in school districts of school officers, I do not see why, by the same rule, it would not apply to the election of directors in banks or other corporations in the States, and certainly it never would be carried to that extent. The words must have a reasonable construction always, and a reasonable limitation.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will it apply to the election of city officers under the amendment as it now stands?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it would to municipal officers.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then why would it not apply to the election of a township officer, because that is still larger?

Mr. CLARK. Is it a political office? I do not think a school director is.

Mr. HENDERSON. The mayor or recorder of a city is not a political office.

Mr. FESSENDEN. A municipal officer is a term very well understood. I think it would be a matter of difficulty, not to say impossibility, to carry it out with reference to finding out who were disfranchised in such elections as the Senator speaks of, and I do not think this proposition could be held to apply to such elections at all. I do not believe it will be attended with any difficulty. At any rate, to meet the object, we could not devise a better form of words than we have. I know I worked on that second proposition until my head got so thoroughly muddled with it that I would not attempt to make another.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose it is in order to amend the proposition before it is acted upon.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest that the Senator had better let it be adopted, and then he can move his amendment when we come into the Senate, and he will have an opportunity to deliberate upon it in the mean time.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not wish to take any time about it; but my objection is a serious one, and I am in earnest about it. It is a thing that I really think ought to be attended to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We do not seem to be making any progress, and there is some misunderstanding as to what the precise meaning of this language is. I suggest, therefore, whether we had not better adjourn and settle it in the morning. We all desire the same thing, I suppose.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We had better get through with these amendments and have the resolution reported to the Senate, and then we can amend this proposition afterward, if necessary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But we are not likely to get through them, because there is a controversy arising, and if we have got to change them we had better have a little time to consider them.

Mr. CLARK. I suggest that we have the resolution reported to the Senate, and then we shall have time to change it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Nothing will be gained by that.

Mr. CLARK. We shall get through one stage of it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall not make a motion to adjourn if it is objected to, but I think we might as well adjourn.

Mr. HENDERSON. Before the Senator makes his motion to adjourn, I desire, if this amendment must be adopted, to move an amendment to it. I move to strike out the words—

But whenever the right to vote at any election held under the Constitution and laws of the United States, or of any State, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age—

And to insert:

But whenever the right to vote for Governor, judges, or members of either branch of the Legislature is denied by any State to any of its male inhabitants being twenty-one years of age, &c.

That will certainly include all general officers of a State.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That does not include Representatives to Congress.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator from Maine seems to be laboring under the impression that that does not include Representatives to Congress. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator whether he had not better let the amendment of the Senator from Oregon be adopted, and then move his proposed amendment when we get into the Senate, and it can be considered to-morrow morning.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to correct the Senator. The Senator labored under an error when he said that that amendment would not apply to the election of members of Congress. The subject-matter that we are talking about now is the qualification of voters. I say that the qualification of voters shall be of a certain character for the election of members of either branch of the State Legislature. The Constitution, as it now stands upon that subject, provides in the second section of the first article that—

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States; and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

Therefore, when you fix the qualification of voters for the most numerous branch or the lower branch of the State Legislature, you fix the qualification of voters for members of Congress. You do not propose to alter the Constitution on that subject. The Senator is mistaken in another proposition—that it will not apply to an election held under the Constitution and laws of the United States. The only election that can be held under the Constitution and laws of the United States is for members of Congress. There is but one other case, and that is the election of Electors who elect the President; but those Electors, as now provided by the Constitution, are to be elected by the State in any manner it chooses. A State may provide that the State Senate may elect the Electors, or it may provide that the two branches of the Legislature may elect them. In South Carolina they are never elected by the people; and unless you alter the Constitution on the subject the State Legislatures will yet have the power to regulate that matter entirely as they please, and this amendment will not change it at all. There is, therefore, but one election that can be held under the Constitution and the laws of the United States, and that is the election of members of the lower branch of Congress, because Senators are elected by the Legislatures. You cannot conceive of another election held under the Constitution and laws of the United States. Hence I can see no necessity for saying, in this amendment, "whenever the right to vote in any election held under the Constitution and laws of the United States." Those words are superfluous, because you are fixing only the qualifications of electors in one case under the Constitution and laws of the United States; that is, of members to the lower branch of Congress. Under the Constitution as it now stands, those electors must have exactly the same qualifications as electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. Therefore, we may as well say, "whenever the elective franchise shall be denied to the persons who elect the most numerous branch of the State Legislature," and then, of course, you have included those words "elected under the Constitution and laws of the United States."

The Senate will see what I am aiming at. I do not want to get the people of my State involved in any difficulty, nor the people of any other State, and have the probability of excluding from the basis of representation, or even to have the charge made that that is the object or intent of this thing, to exclude from the basis of representation those persons who may fail to be electors at some school election.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to make a single remark here by way of interrogatory?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWARD. The proposition of the Senator from Missouri is this, if I understand it, that whenever any persons shall be by the legislation of a State excluded from voting for members of either branch of the Legislature, the persons so excluded shall not be embraced in the basis of representation. Now, suppose the State should fix one sort of qualifications for the voters who are to vote for the most numerous branch of the Legislature and a different kind of qualifications for those who are to vote for the less numerous branch of the Legislature, there would be a portion of the citizens excluded in that case, would there not?

Mr. HENDERSON. The larger portion would be excluded, of course, because it applies to either branch of the Legislature. The larger number would be excluded; that is, if one half of the people were excluded from voting for State senators, of course one half would be excluded from the basis of representation; but if one half were excluded in voting for a senator and only a tenth in voting for the other House, one half would be excluded because the State excluded them in the election of senators. The larger number would always be excluded from the basis of representation.

Mr. HOWARD. Allow me to put it in more tangible form. Suppose, for illustration's sake, that the whole number in a State of male citizens over the age of twenty-one is one hundred thousand, and suppose that by the laws of the State every one of those citizens is allowed to vote for members of the most numerous branch of its Legislature, and that only fifty thousand of them are allowed to vote for members of the upper or less numerous House of the Legislature. You will see, then, that there are fifty thousand citizens of the State excluded from the right to vote.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is so.

Mr. HOWARD. Are those fifty thousand to be included or excluded from the basis of representation in Congress?

Mr. HENDERSON. Under my amendment they are excluded, because according to that they must be qualified to vote for Governor, judges, and members of both branches of the Legislature or else they cannot go into the basis of representation. My object was to carry out the principle of the section proposed by the committee, to make it apply to general, political, and judicial officers, and not to make it apply to all minor officers, because if so applied, technically, in my State it would exclude from the basis of representation two thirds of the white people of the State.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator will see at once that his scheme does not establish any certain and fixed standard for the basis of representation; the elements entering into that basis of representation are quite uncertain and changeable.

Mr. GRIMES. In order to enable the Senators from Michigan and Missouri to come to a satisfactory understanding on this subject, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—20 ayes and 7 noes; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 7, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CANAL AND SEWERAGE COMPANY.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, owing to the illness of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. F. THOMAS,] I have agreed to move that the further consideration of the bill to incorporate the Washington Canal and Sewerage Company, which was to come up this morning, shall be postponed until Tuesday next, after the morning hour, at which time, as I understand, the consideration of the bill will be proceeded with.

The motion was agreed to.

ST. LOUIS AND CEDAR RAPIDS RAILROAD.

Mr. WINDOM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill granting to the State of Iowa lands in alternate sections to aid in the construction of the St. Louis and Cedar Rapids railroad; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

INDIAN EXPENSES.

Mr. WINDOM, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the House what amount of money has been expended for the suppression of Indian hostilities and for the various military expeditions against the Indian tribes during the years 1864 and 1865, stating particularly the amounts expended in each year, and each expenditure respectively.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. ANCONA. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on Thursday, the 28th day of June, at twelve o'clock m.

Mr. KELLEY. I object.

Mr. ANCONA. Is not this a privileged question?

The SPEAKER. It is; but the House is engaged in the consideration of the unfinished business of last evening.

Mr. ANCONA. Can I not call it up at any time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can whenever the House is not engaged in the transaction of other business. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] is entitled to the floor on the unfinished business of last evening.

Mr. ANCONA. Then I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I ask the gentleman to allow me to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. ANCONA. I yield for that purpose.

FOREST CULTURE.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to secure homesteads to actual settlers upon the public domain and encourage planting forest trees and the growth of timber upon the same; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANCONA. I now renew the demand for the regular order.

INDIAN TREATIES.

The House resumed the consideration of the regular order, being Senate joint resolution No. 69, making an appropriation to negotiate treaties with certain Indian tribes, upon which Mr. RAYMOND was entitled to the floor.

Mr. RAYMOND. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that this joint resolution, reported by me from the committee, is the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. RAYMOND. I wish, then, to inquire, if this is laid aside what then will be the regular order?

The SPEAKER. The bill in regard to League Island.

Mr. RAYMOND. Inasmuch as I had no intention in reporting this joint resolution to interrupt the business before the House, I propose to postpone its consideration until such time as will suit the convenience of the House. Next Monday will answer the purpose of the committee, if that will suit the House. If some time on Monday can be fixed I will make a motion to that effect.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that in the pendency of business at this stage of the session it will be impossible to tell when it will be reached unless it is postponed to a time fixed or made a special order.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. This is rather an important resolution, and it should be passed as soon as it can be conveniently reached.

Mr. RAYMOND. I prefer to postpone it until after the League Island bill is disposed of, and upon the suggestion that the gentleman from Dakota [Mr. BURLEIGH] desires to debate it, I will move that it be postponed until that time.

The SPEAKER. After the morning hour?

Mr. RAYMOND. To be taken up immediately after the morning hour on Monday.

Mr. ANCONA. Unanimous consent cannot be given.

Mr. RAYMOND. I ask unanimous consent, then, to have it taken up immediately after the League Island bill is disposed of.

Mr. DAVIS. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. DAVIS. I would like to hear the joint resolution reported.

The joint resolution was accordingly read. It appropriates $121,785 77 to enable the President to negotiate treaties with the Indian tribes of the upper Missouri and the upper Platte rivers.

Mr. RAYMOND. I move the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. If that is not seconded will it give an opportunity for debate?

The SPEAKER. It will.

The question being taken, no quorum voted. Tellers were ordered; and the Speaker appointed Messrs. RAYMOND and DAVIS.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 38, noes 56.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I move to postpone the further consideration of the joint resolution till Monday next after the morning hour.

Mr. RAYMOND. How will it stand then as regards other business?

The SPEAKER. It will come up unless a previous order crowds it out.

Mr. RAYMOND. It is important that it should have an early consideration. The money which is appropriated has already in large part been expended, and the commission for which it is to provide is in progress now. The House should decide one way or the other upon this appropriation at a very early day. If any arrangement can be made by which the consideration of this bill will be fixed for Monday, I will gladly consent to it.

The SPEAKER. The bill can be reached on Monday, immediately after the morning hour, by a suspension of the rules by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. RAYMOND. Then I will consent to the postponement until Monday next.

Mr. BURLEIGH. The reason assigned by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] for the consideration and passage of this bill at this time is the very reason why it should be postponed. I want time for the consideration of this measure, so as to show, as I believe I can show, that this money has been and is being expended, not in accordance with law, but in violation of law, for the purpose of making bogus treaties with bogus Indians.

Mr. RAYMOND. I think the Delegate from Dakota [Mr. BURLEIGH] could not have heard what I said. I consented to the postponement of this bill for the very purpose of giving an opportunity for the examination and consideration of this bill.

The question was taken; and the motion to postpone was agreed to.

Mr. RAYMOND. Subsequently entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was postponed until Monday next after the morning hour.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that there may be a morning hour to-day and each day hereafter, so that we may be enabled to get on with the regular business of the House and not have it crowded out by these special measures.

The SPEAKER. That can be done only by unanimous consent at this time.

Mr. MYERS. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] if his proposition is that there be a morning hour after to-day.

Mr. GARFIELD. To commence this morning.

Mr. MYERS. I must object to that, as we are in the midst of the discussion of an important measure. I would have no objection to the proposition after to-day, but I must demand the regular order of business at this time.

NAVAL DEPOT AT LEAGUE ISLAND.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business of yesterday, being the consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 452) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to accept League Island, in the river Delaware, for naval purposes, on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues [Messrs. KELLEY and O'NEILL] have so ably discussed the subject now under consideration; have so strongly presented the numerous advantages of League Island for the purposes of a national constructive ship-yard and naval depot for wooden and iron vessels; the vast resources of the State of Pennsylvania, emptying as it were into its own lap, at Philadelphia, as rivers run to the sea; that I shall not long occupy the time of the House in adding some of the exhaustless arguments in favor of this proposition. I shall be more than fortunate if after this full discussion I may obtain the attention of the House for a short time; and still more fortunate if I can produce, as I hope to do, some impression by the reasonings which are floating through my mind at present, and which convince me.

I now call the attention of the members of this House to the character of the bill, and what it calls for. It is a bill "to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to accept League Island in the Delaware river for naval purposes."

An attempt is made upon this floor to show that it creates a roving commission, a loop upon which to hang various other propositions, and thus drawing away your attention from the very question at issue to effect by indirection what cannot be done directly. It is true that the acceptance of League Island is not to be perfected until the board of officers provided for in the bill shall recommend it. That was added by the committee, I suppose, for the purpose of satisfying the delicate and sensitive minds of certain gentlemen who year after year have been throwing out slanders against this place, at one moment alleging there was not sufficient depth of water, at another that there was too much ice there in certain seasons of the year, and who have started objections as to the character of the ground and the healthfulness of the locality.

Now, I ask the attention of any member who is willing to vote directly for the proposition in favor of League Island while I state to him that the proviso says nothing more than that if this commission, on visiting this place, shall find these objections to it well founded, then, and then only, may the Secretary refuse to accept it. I should prefer to have no proviso in the bill, but my faith in the advantages of League Island is so strong I have no fear for the result, and no apprehension, even, that the examination will cause any delay.

I propose to ask how this measure originated, but before doing so will pay my respects to and express my admiration for the ingenious, I had almost said the ingenious, member from New London, who for several years has persistently opposed any additional navy-yard accommodations at Philadelphia, and who, beaten at every point in the endeavor to foist his white elephant, New London, on the Government, now with serious countenance and great apparent earnestness offers an amendment with the sole object of destroying the vitality of the bill. He presents a proposition here to add a number of localities for the commission to examine—a proposition which no doubt may strike the minds of many members, especially those who were not in the last Congress, as being an open, fair, and honorable one.

Does any member from Maryland rise upon this floor and ask us to designate for examination any place in his State with a view to its selection for the proposed navy-yard? No, sir. Does any member from Maine demand that we shall include a site in his State? No, sir. We passed the other day a bill providing for the examination of some place upon the coast of Maine—a place where, I presume, the water is salt, as it is brackish at most of the other sites proposed. And I beg the members to note that the former advocate of New London finding League Island gradually gaining ground with Congress, as he says it does in its accretions of land, as a last resort, as a tub to the whale, in order to obtain the votes of gentlemen from these various States, proposes this amendment. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is not in order in this House to mention members by their names, and I shall not do so; but I will say to those gentlemen who were not in the last Congress that a certain Augustus Branderge—probably a near relative of the member who now has proved derelict to New London, [laughter]—instead of saying as the gentleman from Connecticut now says, "Let us be fair; let us take in all the world; let us bring into this bill State after State that we may get vote after vote against this great national enterprise," this relative in the last Congress stoutly, vehemently, and ably advocated his native New London as the best site for a naval station, fitted by nature and art for the great navy-yard of the world—winning the admiration of his constituents, and doubtless thereby gaining for himself an election for many years to come as a Representative and a fit Representative of that region. There was no commission talked of then; oh, no! No disinterested desire to visit other ports or harbors, no fondness for the Patuxent or the Hudson or Portland then. But of course my friend is not responsible for his namesake.

I had always believed, sir, the saying that "figures never lie," until yesterday when I sat at the feet of this gentleman and learned a new arithmetic. I had supposed, too, that history, at least when recorded with contemporaneous pen, spoke the truth; but I learned yesterday that history must be written years after the occurrences it pretends to describe, or those who live at the time may detect the falsity of its statements.

I learned yesterday, for the first time, that the water at League Island is brackish. Sir, in my district—a district whose ship-builders planned and placed upon the waters the New Ironsides, a fit type of the workmanship and enterprise and success of Philadelphia mechanics, worthy representatives of those who thirty years ago launched the ship of the line Pennsylvania, with, even then, one hundred thousand citizens of Philadelphia and one hundred thousand from the surrounding country as spectators; I say that in my district we have the Kensington works, whence a large portion of its citizens obtain their daily supply of drinking water; and they never before heard that the waters of this stream shortly above League Island are brackish. In my boyish days, when I used to swim near Red Bank, opposite to League Island, drinking in many a mouthful of water, I never tasted or dreamed that it was brackish.

Still further, fifty thousand ships come to our wharves and go out again every year—wooden ships, too, the most of them. They lie where the ice is more likely to be, where the water freezes and the ice gathers more rapidly than at any place below it; yet they sail up and out yearly; and we never heard before that vessels were locked up three months at League Island, so that in case of a war the vessels of our Navy, if stationed there, would be prevented for that length of time from getting at the enemy that might be ravaging our coast. So much for fact No. 2.

Let me now call the attention of gentlemen to another statement which has been made, and which might, if uncorrected, mislead members who are strangers to this spot and strangers to the facts of the case. They have heard the gentleman's reference to the mud and ooze, as he calls it, at that island. The gentleman from Connecticut knows how much of truth and how much of fancy there is in his statement, for he has visited the locality. In 1690 this island was marked out on the maps, fast land; and for years and years there have been two hundred and thirty-five acres of solid land about which there need be no dispute. Granting to the gentleman that, with reference to the balance of it, or in building the wharves, it might be necessary here and there to drive piles, as it has been necessary to drive piles at every navy-yard in the United States, and on a gravel bed they make a better foundation than rock; granting this, however, beyond all dispute we have two hundred and thirty-five acres of solid ground, which the gentleman pretends to tell this House is all mud and ooze, with all the sarcasm imparted by a pungent wit and a fertile imagination. I have disposed of fact No. 3.

Mr. Speaker, I have often gone by steamer to Cape May in six or seven hours, yet I learned for the first time yesterday that it would take four days to go from League Island to the ocean. I pass from the Connecticut facts. But even these pale their ineffectual fires before the generosity of the gentleman's amendment and his holy horror of the necessity of discussing the merits of any site in connection with the present bill. Neither the report of the committee, who, with others of this House, speak from observation, nor the opinions of the most distinguished officers of our Navy, nor the statement of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, nor the constant urgency of the Secretary himself that we should adopt League Island as the site for a great national navy-yard, have any weight with him; and the Secretary is roundly rated because he has failed to become sectional or to recommend a station simply because of his nativity near it.

But enough, sir, on this point. How does the question come before Congress? We are called upon to decide whether the large increase of our Navy, its new character, the change from sails to steam, from wood to iron in war vessels, the great advance in naval science, but more particularly in rifled and long-range guns, and the experience of a four years' war, do not necessitate our possession of a capacious constructive ship-yard. First, do we not need more navy-yard room? And next, shall we not adapt it for the purposes of an iron as well as a wooden navy? Very naturally the officers of the Government first discovered our great want in this particular. Where did they seek to remedy it? At Philadelphia, the second city in the Union; not second in its manufacturing or mechanical or even voting population; not second to any in unswerving loyalty to the Government; not second in its noble charities or good deeds during the war or before it, but second only to the great commercial metropolis of the Union, in which we all take a pride. They went to Philadelphia, and what did they find?

I wish on this point gentlemen would give me their especial attention for a few moments. They found a navy-yard of sixteen acres with no workshops which a Philadelphian is not ashamed to show to strangers; with no more than turning room for a large wagon; with no proper machine-shops or steam machinery for building and repairing iron or iron-clad vessels or rolling iron plates; no capacity for casting ordnance or building powerful engines; and instead of a national foundry and workshop and navy-yard, a place not half the size of the Washington yard, not a fourth of that at Charlestown, not an eighth of the Kittery, or a tenth of the Brooklyn navy-yard; while abroad the private dock-yard of the builder of the pirate Alabama is more than ten times as large, and in England and France the chief Government navy-yards cover, each of them, hundreds of acres of land in extent. They found the second city of our country with not a stone dock and a very limited water front or wharfage room or accommodations for building and repairing wooden vessels, even. The question with them was, and it is the question here, shall this ship-building city have more navy-yard room, and while we are giving it shall we not build a national establishment worthy of the nation; not an additional yard, but by a transfer from one place to another with superior natural advantages and greater area erect one which will aid us to defend ourselves, if necessary, against the navies of the world?

We are at peace and I trust may remain so. Yet on our northern border, even now, a departure from our more than generous neutrality in the Canadian affair might bring on a conflict with England. On the southwest the advocacy of the Monroe doctrine, so dearly cherished by every American, or the carrying out of our hatred of despotism, might involve us in a war with the greatest of despots. If a single shot had been fired from Commodore Rogers's vessel, off Valparaiso, as many wished it had been, we might have been embroiled with Spain. The sale of a single iron-clad to Brazil or Paraguay or Uruguay might lead to entanglements with South America. Meanwhile, in Europe they feel the throes of a coming political earthquake, and the fires of volcanoes which may shortly burst forth may yet bring a spark to the American borders. We are bound in honor to the country, to the soldiers and sailors who fought for its preservation, to the present and posterity, to guard its perpetuity and be prepared at all times against a foreign war. And for that purpose we should have proper navy-yard accommodations for our vessels in time of peace.

Now, Mr. Speaker, suppose this amendment prevails; you do exactly this: you are led away by the idea that we are to have an additional navy-yard by the plausible theory that we had better go about the country and see where we should locate it. Whereas the defeat of this bill—and the success of the amendment really defeats the object of the bill—prevents the present acceptance of any site and deprives the country, perhaps for years, of the very thing the Government asks for.

The introduction of the substitute was only intended as a basis upon which to say to the citizens of New London, "I have fought for your interests. I have got this matter delayed another year, and there is yet hope for you." I do not blame the gentleman or his colleagues for their efforts, and I commend them to the votes of their constituents as fighting manfully for Connecticut and New London.

I again say to the members of this House that this bill comes before them with the sanction of the committee after repeated examinations in Congress session after session, and with the indorsement of eminent naval officers. And now I believe the request for further delay will be voted down and the measure adopted.

If you will turn to Lippincott's Gazetteer you will find the following description of New London:

"It is built on a declivity facing the south and east. The site being considerably incumbered with granite rocks, it was not laid out with any great regularity, though within a few years much has been done in the way of grading and other improvements to overcome the original inequalities of the surface."

"The original inequalities of the surface!" And so New London, with its rocky sides rising from twenty, sometimes as high as one hundred feet, did not impress anybody very favorably after they came to look at it for the purpose of a navy-yard such as we now desire, and the gentleman acted sensibly in abandoning his pet for a time, and endeavoring, amid the many, to let its defects pass out of the view of an apparently unfavorable Congress.

I have stated how it was that the site of Philadelphia came to be sought for this purpose. I have stated our national necessities in this matter, our local wants, which mean our national want; that scarcely an officer of the Navy ever recommended New London, and none that I ever heard of recommended any one of these other places so gratuitously added to the bill. The very commission to which the gentleman referred said unanimously that for the purpose of an iron-clad navy-yard, League Island was preferable to New London, and one of the officers of that commission has since said that he was mistaken even in recommending New London as far as he went. Why was that mistake made? Sir, it was a very natural one. At that time the battle between the Monitor and the Merrimac had scarcely been fought, certainly not finally appreciated. These old officers of the Navy scarcely knew what it was to test iron-clad vessels, nor had they yet fully learned the long reach of our improved cannon. At that time Farragut had not passed the forts near New Orleans and in Mobile bay; Fort Fisher had not been taken by Porter; we had not the light on the subject that we have now. And so each year the advantages of League Island and the disadvantages of the other proposed sites have become more apparent.

What, then, are the characteristics which should determine above all others where this additional navy-yard room shall be obtained by the Government? At the risk of repeating what has been better said by others, I cannot help referring to the two great advantages which League Island possesses, and which none of these other places afford. These are, fresh water and distance from the sea.

There has been a little book sent to each of us, a very modest little pamphlet, advocating New London. I suppose it was written by the member of the last Congress I have alluded to. It says that New London is as well situated as Cherbourg, in France, for a national navy-yard. Well, this is a most unfortunate illustration. Because Cherbourg is by the sea it has taken fifty-six years to build its works and fortifications, at a cost of forty millions for the works and twenty millions for the defenses, even with the aid of convict labor—one basin, the "arrière de flot," taking twenty-two years to build. And even now it is admitted that with the modern long-range guns vessels might steam to within three miles, lay outside the breakwater and perhaps ruin it if not reduce it, although tier on tier of casemates rise from the water bristling with cannon.

Portsmouth is on the Channel almost opposite, and the English have spent $50,000,000 to extend and fortify it; serious arguments being made in Parliament that it must be abandoned on account of its proximity to the ocean—five or six miles—and not as near then as at New London. When it was found that missiles could be thrown for miles, the British went twelve miles up the Medway to build Chatham at an enormous expense; the three main advantages alleged in its favor being that it was not on the coast, but the defenses of Sheerness had first to be passed, (as it is with us at Forts Delaware and Mifflin,) that the river could be protected from the lands on either side, and chiefly that it was an island (St. Mary's) affording facilities for wharfrage not on the main land.

I need scarcely go further. Brest taken by the British as Nelson took Malta; L'Orient, on the Bay of Biscay, with its five hundred guns trailed ready for an enemy; Toulon, whose approaches are stronger than Cherbourg, yet with twice five hundred guns and immense fortifications to defend it, tell us we must build a navy-yard where it can be defended at little cost or be safe without other defenses than the ships which may run out from its docks. So much for defensibility.

I admit here that whenever it can be shown that we should build a navy-yard, such as is proposed, within a few miles of the open sea and the reach of modern ordnance; whenever it can be shown that salt water is better than fresh water for iron vessels; or that the granite rocks of New London can be cut down with little expense and be fitter for a foundation than hard ground, I will vote for New London. We do not want this site at Philadelphia selected unless it is for the national benefit.

Philadelphia, I believe, has among her population a larger number of returned soldiers who are skilled mechanics than all the inhabitants, male and female, men, women, and children, of New London. We have offered this island, a free gift, costing over $300,000, to the Government when it required and asked for additional accommodations, and it ought not to be refused.

Mr. MOULTON. I understand League Island to be almost a hundred miles from the mouth of the river.

Mr. MYERS. Eighty miles.

Mr. MOULTON. I would like to ask the gentleman if it would not be a very easy thing to obstruct the river and prevent the egress of these vessels.

Mr. MYERS. I will answer that question. In the first place, in case of a war, the vessels built or refitted at this station will not wait until the enemy shall come, but will steam down the river, which they can do in six hours, and be ready for attack or defense. I really do not know how the river could be obstructed except by ourselves.

I think I have answered the gentleman's question, and I think it was fully answered yesterday by my colleague from the second district, [Mr. O'NEILL.] The canals that come into the Delaware are broad enough and deep enough to take vessels into New York harbor if they could not prevent or break through any obstructions.

But the simple answer to the question is, that neither our vessels nor our land forces would wait till some convenient parties put down obstructions in the river. I am sure the gentleman from Illinois will regard that as a sufficient reply. I will conclude by presenting the distinguishing advantage of the site we propose. Often mentioned, it cannot be touched on too frequently. I have not disguised from the House that we need in Philadelphia more ample room for a Government ship-yard, but while it would be wrong not to accept this gift of the city of Philadelphia, as urged by the President and Navy Department ever since 1862, the reasons are national, not local ones; and what commends League Island above everything, and would render it of great value to the nation, is that it is always surrounded by fresh water. This is not pretended in favor of any of the places named in the substitute.

Gentlemen who have not looked carefully at the subject may think that this is of small moment. It is of the first importance. At the beginning of the war the South Carolina, an iron blockading vessel, had her speed reduced from twelve to six knots an hour because of the barnacles that fastened upon her. On the other hand, the iron steamer Michigan, the vessel that captured the Fenians the other day, built in 1844, and which has been upon the fresh water of our lakes ever since, has never needed any repairs to her hull. The great defect that has been found in England and France with iron and iron-clad vessels is not only that they corrode in salt water, but that the capacity of the engines, the efficiency of the vessels, and their speed has been very greatly reduced, almost fifty per cent. at times, on account of their fouling in salt water and their lack of fresh-water navy-yards, near which to cleanse them. Admiral Robinson, of England, speaks of "the rapidity with which an iron ship gets foul, and the immense loss of all the ship's qualities that follows from the adhesion of zoophytes. No practical remedy," he adds, "has been found for this serious disadvantage. Repeated docking and cleaning is the only palliative."

Before I forget it, let me say here that the result of the examinations of English parliamentary committees is that an iron vessel loses at least one month in the year, because it has to be docked twice a year and it takes fully two weeks to scrape and paint and clean it.

The acting officer at L'Orient gave as his only objection to iron ships their fouling, adding that docks, or scrapers and rubbers, would cure that. If they had the Delaware river in that locality they would have had a scraper somewhat more to their mind.

The London Times continually contains advertisements, sometimes offering as much as £10,000 for the discovery of some effective means for keeping iron vessels as clean as copper now keeps the bottoms of wooden vessels, upon the condition that no patent shall be granted for the process, but shall be open for the use of the Government and the public.

Mr. James Beazley, the chairman of the Ship-Owners' Association, of Liverpool, writes, "There is only the fouling against the iron ships, which none of the patents yet get over; for when they do claim to have done so, it was the action of the tides in fresh water that had cleaned their bottoms," as at Calcutta. For Calcutta trade iron ships answer best, and for that trade half a dozen iron ships to one wooden one are used.

One more reference. John Grantham, of London, says:

"Fouling is the difficulty with the Warrior: it is the incubus that is on the minds of us all; that ships going to foreign climes, unless they can go straight from one port to another and into fresh water rivers, must become foul."

Fresh water, then, for a station is second only to defensibility, and Philadelphia was sought by the Government because of her fresh-water stream, for in times of peace our iron-clad navy, as well as our wooden navy, can lay there and be cleaned without any additional expense, and without the loss to which these ships would be subject at New London or any eligible place thus far presented. There is an ingenious suggestion in the modest New London pamphlet, namely, by "providing means for taking such vessels out of water when not required for immediate service." Expensive as this would be, the notion is not an original one, as Admiral Spencer, in England, stated it in April, 1864, in his evidence before the select committee on dock-yards. He says that as the bottoms of iron ships not only corrode if not covered with a composition, but get covered with barnacles and weeds even then, it would be a great advantage to place on pontoons all the iron ships not wanted for immediate service; "for," said he, "as long as ships' bottoms are of iron, and unprotected from fouling as they now are, iron ships can never be said to be ready for service." No wonder the advocates of New London thought of pontoons, or proposed to bring fresh water from a reservoir "at an elevation of about one hundred feet" to fill docks with, for iron-clads when not in service.

One argument more, and then I shall be through. My friend from New London [Mr. BRANDEGEE] speaks of the expense of piling that will be necessary at League Island. Now, let me say to the gentleman that we have before us the testimony of naval officers; we have, and have had for a century at least, two hundred and thirty-five acres of fast land where there need be hardly any piling; an area larger than that of all the navy-yards of the United States that are now in active operation. There is other land there almost as good as that; and therefore the objection made by him is that we offer twice as much as we need to offer. I invite the attention of the House to this matter of the expense of filling up this ground to three feet above high-water mark. There are houses now upon the land, with brick chimneys that have stood the storms of years, and have not settled or sunk any. There are large oaks there which show the character of the soil; tons on tons of hay are cut there yearly, and the people who live there do not find the place at all unhealthy.

But suppose the expense of filling in should be, what the gentleman from New London supposes it will be, about a million dollars. When did we ever before stickle at expense, especially when the gift saves to the Government three times that sum? Sir, we have in this Congress loaned $6,000,000—I am afraid we shall never get it back, though I hope we shall—to build a ship-canal around Niagara falls from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario. The preamble to the bill sets forth that it is for war purposes, and to provide for that defense which we now ask this House to provide for.

In the appropriations for this year I find that we have purchased Seavoy's Island at Portsmouth for $110,000, and New York alone has obtained over $650,000 for her navy-yard at Brooklyn, including dredging, the river wall extension, and other expenses of that kind. There was no objection made to these necessary outlays. And let me say here that the navy-yard in Brooklyn was continued on Wall-about bay, with a surface soil of ten feet of decomposed vegetable matter, with a quicksand below it. It cost $250,000 for piling, yet I have not heard any objections to this cost, and the improvements have made it an honor, not only to New York, but to the Union.

There is another bill in this House which will come up shortly, and upon which I hope my friend [Mr. BRANDEGEE] will be heard, as he was last year—a bill appropriating $2,200,000 to the contractors for constructing your iron-clads, who, for lack of facilities, for lack of the means which a great national navy-yard alone would have given, have had to come to Congress and ask that we shall make up to them the losses which they could not avoid.

If the gentleman had not, year after year, persistently opposed the views of the Navy Department, persistently prevented the Government from adopting a location for a naval station, this bill would not now be before us, and we should not be asked to award to these gentlemen a sum which the Secretary of the Navy almost tells us is incurred because year after year his recommendations have been negatived or passed by in silence. Time and again these men, with their insufficient accommodations, and with the Government as their only employer, have been obliged to go behind-hand and fail, or else to come to the Government for relief. This is what we would have saved if my friend (who I hope will be kept here for years by a grateful constituency) had not been in Congress at all.

These expenses that are talked about as necessary to be incurred to put League Island in proper condition are but trifling. The sum of a million, if so much is necessary, as the gentleman alleges, to make League Island almost a rock like his own place, to put it in complete order, is, comparatively speaking, nothing when we consider the fact, to which I call the attention of gentlemen, that our present navy-yard will probably be sold for one and a half to two million dollars. One million dollars of this sum can be appropriated to do whatever may be necessary in the way of preparation of the surface of League Island, leaving $1,000,000 more for the erection of the proper work-shops to make it at least almost as respectable as the navy-yard here at this city—a navy-yard not now even a naval station.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have been somewhat discursive in these remarks. As I stated at the commencement, the ground was well trodden; the arguments were well-nigh exhausted. But before I close I must again impress upon the House what is upon my own mind and heart, that the bill now before the House asks for the acceptance of League Island, not for a roving commission. It simply provides that while the Secretary of the Navy shall accept this location he must first be satisfied that the statements which have been made with reference to the unsuitableness of that location are unfounded in fact. We of Philadelphia know that they are unfounded, and hence we are not afraid of a full and impartial inquiry into the facts. The proposition is not for a roving commission, nor one to which an examination of other sites can be appropriately attached, and thus postpone, perhaps till another Congress, the demands of our Navy. Other places have heretofore been examined and found wanting. I beg gentlemen, then, to recollect that in voting for this bill they vote simply for the selection of this site, provided competent naval officers shall find that the charges against it are unfounded or unimportant.

Gentlemen have had laid upon their desks documents which show that a large number of monitors have lain all winter in the back channel of League Island, and some of the largest in front of League Island, and the ice has not disturbed them. The ice does not gather there as much as at the Philadelphia yard, and the gentleman did not demur to the addition of four acres to that yard.

Mud! Why, sir, we heard of mud along the Delaware front before our city was extended; but when wharves were built it was found that there were no mud accretions. Of course there may be mud in the river sometimes; and it is all the better for the vessels that float there.

Draught of water! Why, sir, vessels like the Cathedral, that could not get into New York in a storm, have come round and crossed the bar at Philadelphia, as the Wabash came in and went out, crossing the bar. It is contended in Europe that heavy draught vessels are almost useless. The Great Eastern has hardly one dock in England to which she can go. The vessels of our own Navy, the monitors of the Passaic class, draw only eleven and a half feet of water; the wooden iron-clad coast steamers and blockading vessels only twelve feet. The New Ironsides, the great success of Philadelphia, draws sixteen feet of water, while the French La Gloire draws twenty-eight, and the British Warrior twenty-seven, and they have fifteen vessels drawing twenty-six, twenty-five, and twenty-four feet, respectively. These could not follow where our vessels can go, up the Delaware. Still another advantage.

Mr. Speaker, as has been well said, Pennsylvania is rich in her mineral resources. I do not care to go into an examination of data or particulars, or to repeat what has been so well illustrated. She manufactures fifty millions' worth of iron a year. She sends to market, principally through Philadelphia, almost untold amounts of coal. Her forests abound. Her fresh water is there.

Philadelphia has shown herself more worthy than to have a just and handsome offer thrust aside without cause. I would not speak of her services during the war, for all bore a noble part equally in it. It is no discredit that the place from which my friend comes has only twelve thousand population, while we have near seven hundred thousand, and sent one hundred thousand troops to the field. But there were good deeds done in Philadelphia, not yet forgotten by our soldiers who passed through it, which might well make gentlemen pause who contemplate a refusal or postponement of the request made by her for naval and national purposes.

We have the iron, coal, wood, oil, fresh water, defensibility, skilled labor; all the requisites; more, we believe, than can ever be found combined elsewhere. At least let not these be a drawback to our success, nor bring a single regret if by this our act the city where liberty was first proclaimed to the nations shall become one of the chosen spots whence it may be defended in all coming time.

Mr. THAYER obtained the floor.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask my colleague to yield for a moment so that a time may be fixed for taking the vote.

Mr. THAYER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object to anything that will cut off fair and full discussion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to give the notice.

Mr. KELLEY. I give notice that I shall call for the previous question at three o'clock to-day.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope I shall not be denied an opportunity to say a few words.

Mr. KELLEY. Certainly.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, I have been here long enough to discern and understand with some degree of certainty the signs of the weather in this House. I think I perceive fair indications the House will with great pleasure forego any great addition to the debate on the question before us. I shall therefore, sir, occupy the attention of the House but for a short time.

The delegation from Philadelphia has already occupied a very large, an unusually large, share of the time of the House on this bill; but it should be remembered that this question excites very considerable interest in the city of Philadelphia; an interest which has its foundation not in any sordid or unworthy motive, but simply in a desire to promote the general welfare. The people of Philadelphia believe, as regards the particular enterprise which is now the subject of consideration, the interests of Philadelphia are coincident with those of the nation. Philadelphia does not come here for the purpose of asking a special favor at the hands of the national Government. She is not here, sir, to beg for a measure which will conduce to her own aggrandizement. She has offered this valuable property to the Government under the conviction that its acceptance by the Government would promote the welfare of the General Government. It is true that some incidental benefits would result to the city of Philadelphia from the adoption of this measure. By the removal of the existing navy-yard it would very largely add to the commercial dockage of the city.

It would incidentally conduce to the benefit of the city of Philadelphia by eventually bringing into existence a large amount of property which would contribute to the payment of her local burdens by the taxation of property which is now exempt from it. It would be a benefit to Philadelphia by adding new sources of industry and thrift to those which already engage the labors and attention of the seven hundred thousand souls that dwell within her happy confines.

But those motives are not selfish. No man can characterize those motives as unworthy. They are motives founded in the public welfare and benefit; and if the measure which is the subject of agitation is found to be, as it is alleged by those who are most conversant with the facts, one which will benefit the nation at large, I suppose that no man will deduce any argument against the expediency of the adoption of that measure from the fact that the city of Philadelphia may derive an incidental benefit from the establishment of this great work within her borders.

Sir, I disclaim on the part of the city of Philadelphia any motives less worthy than those to which I have referred. She has never, either by her Representatives or in any other manner, advocated any national measure upon the footing of her own private special benefit. Her devotion to the national interest is traditional. It commenced with the first inspiration of national life, and it has continued with unabated vigor and with unsullied purity through all the chances and changes which have characterized the period that has intervened between that day and the present. No, sir. I spurn the imputation of any selfish purpose on the part of the city of Philadelphia or her citizens in advocating the passage of this measure.

What originally, I suppose, suggested the feasibility and the desirableness of this measure was the fact of the insufficient capacity of the existing navy-yard at Philadelphia. The present navy-yard occupies an area of some fifteen acres of ground, a space which for many years past has been found to be entirely inadequate for the purposes of the yard. The city has grown compactly down to the navy-yard, whereas when it was originally established the yard was at a considerable distance from the city proper.

The navy-yard now, to a certain extent, obstructs the growth of our city on its southern line, for it cuts off the water front. Upon the southern line of the city of Philadelphia this property upon which the old navy-yard is situated has in process of time, by the approach of the city which now completely envelops it, become of great value, and it was supposed that it could be made of interest to the national Government to remove the existing yard from its present site to League Island.

The obvious advantage of such a removal would be this: in the first place, the Government of the United States could sell the old navy-yard property for a very large sum of money, probably for a sum ranging from a million and a half to two million dollars, of such great value has that property become. It was proposed to apply the proceeds of that sale to the improvement of the new yard at League Island, and the city of Philadelphia, which would of course be proud to have a great first-class navy-yard fixed at that point, and which saw in the natural advantages of League Island those features which were most requisite for such a purpose, purchased League Island at an expense of some three hundred thousand dollars and offered it to the national Government as the site of a new navy-yard.

Now, sir, I do not know whether the fact of the liberality of Philadelphia in this respect may not have lead to some degree of suspicion in regard to the measure which is before us. Perhaps if League Island had been offered to the Government at a price instead of having been purchased by Philadelphia at an expense of $300,000 and freely and voluntarily offered to the Government, this opposition might not have existed to this bill. Suspicion, perhaps, may have arisen out of the very fact of the liberality of Philadelphia.

But, sir, the city of Philadelphia purchased League Island at a great expense, and they offered it and still offer it to the General Government as the site of the new navy-yard. The proceeds of the old yard, a million and a half or two million dollars, which will be derived from the sale of that property, will be sufficient to commence, at any rate, upon a sufficiently great scale, the improvement of the new site. And when these advantages were combined with the natural advantages presented by the island itself, it was supposed by the city of Philadelphia that the interests of the nation in this respect were identical with those of Philadelphia; it was supposed that the offer would be accepted with alacrity on the part of the General Government; that they would not turn their backs upon a proposition obviously so advantageous to the General Government upon any suggestion of an incidental benefit to the city of Philadelphia.

Now, sir, the question, as was said yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LE BLOD,] who is a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, is principally whether you will transfer the existing navy-yard at Philadelphia from its present site to the site at League Island. If you build a new navy-yard elsewhere you must go on with annual appropriations for the existing yard at Philadelphia. We have this year appropriated $150,000 to that yard, and we shall have to continue to keep it up. Nobody suggests that we shall abandon Philadelphia as one of the naval stations of the United States.

Well, now, sir, if you establish a navy-yard elsewhere there will be an additional burden upon the country, for you will have to appropriate for two navy-yards instead of one; whereas, if you simply transfer the existing navy-yard at Philadelphia from its present location to League Island, you simply keep up a naval station at Philadelphia; and we, who hold the purse-strings of the nation, may deal out our appropriations for the new station as generously or as stintedly as we please in the future.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I beg leave to ask the gentleman from Philadelphia whether the bill now before the House contemplates the removal of the present navy-yard at Philadelphia.

Mr. THAYER. The bill does contemplate it. I do not know that the bill says anything about the removal, but everybody at all conversant with this question knows that that has been made one of the features of the proposed plan. Nobody proposes that there shall be two navy-yards at Philadelphia; I never heard any one suggest anything of that kind; I never heard any one suggest anything of the sort. Nobody, I believe, entertains such an idea. In fact the idea is strongly set forth by the Secretary of the Navy, as one of the points in favor of this location, that it involves the abandonment of the existing navy-yard at Philadelphia, which can be sold at a great price and the proceeds of the sale appropriated to the improvement of this new site.

Sir, if I had control of this bill I would not object to putting such phraseology as would require the sale of the present site of the navy-yard at Philadelphia, and the adoption of the new site.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I have examined this bill very carefully, and there is not one single word in it with reference to the removal of the present navy-yard at Philadelphia, and I think the result of passing this bill would be that we should have two navy-yards to sustain in that vicinity instead of one.

Mr. KELLEY. Will my colleague [Mr. THAYER] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. THAYER. Oh, certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to suggest that so far as Philadelphia has any selfish motive in offering this island and the back channel to the Government it is that she may be relieved from the commercial obstructions which are presented by the present navy-yard. The object of Philadelphia is to have the navy-yard transferred from a point where it impedes the growth and commerce of the city; its object is to enable the Government to abandon the present yard.

Mr. THAYER. For the information of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HUBBARD] I will read what the Secretary of the Navy said in his communication in reference to this subject. It is as follows:

"The selection of this site for a navy-yard will save to the Government just the sum at which the present yard in Philadelphia can be sold, the estimated value of which is $1,800,000. That we must have a yard at which iron vessels can be built is, I think, admitted. Were it established at any other place than Philadelphia, the yard at that place would be continued, with its officers and large annual expense. Established on League Island, the present yard would be vacated and sold, and the cost of keeping up the present establishment saved. The price that could be realized for it would nearly equip and complete the yard on the island."

I do not believe that any gentleman who has advocated this measure has ever entertained any other idea than that. So far as I know, nobody has even suggested that there should be two naval stations at Philadelphia. On the contrary one of the great advantages of the proposed change has always been regarded to be the advantage which the Government derives from obtaining a new site for nothing, and selling the old site for $1,800,000.

I will not detain the House by a detailed enumeration of all the advantages which may be presented in favor of this measure. But it would perhaps not be amiss for me to sum them up in a short way by a brief allusion to them, in order at any rate that the attention of the House may be called to them, even though it be in a very cursory manner.

In the first place, these advantages have been set forth at great length, and dwelt upon with great emphasis, by the Secretary of the Navy, who, I suppose, should be awarded at least the credit of disinterested patriotism upon this subject. He is not a citizen of Philadelphia or of Pennsylvania; he is not in any way so situated as to be likely to be influenced by Pennsylvania interests. He has acted in this matter not only disinterestedly, but, as we all know, to some extent to his own disadvantage, inasmuch as the course which he has pursued has brought upon him the wrath of some of his own people. But he has had, I have no doubt, a perfectly clear and disinterested judgment throughout this whole inquiry. And the advantages of League Island, which so loudly call upon the Government for the adoption of this measure, are very tersely and satisfactorily summed up by him as follows:

"1. It contains the requisite amount of land. There are on the island four hundred and nine acres of what is called 'fast land,' being high, dry, and tillable, susceptible of use without embankment or other preparation; one hundred and twenty-four acres of marsh land east of Broad street and seventy-seven acres west of Broad street, embracing in the aggregate an area of six hundred acres, or more than five times the area of the largest of our present navy-yards, and twice the size of the largest yard in Europe.

"2. The island possesses the necessary amount of frontage upon the water, which is a most important consideration, and the want of which is one of the great defects of all our present yards. The water front of the island will extend six miles, furnishing room for mooring in safety all the vessels in our present Navy and all we shall be likely to have for many years to come. The sum of money to be saved in warping vessels in and out of slips when a change in their position may be necessary, and in wharfage and rent of docks where private property is used, will be very great in the course of a single year, and, of course, greater in the lapse of time and the necessary addition to our Navy. By possessing an expansive frontage workmen, materials, and stores can be placed on board at the wharf instead of being put on board of tenders and transported into the stream, as is required to be done at all of our yards where there is an insufficiency of frontage, as there is in a peculiar degree at the Philadelphia yard at the present time.

"3. There is an abundant depth of water for all of the purposes of Government. Along the outer shore of the island, near to its edge, and for more than three miles in length, there is a sufficient depth of water to float the largest class of war vessels.

"4. The greatest advantage of this location, and that which, taken in connection with the frontage and depth of water, places it far beyond any rival, is the fact that the yard would be in water wholly fresh. It is a well-known fact that iron corrodes and decomposes in salt much more rapidly than in fresh water, and hence that the endurance of an iron vessel, when either in service or laid up in ordinary, is much greater in fresh than in salt water. Nor is this all. Iron vessels, when exposed to the action of salt water for a considerable period of time, and especially in warm climates, become foul by the accumulation of marine crustacea, thus not only lessening their speed and injuring the vessels, but requiring them to be taken into dry-dock to be scraped. As an illustration of this fact, the iron blockading vessel South Carolina, after a service of nine months in the Gulf of Mexico, had her speed reduced by the accumulation of barnacles, sea-weed, and other marine nuisances, from twelve to six knots an hour, requiring her to be sent North to be cleaned. Had the Philadelphia navy-yard been in a condition to receive her, and complete her other necessary repairs, her passage through the fresh water of the Delaware river from New Castle, which is practically the limit of the salt water, would of itself have cleaned her bottom of those impediments, as perfectly as it could have been done by mechanical means.

"It is hardly doubted by any one that iron vessels are hereafter to constitute our principal reliance for harbor defense. It will unquestionably be the policy of the Government to keep these vessels, when not required for active service, in some secure place, where they will be as little liable to decay as may be, and where the largest possible number can be put in repair, and dispatched to the threatened points at the shortest notice. Experience may show the necessity or economy of keeping such vessels in dry slips, in which case the capacity of this island will by no means exceed the necessities of the Government. Should it be otherwise, and should it be deemed advisable to dismantle and moor them in wet docks in time of peace, the value of League Island for a naval station may be more correctly estimated, when I say that it is the opinion of naval officers, and of scientific experts, that an iron vessel will last more than ten times longer in fresh than in salt water. The United States iron steamer Michigan was built in 1844, has been in continuous service in the fresh-water lakes of the North eighteen years, and has had no repairs to her hull, which is apparently as perfect as it ever was. In salt water her bottom would probably have been destroyed ten years ago.

"5. (The proximity of the island to a large maritime and manufacturing city is one of its greatest advantages for a naval station.) Whenever an extra force of mechanics or seamen are required, or an extra supply of naval stores needed, they can be procured at short notice and at no extra expense. It is well known that whenever such extra force is required at the southern yards, neither of which was near a large industrial population accustomed to such labor, the cost of procuring the necessary craftsmen was much greater than at Charlestown, Brooklyn, or Philadelphia. The men had to be transported at Government expense, extra wages were demanded, and the laborers in almost every instance were clamorous to be retained permanently, because of alleged loss of situations at home. Nor could sailors be procured at those yards in an emergency, except by sending to the northern cities to recruit, always an expensive process, and generally consuming weeks of time, the value of which could not be computed in money. The great advantages of a Government establishment of this kind in proximity to a large mechanical population, whose leading pursuit is the fabrication of iron in its various forms and for its numerous purposes, cannot be overestimated."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] allow me to make an inquiry of him?

Mr. THAYER. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have never been in the habit of interrupting gentlemen, and I do not now interrupt for any other purpose than to inquire from what paper the gentleman is reading.

Mr. THAYER. I am reading from the remarks of the Secretary of the Navy upon this subject, which were incorporated in a speech made by the chairman of the Naval Committee of the Senate [Mr. GRIMES] when he was advocating this measure.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand the gentleman to affirm—perhaps I was incorrect in that understanding—that he was reading from a report of the Secretary of the Navy. It is from a speech made by Mr. GRIMES in the Senate.

Mr. THAYER. The reasons which I am reading are those given by the Secretary of the Navy, and which were incorporated in the remarks of the chairman of the Naval Committee of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania verified those citations and ascertained that they were ever made by the Secretary of the Navy in any authentic form?

Mr. THAYER. I have this authority for their accuracy, that they are contained in a report of a public speech made by the chairman of the Naval Committee of the Senate, who stated in his speech that they were reasons given by the Secretary of the Navy in favor of this site for the location of a naval station.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Reasons given by the Secretary of the Navy where and when?

Mr. THAYER. I do not know at what o'clock it was nor in what room he was when he gave those reasons. But I do not think that the reasons are to be judged by the source from which they come, but by their inherent weight. If they have anything in them they speak for themselves.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Precisely.

Mr. THAYER. I do not suppose they will derive any special weight from the consideration whether they come from the Secretary of the Navy, the chairman of the Senate Naval Committee, or some one else.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Precisely; but I did not suppose—

Mr. THAYER. I decline to yield to any further interruption. I have answered the gentleman's question, and the House are capable of judging whether the reasons assigned are such as entitle them to the indorsement of their judgment. If they are not, then they go for nothing; if they have reason and common sense in them, their validity or strength cannot be impaired by anything that may be said in regard to the source from which they come, or whether they be official or unofficial.

"6. Another consideration of the highest importance is the susceptibility of League Island for perfect defense against foreign invasion or domestic insurrection. The channel of the Delaware, although affording a sufficient depth of water at all times, is so narrow and tortuous for a distance of one hundred miles above its mouth, that a ship in the hands of any other than an experienced pilot, especially with the buoys removed, would have the greatest difficulty in reaching Philadelphia at all. If the present defenses should be considered insufficient, a single martello tower on the edge of the channel, mounted with an iron turret like that of the monitor, would command the approach to the island from the sea more completely than Fortress Mifflin commands Hampton Roads, or Fort Sumter the harbor of Charleston. A succession of such towers would cost less than any one of our large coast fortifications. So far as stationary defenses may be relied on, there can hardly be any system more efficient than this. The island is even more susceptible of defense against a domestic insurrection, being cut off from the Pennsylvania shore by a deep natural moat fifty feet in width. No assault could be made upon it except by vessels, in which, of course, the Government would have such a superiority that no attempt to capture the yard would ever be hazarded, even if we suppose that the materials for an insurrection of that kind would ever be found in the vicinity of Philadelphia.

"7. The accessibility of coal and iron commends League Island very strongly to our favor. Situated at the junction of the Delaware and Schuylkill rivers, it is the natural entrepôt of the whole anthracite coal trade of the United States. The steam power necessary to the maintenance of a modern navy is here obtainable at the smallest cost. Pennsylvania, if not possessing the largest iron resources to be found in the country, certainly has those resources in by far the highest state of development, and in close proximity to the sea-board. Philadelphia is the great iron-mongering metropolis of the country. Her furnaces and shops are numbered by hundreds, her artificers by thousands, and her capital invested in the production of iron by millions.

"8. The island is below the bend on the Delaware, and hence mainly out of danger from ice gorges, from which the present yard suffers to a considerable extent; and yet it should be remarked that the river Delaware is seldom closed by ice, the only point on the Atlantic where fresh water can be obtained that is not closed two or three months in the year.

"9. It is to be observed, also, that the insular position of the proposed yard will effectually estop corrupt speculations in real estate, so far as the Government property is concerned. It will be impossible for jobbers to besiege Congress, with any degree of plausibility or hope of success, to buy the adjoining lots at fabulous prices; and I can hardly conceive of any other than an insular position which will debar the tribe of speculators and lobbyists from all chances of successful assault upon the Treasury.

"10. The selection of this site for a navy-yard will save to the Government just the sum at which the present yard in Philadelphia can be sold, the estimated value of which is $1,800,000."

Now, sir, these are the substantial arguments in favor of the measure. These are the points on which the authorities upon whom this House is accustomed to rely have long since come to a definite and satisfactory conclusion; and hence this measure has been repeatedly recommended to this House by the Secretary of the Navy. It is now recommended by the Naval Committee of this House. Now, sir, allow me to suggest whether it would not be better that those gentlemen who have given no particular examination to the facts upon which this question turns should abide by the deliberate judgment of the official persons upon whose responsibility these recommendations rest than that they should act upon a mere suggestion of objection on the part of gentlemen who have in view the benefit of some other locality. It strikes me, sir, that the House would not act with its usual judgment and discretion if it should adopt the latter course.

But, sir, a substitute is proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut; and here let me say that upon its face this substitute would appear to be a very fair and equitable proposition; and if this were an entirely new question, and a question of an additional navy-yard, instead of the change of the site of an existing yard, there would appear to be a great deal of fairness in that substitute. But if gentlemen will but reflect a moment, they will see that the proposition of the gentleman from Connecticut is delusive in its character. It would result merely in an indefinite postponement of this question; that is all. It proposes a roving commission to examine all the waters of the United States for an additional navy-yard. That is not what the Secretary of the Navy desired or recommended to this House. That is not what the Naval Committee of this House have recommended. They have recommended the acceptance of League Island, which is offered by the city of Philadelphia as a magnificent gift to the Government, that the present navy-yard at Philadelphia may be removed thither. They do not propose the creation of an additional navy-yard, but the substitution of a new one for an existing one.

Suppose, sir, that you appoint your commission. You do not, by this substitute, give the commissioners any authority or power to act. You leave the matter all at loose ends as it has been heretofore. A year or perhaps two years hence that commission will make a report. More probably they will make two reports or three reports, perhaps as many reports as there are members of the commission. Then how much progress will you have made in reaching a decision upon this question? None whatever.

Besides, sir, as time goes on, new sites not now thought of will be clamorously pressed for consideration. At first, sir, the proposition to select League Island was met by an application on behalf of New London, urged by the gentleman from Connecticut who so well represents the interests of his constituents. How is it now? Why, sir, rival interests have sprung up in all quarters. We have suggestions for new navy-yards all along the coast. Every member thinks that his State must have "a finger in the pie." Our action upon this question is made the occasion for a general scramble for a new navy-yard. Sir, I hope this House will not give its approval to any such measure. Very sure am I that the city of Philadelphia, if it had been supposed that her munificence would be met by such a general scramble, would have been too proud to make this offer to the General Government.

The gentleman's speech has perfectly accomplished, no doubt, the purpose for which it was made.

Mr. Speaker, in walking along D street yesterday, I saw a very singular sign. I was forcibly reminded by that sign of the speech of the gentleman from Connecticut. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

"NEW ENGLAND STORE: Established primarily for my own advantage and partly to promote the interests of my customers."

[Great laughter.]

Mr. THAYER. Now, Mr. Speaker, if you will strike out "customers" and insert "constituents," I think you will have a pretty good description of the gentleman's speech. [Laughter.] It was made, of course, entirely in the interest of his constituents. I do not know entirely in the interests of his constituents, because it would seem that the gentleman, to some extent, has abandoned the original line of attack.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let me ask the gentleman a question at this point, inasmuch as this is the place where the laugh comes in. In whose interest were the five speeches made by Philadelphians yesterday and to-day?

Mr. THAYER. Mainly and chiefly in the interest of the General Government, and it was with that spirit and in that interest chiefly that this proposition was originally suggested.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The speeches made have been made, it may be, mainly in the interest of the General Government, but primarily, chiefly, and solely, they were made in favor of the interest of Philadelphia.

Mr. THAYER. I do not propose to detain the House on that subject.

*I have expressed the motives and causes which induced the city of Philadelphia to make this offer. If they do not understand it I should despair of making them understand by further comments on the subject. The real issue is, as has been stated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LE BLODGE], whether you will remove the existing yard from its present site and get a million and a half or two million dollars for it with which to begin your large naval establishment at League Island, or whether you will continue to expend your money on an old site, inadequate for the purpose for which it is used; whether you will continue your large annual appropriations and forego the gift of the city of Philadelphia.

Now, that is the real issue, notwithstanding the comments of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HUBBARD], who, I believe, put in a demurrer on that point, which I trust the House will overrule.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, obtained the floor, and yielded for ten minutes to Mr. SPALDING.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state to the House that during the last Congress I was a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and as a member of that committee had occasion to view this locality now so well known as League Island. I do not say anything in favor of the beautiful city of Philadelphia or its surroundings, which are all pleasant in the highest degree. But, sir, after carefully examining that island, it occurred to me there was such a thing as having a gift, a present of too expensive a character to the donee. I am not now entirely satisfied that the United States would not be largely the loser by accepting the donation of League Island for the purpose contemplated by the donors. It will not now do to cover up the bait on the hook. We all understand it. We know very well that it is contemplated in this plan to make League Island a great national navy-yard for the building and repairing of iron-clad navies, the Navy which the United States now has and the mightier navies we will have by and by as years roll onward. The outlays of public money upon this spot are to be enormous if the project is to be carried into execution; and when we undertake it in its incipient stage we ought to be well satisfied we have the correct ground to build upon. Too much caution cannot be used in this respect.

As at present advised I fear that League Island is rather too secure from the approaches of a foreign foe. I am rather of the belief, the testimony has disclosed the fact, that during two months of every year League Island is inaccessible from the Atlantic. If so, is that a proper place for a naval depot?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would inquire what testimony the gentleman refers to.

Mr. SPALDING. Testimony that came before the Naval Committee of the last Congress. I refer to that generally.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I did not know but he referred to testimony before the present committee. There was no such testimony before it.

Mr. SPALDING. I have not the honor now to be a member of the committee, and I do not pretend to speak of any of the testimony or arguments before the present committee.

Mr. KELLEY. A single moment. I simply desire to say that the records show that in forty years the city of Philadelphia has never been ice-locked; that for forty years there has not been a day when steamers could not make their way to and from the ocean.

Mr. SPALDING. My friend will pardon me. I do not mean to interpose this as argument against the final adoption of League Island. I only say that this thing struck me when I was a member of the Naval Committee, that at a certain season of the year the island was inaccessible. I know the gentleman admitted here in argument that it needed the expenditure of a vast sum of money to prepare that island for the superstructure for an iron-clad navy-yard—more than a million dollars, probably, before the soil will receive the superstructure.

Well, now, are we to adopt this present site contemplated by the bill before us with the notion that we are to simply transfer the old wooden-ship navy-yard—if I may so characterize it—from the city of Philadelphia to League Island, and there let the matter drop? That is not the question at all. If it was only contemplated that the Government should take League Island and transfer the present navy-yard from Philadelphia, with its present capacity, down to that portion of League Island which will admit of the superstructure, we perhaps would not find it so objectionable. But that is not the end of it. It is only the commencement. Then Congress will be called upon from year to year to appropriate its million dollars for League Island and for the iron-clad vessels to be constructed and repaired there. There is no question about that. It is to be a great navy-yard of the nation.

Now, sir, I ask if it is too much for this House to request of the gentlemen who are interested at one point and the other, that a commission, learned in this matter, made up of scientific men from the Army and Navy, shall go out and explore the different points that may be presented for exploration, and be required to report to this Congress at its next session, for final action, giving to us League Island, if they find that to be the best, or Portland, or Portsmouth, or a point on the Hudson river, or on the Patuxent, or any point that the commission may say to us has the most merit. Then we will fix an iron-clad navy-yard upon it, and vote the necessary appropriation.

I am in favor of the substitute for the bill, expecting that it will be so modified as to require the commissioners to report at the next session of this Congress.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. The House will observe my disposition to yield to my distinguished and able friend from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] who differs from me in regard to the measure before the House. That generosity sprang from entire confidence in the fact that any argument that the gentleman might be able to make adverse to the proposition which I am about to defend could be overturned.

I may as well dispose of his argument as well as I can at once. The gentleman has raised the bugbear of public expense at this time. Now, my distinguished friend well knows that from the beginning of this session, and during a period of the last Congress, I followed him as closely as I knew how in every disposition to save every dollar I could to the Government. But in that disposition there is sometimes exhibited here a plan which is spoken of as "ponny-wise and pound-foolish." Sir, if the gentleman had clearly informed himself upon this subject he would have seen, not only that this transfer of the navy-yard from Philadelphia to League Island would not be an expense to the Government, but that it would in the end absolutely supply money to the Government.

The portion which the city of Philadelphia desires shall be vacated has a wharf front of the most valuable property in the city. It embraces several squares. It gives us two squares of front on Prime, two on Federal, two on Wharton, and two on Reed street. It is estimated that the property will bring from a million to a million and a half dollars. This morning a competent man and a man of means called on me and authorized me to state here that he would, for the land which was vacated, cheerfully make a contract to put League Island in a condition for a navy-yard for iron-clads such as the Navy Department might prescribe in every particular, and he further said he believed he would make money by the operation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I doubt whether I can add much to what has been so well said by my distinguished friend from Ohio, [Mr. LE BLODGE,] a gentleman who from locality is certainly disinterested, and whose opinion, formed as it is from information obtained by much industry and the devotion of a great length of time to the subject, is worthy of great consideration. That gentleman yesterday in the most clear and masterly manner touched the practical plan and the common-sense points of the argument. He comes before this House not governed by any motives other than a regard to the public good. I myself do not inquire into other person's motives. That belongs not to me. I confess that I am not free from local pride, neither do I expect to see an absence of local pride on the part of the gentleman from Connecticut. On the contrary, I think it not only not reprehensible but most commendable, and I congratulate, saving his politics, that the citizens of his district are so well represented on this floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The gentleman will allow me to tender him my thanks. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. But I want this House to consider the points directly at issue. There are three points in this question bearing upon the choice between New London and League Island, for I may say that it is a question between those two places. What are those points of practical difference? Let us examine them.

I will read an extract from the rules laid down by the commission who were sent to examine this site and other sites with a view to selection for an iron-clad navy-yard. They laid down these rules:

"Security from attack by an enemy and facility and economy of defense. To be easily defended from its own topographical advantages. To be easily reinforced by troops from a dense population within easy marching distance. Not easily blockaded. Not too near the mouth of a bay or river."

The majority report upon the question of security make use of the following language:

"The board is of opinion that either of the sites under examination may be promptly and efficiently defended and that upon this question they may be regarded as equal."

Now, there is no man who has listened to this discussion, who has read the opinion and the reports upon the subject, but what will see exactly that the majority of the commission yielded when they put them upon an equality. Now listen to what the minority of the commission say:

"In security from an attack by an enemy and facility and economy of defense League Island, which is seventy miles from the mouth of one of the most defensive rivers of the United States, is greatly superior as a site for a navy-yard to Winthrop's Point, which is three and one eighth miles from the mouth of the Thames river. League Island is secure from a naval attack by rifle batteries. Winthrop's Point is not."

Now, there is an opinion coming from gentlemen who, whether they were distinguished or not, have staked their honor and their character as men of veracity and as officers of the United States Navy upon this report.

The facilities necessary for building iron-clads have been enlarged upon so fully in this House that it is hardly necessary to do more than remind it that this point is a great focus of the communication from the teeming West through one system of railroads from Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. And I would say to the gentlemen in this House from those States that they are doubly interested in securing this site as it will open up an immense market for the commodities of the West.

It is quite natural that New England should be in favor of New London as the point at which this location should be made. But I beg of gentlemen representing New England and of this House that they will not clannishly continue in opposition to this project, but that they will listen to the facts, listen to the reports, and as far as they are able recollect that there are other States and other localities in this country besides their own.

Now, I desire to say a few words to meet some of the objections which the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] urged on yesterday. Sir, let me say that the Delaware river at League Island and at Philadelphia is navigable at all times for vessels drawing twenty-six feet of water. I believe that experience has shown that in that respect Philadelphia at all times has the advantage of New York; and at one time a vessel was ordered from New York, on account of the insufficiency of water there, and sent to Philadelphia, where it loaded its cargo and proceeded with it to sea.

The next point the gentleman raised was as to the necessity of piling and the great expense which that necessity involved. Now, I want the gentleman from Connecticut to listen while I state that, according to what information I have upon the subject, so far as League Island is concerned, not one bit of piling is necessary there; and that information I have from those who understand this subject thoroughly. Perhaps the gentleman is aware that this system of piling is now becoming more or less obsolete; that it is only found necessary to lay down hemlock logs and sink them; therefore the old system of piling is done away with.

Now, as to the beautiful figure of speech, for it was fancy and not fact, that the river is ice-bound for three months in the year. Sir, he does not know anything about that river or he would know that the difficulty from ice in that river is at the Horse-Shoe, which is above League Island.

Now I think I have said everything of importance on this point that I have to say, and I will not take up further time of the House.

Mr. RAYMOND. I desire to say a few words upon the bill before the House. We are called upon to vote for one of two propositions: the one authorizing the executive authorities to examine one particular site for a navy-yard and to report whether it be or be not adapted to that purpose; the other, which is embraced in the substitute offered by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. BRANDEGEE,] authorizing a commission to examine the several sites which have been proposed for navy-yards, and to report which of them is best adapted for the purposes of a navy-yard and station.

Now, it seems to me to be perfectly clear that it is for the interest of the Navy and of the country to have the best site for a navy-yard which can be found in the United States. I cannot therefore see any valid objection to the adoption of the substitute. It proposes that all the sites, including League Island, shall be examined by a commission. Now, if the commission be a competent commission, and if League Island be, as is claimed by its advocates here, the best site in the United States, indeed the only site fit for a navy-yard, it is reasonably certain that it will be the site recommended. On the contrary, if it be not the best, I take it that nobody wishes that it should be recommended. Now, sir, I do not care to go beyond that. That single consideration will decide my vote as between these two propositions.

But if we look further, and find that one board of scientific officers has examined the League Island site and distinctly condemned it, that the Naval Committee of this House of the last Congress also reported against it, and that there is no authoritative or scientific decision in favor of League Island except that of the Navy Department, then it seems to me we are to presume that there must be some reason existing against the selection of that site which will render it proper that other sites should also be examined.

I do not intend to enter at all into the examination of the League Island site nor of any other site. But I do feel anxious that the country shall have the benefit of the best site that can be obtained; and I know of no better way of determining what that site is and where it is located than is afforded by the appointment of a commission to examine them all.

I have listened with great interest to the debate on this subject. It has been mainly, and perhaps I might say exclusively, under the conduct of gentlemen directly interested in the one or the other of two sites. Certainly all that has been said thus far in favor of the League Island site has been said by gentlemen who do not for a moment profess that they are disinterested in this matter. The gentlemen from Philadelphia have strong reasons for advocating the League Island site. I do not mean to intimate that they are influenced by improper reasons; I do not mean to say that their interest would necessarily control their judgment; but they certainly have strong reasons for advocating the selection of that site in preference to any other; stronger reasons for urging the adoption of that site than any other gentlemen on this floor can have.

Mr. LE BLOND. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York a question, with his permission.

Mr. RAYMOND. Certainly.

Mr. LE BLOND. I infer from the gentleman's speech that he is opposing the report as it comes from the committee. I desire to know how he intends to vote when the question shall be taken.

Mr. RAYMOND. Well, sir, I do not know which to admire most, the extraordinary skill and ingenuity with which the gentleman draws an inference, or his coolness in putting such a question as that to me.

Mr. LE BLOND. I am simply governed by a recollection of the past history of the gentleman. That is all.

Mr. RAYMOND. Mr. Speaker, I said that I intended to vote for the substitute. The gentleman infers from this, with a degree of acumen that must be peculiar with him, that I am not going to vote for the proposition reported by the committee.

Mr. LE BLOND. That was the natural conclusion from the past history of the gentleman.

Mr. RAYMOND. The natural conclusion from what past history?

Mr. LE BLOND. Well, I will say for the information of the gentleman, that upon two occasions when the gentleman has spoken in favor of propositions, we have found him voting against them. On the question of striking out the third section of the constitutional amendment reported from the committee on reconstruction, the gentleman made a speech of which he might well be proud if he had only followed the spirit of his speech in his vote. From that speech, we upon this side expected that he was going to vote with us, and that in the end we would defeat the measure. But when the question was taken, we found the gentleman voting with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] for the proposition, after he had spoken against it. And on one or two other occasions, I believe, the gentleman from New York stands on the record as affirming by his votes precisely the contrary of the positions he had taken in his speeches. This being the case, we upon this side naturally infer that whenever the gentleman makes a speech in favor of a proposition, he of course will vote against the proposition.

Mr. RAYMOND. Well, Mr. Speaker, the inference which the gentleman assures me that side of the House draw in such cases is creditable to their candor as well as their intelligence. Now, sir, he may learn from this instance, as well as some others to which he has alluded, that the inferences which he and his associates on that side of the House have at various times taken the liberty to draw concerning my action, have no foundation whatever except in their imaginations, or perhaps their hopes. It seems to have entered the heads of the gentleman and some of his associates that I was here to follow their lead, to vote as they wished or hoped I would vote. Sir, I trust that by this time they have corrected that impression. I have never said or done anything to give any countenance to it.

The gentleman taunts me with having voted for the third section of the constitutional amendment recently passed by this House, after I had made a speech against it. Sir, permit me to say that I did no such thing. I spoke against that proposition, and I should have voted against it if the gentleman and his associates had not joined those on our side who were in favor of it to prevent me and others from having a chance to vote against it. I do not think the gentleman and his associates are entitled to claim any particular credit for their action on that occasion.

Mr. ANCONA. I wish to correct the gentleman on one point.

Mr. RAYMOND. I do not yield to the gentleman. I wish to conclude my answer to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LE BLOND.]

I wish to say further, that whenever the gentleman and his associates combine with those of my own political friends who do not entirely concur with me to prevent me from voting so as to express my sentiments, I shall vote as I choose, without asking the gentleman's consent or that of his associates. If in the record of his action and that of his associates on that particular occasion the gentleman can find anything of which he thinks he ought to be proud, I commend him to cherish it with the utmost care, for it will be one of the very few things of which he can be proud. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, we will drop the subject of the third section here unless the gentleman from Ohio has some other question he would like to ask me.

Mr. LE BLOND. Oh, no. I hope I will be pardoned for saying that the history of the gentleman's speeches and votes will speak for itself. I trust he will have capacity enough when he gets home to his constituents to harmonize the one with the other. I confess my inability to do so, and hence my inference.

Mr. RAYMOND. I do not know that the gentleman is called upon to reconcile my votes and my speeches. It will be quite enough for him to reconcile his own with sound political principles and common sense. [Laughter.]

Mr. LE BLOND. If the gentleman will permit, I will say that my own votes and the few remarks I have made, I think, will tally and harmonize. I do not think I have ever been in the unfortunate position of my friend from New York. He started out at this session of Congress with one foot on the shoulder of Andrew Johnson, and the other foot on the shoulder of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] These two gentlemen have been diverging, and he is still trying to keep his feet upon them both. God knows what will become of the body if they diverge much further. His legs I do not find elongating much. I hope they possess elastic power which will enable him at least to preserve his life. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAYMOND. Well, sir, I am not half so much concerned with reference to my position as the gentleman from Ohio. I consider that my votes are within my control, and as yet I have found no difficulty in standing upon my own platform. It may not suit the gentleman from Ohio; it may not suit some gentlemen in my own party; but it suits me perfectly. I have found some reason to regret that gentlemen did not agree with me. I am in the condition of the obstinate juror who wondered how it was that those eleven obstinate fellows would hold out against him. [Laughter.] I will not say that my friend from Ohio has always voted against me. He has several times voted with me. I have regarded it as a sign of remaining grace that he and his friends have a few times voted with me on what I regarded as sound political principles. Whenever they depart from them and attempt to compel me to vote as they do I shall take the liberty of voting as I please.

I do not know that I had anything more to say on the pending question except this, that I shall vote for the substitute of the gentleman from Connecticut. I believe what little I have said has been in favor of that substitute, and therefore I hope that the gentleman from Ohio will understand I am going to vote as I have spoken.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, so much has been said and so elaborately said upon this subject, that perhaps little more elucidation is needed; but not being quite satisfied with either of the propositions as they stand before the House, I rise mainly for the purpose of offering an amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from Connecticut, which I will have read before I take my seat.

While I am up I will say a few words on the subject. Those who know something of the history of this question in this House will remark one striking distinction in the debate which has been had yesterday and to-day as compared with the debates heretofore on this subject. Heretofore no small part of the result of the discussion has turned upon the point of the necessity of establishing an additional navy-yard anywhere. During the progress of the war many gentlemen had doubts so serious and important in relation to the necessity of having another yard that they were disposed to vote against this question altogether, and it allowed to be passed over. It is quite natural that should have been the case, because previous to the breaking out of the rebellion there were no circumstances connected with the history of this country which should suggest to men not particularly conversant with naval affairs that a navy-yard like that contemplated in the proposition before the House was or would be needed.

It has so happened, sir, that owing to the fact that a broad ocean lay between us and the European continent, which has been the seat of almost all the wars of modern times, our position has been isolated from the theater of those wars. We have thus happily been delivered from the complications which have involved the nations upon the other side of the water; and upon this side there have been no nations at all adequate to cope with the Government of the United States. It has, therefore, not only been our privilege in times past, but it has been our boast, on numerous occasions, that we were able to point to the fact that we were a great and strong and growing nation, and the only one of corresponding magnitude in the world which was able to continue year after year without the expense and without the necessity of a great standing army or of a very large navy. But, sir, the occurrence of the rebellion changed this state of things in almost every particular. The occurrence of the rebellion found us without any adequate navy for the exigencies which arose at that time; and, sir, it is perfectly plain on looking at the history of this war that had the United States possessed at the beginning of the rebellion an adequate naval force, or even a naval force one half as large as that which it possesses to-day, the rebellion would never have grown to any considerable importance or magnitude. We should have had possession of the whole coast; we should have recaptured all the forts that were seized by the rebels; we should have been enabled to assert our power on the sea everywhere. Everybody knows the spontaneity with which the loyal millions flew to the ranks of the Army, which made it a sufficient power to take care of the interior portions of our country.

Now, sir, the first lesson that we ought to learn from the recent war is that we ought not to continue in a state of unpreparedness for war. Why, sir, the great national debt which has been entailed upon the country in its thousands of millions of dollars, is a perpetual admonition to us that we should at least be continually prepared for war, and every soldier's grave, of which there are hundreds and thousands in our land, sends up to us an appeal that we shall not in the future disregard a proper provision for the vindication of the honor of that flag which they died to maintain. Ay, sir, more than that, every mourning household throughout our land sends up to us here its pathetic appeal that we shall heed the lessons of war, while they point to the vacant places at their own firesides and weep over those who have laid down their lives for the liberties and for the honor of our common country.

Now, sir, I have said that the rebellion might have been checked if we could have had adequate preparations for war; but we are obliged to-day to look at the facts as they stand out before us. The rebellion was not prevented; it has passed into history; and the events of history are elements that must shape the future policy of this country. We are not now the same nation that we were before the war. The events of the war are a part of the heritage of this and of all future generations of American citizens; and what we do to-day, and what we shall do in all the future, must be done in the light, not only of what existed before the war, but also in the light of that which the war has added to our experience.

Now, sir, the exigencies of the war were such that they demanded not only the ordinary material and equipment of naval forces, but something more; and that demand was answered by the ingenuity of our artisans and mechanics in the production of iron ships. It is scarcely a stretch of absolute truth to say that the iron ship was the legitimate production of the late American war; and in all future time that iron ship is to be the great instrument in all naval warfare. The building of iron ships to-day is but in its infancy; it has a future before it. This class of vessels is to travel through all the various forms and modifications and experiences that wooden vessels have passed through; and we must, therefore, equip our navy-yards in such manner that they shall have facilities for the production and taking care of iron ships, corresponding to what we have heretofore had in our existing navy-yards for the construction and taking care of wooden ships.

Now, sir, the question before the House has been discussed yesterday and to-day in a most exhaustive manner by the able gentlemen who have spoken on the subject, and especially by those who have informed themselves so elaborately upon the question. But nevertheless I think I speak only the truth when I say that in some sense it has been discussed as if it were a local question—as if it were in some degree a question between League Island and New London; or, to enlarge it a little more, as some of the gentlemen who have preceded me have done, a question between League Island and New England.

Sir, I should deeply regret if this House should entertain a great national question like this upon any basis whatever that was merely local or that was in any manner or degree partisan. There is nothing partisan in it whatever; there is nothing local in it whatever; and there ought not to be. This question should be viewed and discussed as one that interests every American citizen; as a question not to be decided for this State, or that State, or another State, but for the Government and the people of the United States, whose Representatives we are on this floor.

Sir, the objection that I have to the proposition brought in here by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] is that it limits the selection of a site to one particular spot.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether the report of my colleague from Pennsylvania in favor of League Island is not the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for asking me that question, because it enables me to state what otherwise might have escaped my memory.

From the beginning of the discussion of this question I have had the honor to be a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, serving for two years upon that committee with my distinguished and valued friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MOORHEAD.] I have carefully studied this question from the time it first came before Congress until now. I did so with a desire to inform myself so that I might be enabled to come to a clear, distinct, and definite conclusion on the subject, and the opinion I originally formed remains unchanged to-day.

To make a more direct reply to the gentleman who has interrogated me, I desire to say, if I may be permitted to say what transpired in the committee-room—and so far as attaches to myself I believe I have that right—that when the proposition now before the House, reported by the gentleman from Philadelphia, was submitted to the committee, I offered a proposition substantially in the form which I shall submit to this House at the close of my remarks; and after the proposition of the gentleman from Philadelphia was accepted by the committee I stated to the committee that I would reserve to myself the right, if I should feel it my duty to do so, to oppose that proposition in the House. Sir, I have a right to oppose that proposition, and I do it without the slightest hostility to the locality which is before the House upon the recommendation of the majority of the committee, or toward any person connected with or interested in it. I simply feel it to be my plain duty, as a member of this House, and of the committee which has elaborately examined this subject, to state that I prefer, when the Government of the United States is taking a decisive step, not for a day only, but for all future time, upon the greatest question that will arise for a quarter of a century, probably, in relation to our naval affairs—I feel it my duty to declare, as I do here, that I consider this a mere question of engineering and topography, to be determined by professional men whose duties, whose studies, and whose experience have made them better competent to decide such questions than any committee of this House whatsoever.

Let me add, right here, that, impressed as I am with the importance and the necessity of our having some place where we can secure and lay up the iron vessels of our Navy, nevertheless I think that the selection of such a place should be made by a competent commission. Yet, if the House should refuse to authorize such a commission, I shall vote for League Island, because I think the necessities of the case would overbalance the disadvantages of having a decision made in favor of that place.

Now, sir, the chief reason why I advocate the appointment of a commission to make this selection is because I can see no possible harm that can come from it, while there may be vast advantage accruing to the Government from the action of such a commission.

If this proposition shall be adopted, a commission will be appointed composed of seven members, who will be competent to investigate this whole question and give us the result of their decision. And the amendment which I shall offer in a few minutes will be to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to accept that site which shall be designated by the commission as the one best adapted for the purpose.

Sir, I think we ought not to travel around in a circle year after year, and four years after four years, making no adequate preparation for this great work. We ought to make some definite progress every time we take hold of the subject. If League Island is the best possible site for a navy-yard, then, as has been well said by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] it is highly likely that an intelligent and competent commission will discover that fact. And the amendment which I propose to offer to the substitute moved by the gentleman from New London [Mr. BRANDREGE] is that the Secretary of the Navy shall be authorized to accept the site recommended and proceed with the necessary work upon it. And if the commission shall recommend League Island he can accept that site, or accept any other site, should they recommend any other.

But I was speaking in reference to the construction of iron-clads in the future. A very large portion of our employment during the war has been in the construction of iron vessels. The war is now over, but the question before us is still imminent, for this reason: it is not a question as to what we shall do ten or twenty years hence at the end of some war then raging. The war is over, and we have the iron-clads on our hands to-day, and the question is, what shall we do with them? They must be put somewhere; it is not a question whether you will or will not put them anywhere; they must be put somewhere.

The Government has been forced to send them up the Delaware river and place them in the channel back of League Island, because Congress heretofore has failed to indicate its purpose to provide a definite and fixed place for the storage of these vessels. Whether League Island and its back channel shall be selected or not is a question that should be settled now. Some gentlemen may say, why not leave them where they are for the present? Sir, whether they continue there in the future or not, they ought not to continue in the condition in which they are now placed. There is no gentleman upon the Naval Committee or anywhere else, who has any acquaintance with this subject, who does not know that these vessels are in a very improper condition now, whether in the right location or not.

Sir, we must provide a proper place in which to store them. If we select that place, then we should do it now, and make the proper preparations by the clearing out of that channel and by the construction of the proper wharves and docks, and whatever else may be necessary to protect the property of the United States, which has cost us so many millions of dollars. And if we do not select that site but some other, the urgency is still as great that we shall come to a decision upon this point, and indicate to the Secretary of the Navy what is the opinion of Congress upon this subject, and authorize him to accept some place in which to place these vessels, so that they may be in a position which will be a credit and not a disgrace to the Government, as at present.

Now, sir, there are two points to be observed in the selection of a site for a naval station. One of them is that which I have just indicated, to secure a place for the storage of iron-clad vessels. And let me say that among that which has entered into the consideration of this subject has been all the discussion and all the theory and all the testimony from various quarters as to whether fresh water is the best or salt water is the best or brackish water is the best in which to store an iron vessel. And then there are others who say that neither fresh water nor salt water nor brackish water is the proper place for an iron navy to be laid up, but that you should draw them out of the water altogether, and place them upon ways and cover them over so that they shall be protected from the action of the weather as well as from the action of the water.

Well, sir, I do not intend to enter into that discussion; I do not intend to review all those details; I simply call the attention of members of the House to them as having been suggested in the course of this discussion, to show that there is no concentrated opinion upon this subject upon which we can at present securely rely.

Therefore, sir, the public interest demands that this subject shall be given into the hands of a competent commission, who shall take into consideration this whole subject-matter and report to Congress what in their judgment the public interest and the future welfare of the country demands.

The other branch of this particular point is that the place that may be selected for the storage of iron-clad vessels will also as a matter of course, to a greater or less extent, and probably to a great extent, become the headquarters for the fabrication of iron ships and the collateral material of war. Now, Mr. Speaker, it will continue to be necessary for us to build vessels. Notwithstanding the fact that we are no longer in a time of war, we do not propose to close up our navy-yards and cease building ships, neither can we dispense with the building of iron ships because peace has come to us with its blessed auspices. For, sir, among the results of the war, to which I alluded, and which we have inherited, is a greater proximity to the questions that disturb the Powers on the other side of the globe and the intermeddling interests of those Powers with the interests of countries on this side of the Atlantic. We must be able to maintain the position which we have assumed, not only in relation to what we will do within our own borders, but also what we will do as to asserting and carrying out at any and every hazard the declarations that we have made in relation to what shall be done and what shall not be done with regard to the other Powers dwelling on this hemisphere. And, sir, not only must we be engaged in the building of ships in preparation for new complications that may come, but we must have the building of our iron ships go on in the same way that we have continued to build wooden ships heretofore, so that we may be prepared at any and all times to meet any foe that may appear, whether at home or abroad.

I should have been very much gratified, Mr. Speaker, had the House determined to enlarge the existing navy-yards when that subject was before the House. I am glad, sir, that it did decide to enlarge the navy-yard at Portsmouth and the navy-yard at New York; while I regret very much indeed that it did not decide to enlarge the navy-yard at Boston, contiguous to my own district. But, sir, I have no interest in that yard, nor in any other yard that can influence me one particle in the action which I will take upon this question. I want to see an adequate navy-yard established somewhere. It is a public necessity that we shall establish such a yard somewhere; and the whole point of what I have said, if I have succeeded in making myself understood, is that this House should take definite action upon this subject; that it should take such action as shall secure to the Government an examination of all the sites upon the Atlantic coast that may be supposed to be eligible for such a work as this; that the commission which may make this examination shall present to the officers of the Government the result of its deliberations and investigations; that, furthermore, (and this is the point of my amendment,) the Secretary of the Navy or the President shall have the right to accept as a gift to the United States whatever site shall be selected by that commission. Thus they will be able to go forward with this great work, and the subject will not turn up at every session of Congress to be discussed anew, while the interests of the country are suffering because nothing whatever is done.

Having said this much, Mr. Speaker, and remarking, in conclusion, that I am acting in perfect good faith toward the committee whom I represent, and that I am discharging a public duty to myself and to the House by advocating that which I believe is entirely safe to all, and that which, in the nature of things, cannot be injurious to any, I submit the following amendment to the proposition of the gentleman from Connecticut:

Strike out of the amendment the following:

And to report to Congress the comparative advantages and disadvantages of each, and by the selection of which the public interests will best be promoted.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to receive and accept, on behalf of the Government of the United States for naval purposes, the title to the site which shall be recommended by a majority of said board as best adapted for said purposes: Provided, That a perfect and indefeasible title shall be guaranteed to the United States of such an amount of land, and the exclusive use and control of such riparian rights and privileges, and such channels and waters adjacent as in the judgment of said board may be necessary and sufficient for the uses of the Government for the purposes contemplated.

Mr. KELLEY. I now call the previous question.

Mr. PIKE. I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania not to call the previous question. I desire to say a few words.

Mr. KELLEY. After the previous question shall have been sustained, I will yield a portion of the hour to which I will be entitled to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE.]

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] having reported the bill is entitled, under the rule, to one hour in which to close the debate.

Mr. KELLEY. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] who is a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PIKE. Mr. Speaker, I propose to say but a very few words on this subject. It has been perhaps fully enough discussed; but there is one point I wish to make. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] wants a commission to examine the different sites for navy-yards. The point I wish to make is this: that we already possess all the knowledge, statistical, geographical, or topographical, which can be obtained by any commission to be sent out, and to-day this House is as well prepared to act on a proposition for a navy-yard as any House of Representatives will be in the whole tide of coming time.

These sites have all been examined. League Island has been examined by a commission. New London has been examined thoroughly. Full reports setting forth in detail every imaginable advantage and disadvantage are before the House. I have no doubt members have possessed themselves fully of all the knowledge concerning these important points which has been so amply spread before them. Doubtless members know the number of feet and inches of water a vessel can carry into New London or into Philadelphia. They know all about the Delaware river, the ebb and flow of the tide, the shoals, the shifting bars, the kind of river bottom, the number of days it is obstructed by the ice, in fine, all the difficulties and advantages of that important position, and equally well-known is the fine harbor of New London and its accessibility. I have no doubt they know the whole thing. Certainly if they do not it is their own fault. They possess as large means of knowledge as any subsequent Congress will ever have. Why then, I ask, when we possess this various information, will the House send out a new commission over the country to examine all the sea-ports, going around begging people to offer a site for a naval station to this Government, and deluding them, I may add, with the expectation that the best one is to be adopted.

I believe my own State, among others, has been presented in this discussion. It is said that in Maine the Government can find a good site for a navy-yard. Certainly it can. There is no better harbor on this continent than Portland, except, perhaps, some one near it. Along a coast line of over twenty-five hundred miles we have harbors with abundant depth of water, land-locked, secure, and surrounded with land well adapted to a navy-yard. But suppose the commission goes to Portland, suppose these seven gentlemen, part of whom are engineers, come back to Congress and say that Portland is a capital place for a naval station, suppose they pass extravagant encomiums upon it, as they undoubtedly will, are we to be deluded with the idea we are to have another navy-yard in Maine? Sir, I hope we are not so green as that.

Why, Mr. Speaker, in the great bay of Maine, with Cape Cod for its southern headland, we have now two navy-yards, one within my own State. It is perfect nonsense for a man to talk about another navy-yard in Maine, nor do the people of Portland expect it. There is an admirable chance there to lay up iron-clads. For a small sum of money Government can have the rare advantage of a dry-dock larger than the largest of great docks at Cherbourg. Forty acres of dry-dock can be obtained for $400,000, it is said. Here the iron-clads could be laid up perfectly free of water, and of course could be kept freer of rust than in any other way. And whether League Island be accepted or rejected, this experiment should be tried. It is certainly for the interest of the Government to do so. But that is entirely aside from the matter under discussion.

The truth is, all these navy-yards were located intelligently. Along the shore of New England, north of Cape Cod, we have a district which produces more sailors and shipwrights than any equally large section of this country. We have two navy-yards capable of doing most excellent work. According to the statistics of the Navy Department, work is done cheaper at the Maine navy-yard than at any other in the country.

Now, that was the first great section for the establishment of navy-yards in this country. What was the second? Long Island and the bay of New York. That was the second section of the country which called for such an establishment; and there is the great navy-yard of the country, and there it always will be. The commercial metropolis of the country is there. It is the center of our commerce. It has the immense tonnage which is the proper foundation for a great navy. It is idle to talk about its having any rival in this country. Some gentlemen talk about a navy-yard on the Hudson; we might as well demand another in Maine. They cannot have it, and we cannot have it.

Where is the next point? Delaware bay and Delaware river. There is a navy-yard there, and there it is demanded by the interests of the Government in that locality.

The next point is Chesapeake bay. The Norfolk yard represents that section, and it is of no use to talk about the Patapsco river or other place.

These four sections of the country need just the supply of navy-yards they now have.

This is not in obedience to the "shrieks of locality" or for the purpose of distributing the patronage of the Government. That has nothing to do with it. The great law of supply and demand settles this question as it does many others.

During the war these yards employed twenty thousand men, gathering them from the shipyards in their respective vicinities. The great yard at Brooklyn had eight thousand. But the necessities of the Government are intermittent. They can give no steady employment. In time of peace they employ but four or five thousand, all told. Of course, then, you must locate these yards where the workmen in the neighborhood can go and come, floating out and in as the Government desires. The New England yards accommodate the mechanics north of Cape Cod. New York takes the stretch to the capes of the Delaware. Philadelphia supplies its own yard, and Norfolk must take the Chesapeake bay, including the large city of Baltimore. I make no account of the Washington yard, because that is devoted to purposes peculiar to it, and has nothing in common with the others. Such being the case, I lay out of view all the intermediate places. New London, the Hudson river, and the Patapsco river must go with the rest. When we have come to have a hundred million people and ten million tons of shipping we may begin to duplicate our navy-yards, and commencing with Portland we will work down along the coast, giving each section the proper supply.

But now the question before us, the only question, is, whether or not this little navy-yard at Philadelphia with only twenty acres of ground shall be transferred from its present locality a distance of three miles down the river to League Island. That, I say, is the only question. Indeed, if the gentlemen from Pennsylvania think that this House in determining this change of location is governed by the idea that by establishing at League Island their Philadelphia yard it pledges itself for years to come to devote a considerable share of the surplus revenues of the Government to build up that as a rival to Portsmouth or Cherbourg and the other European navy-yards, they are greatly mistaken. This Congress has no such idea, and the next Congress will keep control of this matter as we have during this Congress. They see no present need of this great navy-yard for iron-clads. If any man can cast the horoscope of the future, he will see that for the next quarter of a century this Government will keep that yard pretty much as it has done for years past—simply for the purposes of repair and for minor uses. It will be a convenience for the city of Philadelphia to transfer it. But for the next quarter of a century the strong probabilities are that we shall need but little development of our Navy. Our resources for present uses are ample. We have forty or fifty iron vessels capable of protecting us against all foreign assaults; and if anything can be more ludicrous than any other one thing in the future, it is the idea that England or France or Russia, singly or combined, will ever make a naval attack upon us.

Why, sir, we have demonstrated during the late war that we can hold together, and that was the only question of the slightest doubt with regard to our political future. Having demonstrated that, we at the same time demonstrated that no nation on God's earth would be fool enough to attack us.

And if they do not attack us, shall we go and attack them? And if neither attack the other, how is war coming? They will soon see a specimen of our iron-clads in European waters. No doubt they will examine the Miantonomoh with the most intelligent curiosity. It will by no means increase their desire to commence the attack. Her presence in the English Channel will be worth more to us than all Admiral Goldsborough's, and a large number of Mr. Seward's dispatches thrown in. If I am right in these views, what, then, do you want of your great iron-clad navy-yard? What are you to have for it to do?

Mr. WRIGHT. I would like to ask the gentleman a single question: whether this bill says a single word about an iron-clad navy-yard?

Mr. PIKE. Not a single word; if there was I would not vote for it. The bill is simply in its effect a transfer of the navy-yard from Philadelphia three miles down the river to League Island, not costing the Government a copper.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask the gentleman to yield to allow me to offer a proviso which is entirely acceptable to the committee.

Mr. PIKE. That can be done at any time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I object.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will not the gentleman allow it at least to be read?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will not object to its being read for information.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to offer the following proviso as an amendment to the bill:

Provided, That if League Island be selected the navy-yard at Philadelphia shall be dispensed with and disposed of by the United States as soon as the public convenience will admit.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I object to its being offered.

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been seconded, it requires unanimous consent to offer the amendment.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his objection. This does not interfere with his proposition.

Mr. PIKE. I will say in relation to that amendment that there is no need of it. As a matter of course when we have possession of League Island, and the movable articles of the Navy at Philadelphia are transferred there, as they may be very readily, there being little that is permanent there, no stone dock, nothing but a sectional dock which is very easily moved; as soon as they are transferred there of course the navy-yard at Philadelphia will be disposed of.

It stands then, in brief, in this way: whether or not, without disturbing the general navy-yard arrangements of which I have spoken, we will sell the Philadelphia navy-yard and receive for it, it is said, a million or a million and a half of dollars, and accept in lieu of it from the city of Philadelphia, as a free gift, some six hundred acres of land, which has cost that city $300,000, and with the money received from the sale of the old yard at Philadelphia build as large or as small a yard on League Island as may be necessary. I have no doubt forty acres of land high above tide, capable of as good use for a navy-yard as any forty acres in this country, can be produced on League Island for a sum not exceeding one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. I have satisfied my mind that a very considerable less sum would do it. We should then have forty acres in place of twenty, and the remainder of the island would be open for improvement. Can there be any doubt of the wisdom of the bargain? There is no one single advantage that the present yard has over one established at League Island; while at League Island, aside from the immense space, great enough for all the possibilities of the future, are the numerous advantages which have already been pointed out. In my judgment the House would be exceedingly unwise to refuse this munificent gift, and I cannot believe they will do it.

Mr. KELLEY resumed the floor.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] a question.

Mr. KELLEY. I must decline to yield any further.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate you and the House upon the fact that the discussion draws to a close—a discussion which, fond as I am of the excitement of public debate, has not been a pleasant one to me; and that, sir, because an impression seems to have been created that the question was a purely local one, and that the city of Philadelphia had special interest in its settlement; and again, sir, because the debate, in some part, has taken such a character as could not command my admiration or that of any man who believed that adherence to truth graces discussion.

Sir, as I said when introducing the bill yesterday, the city of Philadelphia did not make the tender of League Island to the Government of its own motion. In offering it that city responded to the call of the Government, which, having sent a commission forth to report the best site for its purposes, had been advised that this was it, and advised by its commission to purchase what is now offered as a gift. The Government asked that its great needs might be supplied, and Philadelphia tendered as a gift that which it sought to purchase. That is the relation of Philadelphia to this question. In no other aspect is it a local question.

I should not have engaged the attention of the House again had the question at issue been the question generally discussed by gentlemen. Were we in quest of sites for new naval stations such a commission as is proposed would be proper. But gentlemen misstate the question. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] as well as the gentleman from the Litchfield district of Connecticut, [Mr. HUBBARD,] each in turn, as others had done, have said the question is whether a commission to be appointed shall examine but one site or several. Sir, that is not the question before the House. The question is, will you accept a gift from the city of Philadelphia which will enable you to sell the little yard you have there and with the proceeds prepare equal accommodations on five times the level surface which it embraces, and nearly one hundred times the water facilities? That is the question. Or it may be rendered thus: you have thirty-odd iron or other vessels laid up in a natural wet basin, from which they may be ejected at any day, or you subjected to a heavy rent; will you accept a title to that basin so that they shall be there by virtue of your title to the property? Or thus: you have twenty acres of land with a wharfage insufficient to accommodate two vessels end to end; will you accept a more favorable site, with wharfage to the extent of more than five miles, on land of precisely the same character of the twenty acres you now occupy, underlaid as it is at a depth of from twenty to twenty-five feet by heavy boulders and coarse gravel?

In its simple form, Mr. Speaker, the question is, will you accept as a gift that for the want of which the country is suffering? And before deciding that simple question, before you will permit the Government to accept a favor for which it has been begging for more than four years, before you will permit it to become the owner of the wet basin in which scores of its vessels now lie, it is proposed that you shall send out a roving commission to inquire whether you can now or hereafter advantageously establish naval stations at other points, and if so at what points; and on the receipt of the report of that commission at the next session, or during the next Congress, to go through the same controversy which we are now going through, and which the Thirty-Eighth Congress went through two years ago. Now, I ask the gentlemen when they come to vote, to vote directly upon the question at issue, which is whether the Government, while retaining or selling its present navy-yard at Philadelphia, may accept nine hundred acres of land, and of land covered with water, known as League Island and the back channel.

Sir, the story of Baron Munchausen is not without value. With proper accompanying suggestions it may safely be put into the hands of children. But I have never been able to regard it as an admirable model for congressional statement and discussion, and I feel that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] made no slight mistake when he modeled his address of yesterday upon the exaggerations of that satirical story. He told the House that we offered the Government three hundred acres of mud. Sir, the Coast Survey speaks veraciously; and here [pointing to a survey] is its report from the coast survey of the nature and extent of the gift offered the United States by the city of Philadelphia. There is a body of five hundred acres of solid land, which has been overgrown with huge forest trees, many of which still stand, and a channel three hundred feet wide extending from end to end of that five hundred acre island, and the gift proposed by Philadelphia embraces both the island and channel from low-water mark in front of the island to the west bank of the channel, including a sentry walk on the main land. And he who will can calculate the number of acres, and will find that what the gentleman calls three hundred acres of mud contains more than five hundred acres of natural fast land, and more than three hundred acres of a wet basin, for which any naval nation but our own would give millions, not of dollars, but of pounds sterling. Sir, it cannot but be well to have some regard for truth in setting forth the facts in the discussion of a great national question like this.

It is said that the site proposed is too remote from the ocean. And the gentleman from Connecticut, in the spirit of Munchausen, spoke of it as being more than one hundred miles from the sea. Sir, it is but seventy miles from the sea. He spoke of a steamer requiring four days to reach the sea from Philadelphia. Sir, eight hours is the time of the average passage for naval steamers and for the larger of the ordinary steam craft of the river from Philadelphia to the offing of the capes.

The gentleman also read from what he said was a Philadelphia paper concerning the brackish water about League Island and in front of Philadelphia. It was from a paper which, let its imprint be Philadelphia or where it may, was printed, or at least got up, if not printed, at some point very remote from Philadelphia, and most probably east of Philadelphia. It spoke of twenty-seven miles of miasmatic marsh land south of the navy-yard, and of the brackish water there, and yet the gentleman tells us that the river is closed with ice for three months in every year, notwithstanding the fact, as he asserts it, that the water is so brackish.

Sir, the records kept at the Philadelphia Hospital and at the Merchants' Exchange show that for forty years there has not been one single day when the navigation of the Delaware by steam has been closed or impeded by ice, and it is known to the commercial world that vessels take their supplies of water, with which they sail the world around, from the Delaware at Philadelphia. And, sir, that river supplies a large district of Philadelphia with drinking water through the public works of the city. And yet gentlemen are gravely told that the water there is brackish, and arguments are rested upon an assertion at which even a Philadelphia lunatic would sneer.

But more than this, as if to stamp the insanity that ruled the gentleman's hour, the House was substantially told that the whole United States are in league against Connecticut, and especially against the quiet sea-side village of New London; that when the gentleman arrived here to take his seat in this Congress he found that the State of Pennsylvania and the Navy Department had been organizing a movement to exclude him from the Naval Committee of this House, but that he overcame that State and the Department, and achieved a commanding position on the Naval Committee; and with a want of generosity and candor for which I hope, Mr. Speaker, he will apologize to you, created the impression, so far as his words could do so, that you had acted the partisan, entered into the conspiracy, and appointed two members from Pennsylvania to the Committee on Naval Affairs. Sir, the gentleman, well informed and studious of such matters as he is, must have known that you did but follow precedent in this particular. When you became Speaker you found that there had been one member of the Naval Committee from Philadelphia and one from the valley of the Ohio, in western Pennsylvania. Hon. John P. Verree had been the member from Philadelphia, and the gentleman from Pittsburg, who now so ably represents that district, [Mr. MOORHEAD,] was the other to whom I refer. There were then from New England two members of the Naval Committee—the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BICE,] the accomplished chairman of the committee. There were twenty-seven members of this House from New England and twenty-four from Pennsylvania. The delegation from New England and the delegation from Pennsylvania, so nearly equal numerically, each had two members on that committee. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who thus reflected upon you, and who would impress the country with the conviction that he is the victim of a conspiracy, was added by you to New England's two members, while you gave Pennsylvania only what your predecessor had done—one member from Philadelphia and one from the valley of the Ohio. The gentleman in the midst of his whining over the wrongs done New England in his person, forgot that of members of the Naval Committee, as constituted by you, New England has one for every nine members, while Pennsylvania has one for but every twelve. But the gentleman seemed to be disposed to run a muck against the world. He seemed to have forgotten that parliamentary proprieties were, or were likely to be, regarded by anybody when he thus assailed you, Mr. Speaker, for not having more promptly seen his distinguished fitness for the Naval Committee, and visited New London to invite him to accept a place upon it.

Sir, I shall not follow the gentleman's rodomontade imaginings and slander. He is not ignorant of the facts of the case; he has examined this chart; he has stood by the well on League Island which gives forth pure spring water filtered through gravel. When, sir, he examined this chart he saw that that whole island, channel and all, was underlaid with gravel, for here is the drawing of a cross section marking the distance at less than twenty-five feet below the surface at which water-bearing gravel and heavy boulders are found. He saw that no foot of it was alluvial foundation, for within three feet of the surface is found black clay laminated with fine sand, which he is too well informed to regard as an alluvial deposit. He knows that League Island is part of the main land, intersected from it by an overflow of one or the other rivers and subsequent washing.

Will it, as he asserts, take sixty or ninety feet of piling to render that island suitable for the erection of buildings? Commodore Turner, who has had charge of the island, and who assisted in building the fortifications at Fort Mifflin, on the south bank of the Schuylkill, half a mile from it, on kindred ground, has assured the committee that piles could not be well driven to the depth of thirty feet; that they would strike heavy boulders at the depth of from twenty-five to thirty feet. The gentleman has also been assured by the officer of the Coast Survey detailed to superintend the boring of the island and report the results, with the scientific detail of fact, and with the results confirmed by the statements of the proprietors of the heaviest works in Philadelphia, that League Island would need no piling for any buildings or machinery except under the trip-hammer; that you could build upon its surface, without driving a pile, work-shops or machine-shops as extensive or heavy as any known within the limits of Pennsylvania. Yet in view of these facts rung into his ears by honorable gentlemen, he tells this House that League Island is a mass of mud upon which nobody would think of building a barn.

Sir, the gentleman has been entertained in what was the unostentatious summer residence of the former owner of the island; he has seen the cellars of the houses upon it; and he has drank with me of the water from the gravelly springs that furnish water to the healthy people who reside on the island.

Sir, this discussion has not, as I have said, been a pleasant one to me, though I do enjoy a generous public discussion.

Now, sir, let us look at what is proposed by the bill before us. I regret exceedingly that the gentleman from Connecticut would not permit the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] to offer his amendment. Sir, there is no thought of maintaining the present petty yard at Philadelphia one day after the material there accumulated can be transferred to League Island. But on this point let the Secretary of the Navy, the author of this project, speak for himself. In his communication of May 9, 1864, addressed to this House through the Speaker, he said:

"Having in view economy, as well as the public necessities, I have at no time recommended that the number of our navy-yards should be increased on the Atlantic coast, but it is my deliberate opinion that no time should be wasted in establishing at a proper place a suitable yard where iron ships can be made and repaired."

Again, in his annual report of December 5, 1864, he said:

"It has never been the purpose of the Department, in any of its suggestions or recommendations, to increase the number of our navy-yards, nor to alter their local distribution. The yard which we now have at Philadelphia is altogether inadequate to our present or future wants. It was proposed, therefore, to substitute a new one on the Delaware, in the vicinity of Philadelphia. League Island, within the limits of that city, if adopted as a site, must gradually absorb the works at the present yard, which would then be discontinued."

Hear his description of what we want, which after all is a description of League Island and all the advantages it embodies:

"A navy-yard, if we have one for naval iron work, should be established on fresh water, for this is essential to the preservation of iron vessels, which cannot be laid up in salt water during peace. Ready access to coal, iron, and timber is also important, for these essential articles should be always available on the inland waters without exposure to an enemy by coastwise transportation. The vicinity of a large city, where skilled artisans can be obtained without difficulty, and the facilities of markets and tenements are abundant, should be considered. A foundation of gravel would, for the purposes of machinery, be preferable to stone. An extensive water frontage must also be secured. For such a depot and establishment, where costly machinery and material would accumulate during years of peace, the advantages of an interior location are most manifest. These favorable conditions are to be obtained nowhere else so completely as on the Delaware river; and the position of League Island, within the limits of the city of Philadelphia, presents probably a stronger combination of the points that are necessary than any other location."

But, sir, gentlemen say that the Secretary of the Navy is not a scientific man. Well, then, let us turn from him to one of the most thoroughly scientific engineers of the country. We sent the chief engineer of the Navy Department, Mr. King, abroad to examine the naval stations of other nations. We also sent him along our whole coast to ascertain the capabilities of our own land. What does he say on the question? I ask gentlemen who insist on scientific information to listen to Mr. King, when, instructed by his extended travel and observation, he says:

"For the location of such a yard we have advantages in our great rivers not possessed by any European nation. In an entirely secure position, far from the sea, in fresh water, and within easy reach of iron and coal, an iron-yard may be erected. These advantages are weighty, and cannot be overestimated. Still we have another advantage; the rise and fall of our tides being comparatively so small, we do not necessarily require basin accommodations—the most expensive of European dock-yard constructions—all we need in this regard being a position affording ample wharfage room."

"Location does not belong properly to the subject-matter of this report, but cannot be considered entirely foreign to it, because it is the first and most important consideration. Government officials in England and France were free in expressing their opinions to me, that since the invention of guns capable of propelling destructive projectiles several miles, and the construction of armored ships, an inland location for a great dock-yard becomes almost imperative."

The advantages of fresh water for iron vessels to lie in when repairing and fitting out is another point to be considered, for it must be remembered that the adhesion of barnacles, oysters, and mussels to the bottom of iron vessels, while lying still in sea water, is rapid and excessive; in fresh water the iron is entirely free from them.

The navy-yard at Philadelphia does not cover as much ground as the basin water area in any one of the principal European dock-yards; it has only two covered building-slips, with the necessary wood-work shops and store-houses, and is not provided with any stone docks or means of repairing steam machinery."

I will not weary the House by laying before it the volume of such information, but will proceed to show why I think we ought not to adopt the substitute submitted by the gentleman from Connecticut. It is, to borrow a legal phrase, a mere dilatory motion. It is entered for the purpose of delay, for the purpose of keeping the question open, and compelling a compromise between those who do not think we need additional naval stations and those who think we ought to put one where my friend from New York [Mr. DODGE] saw the city bombarded with the short-range guns used during the war of 1812. That gentleman tells me that he was old enough to sit with his father on the family porch and see British vessels bombard New London in 1812. And this motion is entered to force a compromise by which the Government shall not acquire an enlarged station at Philadelphia until Congress consents to build another one at that most exposed point of our coast.

While on that question let me answer a query put to my colleague by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MOUTON,] whether there was not danger that our iron vessels might be closed in at League Island by an enemy's fleet. The very able pamphlet entitled "The Advantages of League Island," by a New England man, which has won the commendation of Admiral Porter, Commodore Stribling, and Commodore Turner, and indeed I may say the approval of the whole Navy, says:

"During the last war with Great Britain, Chesapeake bay was blockaded by a British fleet lying at Lynn Haven bay, and New London was blockaded by a similar fleet lying in Gardner's bay. Both these positions are still available to an enemy for that purpose, but there is no anchorage at the mouth of the Delaware, or nearer than the two places just mentioned, where an enemy's fleet of iron-clads can anchor securely. The draught of water of the foreign iron-clads is too great for them to anchor behind the Delaware breakwater. Consequently this river possesses an economical advantage for a navy-yard from its geographical position, which renders large expenditures for fortifications comparatively unnecessary."

I now yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I hope the question will not be opened to general debate again by reconsidering the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It is not the intention to open the general debate, but merely to afford an opportunity to move an amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I object to debate.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is it not in order for me to have my amendment reported?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I object.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to read it as a part of his remarks.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise to a question of order. A motion has been made to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, and I have moved to lay that motion to reconsider upon the table. Now, then, can the Chair recognize any gentleman as entitled to the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] yielded the floor to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] to move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, and a motion was made to lay that motion on the table. No further debate is therefore in order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then I withdraw my motion and resign the floor to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is known to every member of the House that it is not desired by anybody to maintain the present navy-yard at Philadelphia after League Island shall be accepted.

The original proposition which I submitted to this House contained a clause for the sale of that yard; but the bill reported by the Naval Committee does not appear to have embodied that clause. I regret it exceedingly, and I would gladly have the bill amended by the proposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin so as to add his proviso; which is as follows:

Provided, That if League Island be selected, the navy-yard at Philadelphia shall be dispensed with and disposed of by the United States as soon as the public convenience will admit.

I would be glad if Congress could give such an expression of its opinion, and thus sanction what the Secretary of the Navy has so constantly pressed upon us and upon the people of Philadelphia, and that which they so ardently desire, the removal of the small yard which obstructs several of their main streets and impedes the commercial growth of the city.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman let me offer that amendment?

Mr. KELLEY. I cannot yield further at this time, as the gentleman's proposition would require unanimous consent, and the gentleman from Connecticut stands there ready to object to it. Let me say a word further. This bill does not ask the Government to accept League Island without a full investigation. But it does ask the appointment of a commission to pass upon it before it accepts the title.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania now yield me the floor to make the motion to reconsider?

Mr. KELLEY. I will yield the residue of my time to the gentleman from Wisconsin for whatever purpose he pleases.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 23, noes 71.

So the House refused to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The motion by which the main question was ordered was then reconsidered.

The question recurred upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. KELLEY. I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to amend the bill by offering thereto the following proviso:

Provided, That if League Island be selected, the navy-yard at Philadelphia shall be dispensed with and disposed of by the United States as soon as the public convenience will admit.

Upon that amendment and upon the bill I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was taken on Mr. ELDRIDGE's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE's substitute was then read, as follows:

Whereas various sites on or near the Atlantic seaboard have been offered to the Government of the United States for naval purposes, with special reference to the repair, construction, and laying up in ordinary of iron vessels; and whereas it is eminently desirable that the best site should be selected by the Government for the purpose named: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint a commission of not less than seven competent officers and engineers, whose duty it shall be to make careful examination and survey of each of said proposed sites, and to report to Congress the comparative advantages or disadvantages of each, and by the selection of which the public interests will best be promoted.

The question recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, to the substitute offered by Mr. BRANDEGEE, to strike out the words—

And to report to Congress the comparative advantages or disadvantages of each, and by the selection of which the public interests will be best promoted—

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to receive and accept, in behalf of the Government of the United States for naval purposes, the title to the site which shall be recommended by a majority of said board as best adapted for said purpose: Provided, That a perfect and indefeasible title shall be guaranteed to the United States, and such an amount of land, without cost to the United States, and including the use and control of such riparian rights and privileges, and of such channels and waters adjacent, as in the judgment of the said board may be necessary and sufficient for the use of the Government for the purposes contemplated.

The question was taken on the amendment of the substitute; and it was agreed to—ayes eighty-five, noes not counted.

The question recurred on the substitute as amended; and being put, there were—ayes 51, noes 61.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think this is a question of sufficient importance for us to have the yeas and nays upon it, and I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 55, nays 64, not voting 64; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Bergen, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brownell, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Defrees, Eliot, Finck, Garfield, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Harris, Henderson, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James M. Humphrey, Jenckes, Ketcham, Kykendall, Marshall, McCullough, McRuer, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Phelps, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Ritter, Rollins, Rousseau, Schenck, Shellabarger, Sloan, Smith, Spaulding, Taylor, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Upson, and Wright—55.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, James M. Ashley, Barker, Bidwell, Bingham, Boyer, Buckland, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cullom, Dawson, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farquhar, Glossbrenner, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Hogan, Holmes, James R. Hubbard, Julian, Kelley, Kelo, Latham, George V. Lawrence, LeBlond, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McClure, McKee, Mercer, Moorhead, Myers, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Orth, Pike, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, Ross, Sawyer, Seofield, Sitgreaves, Taber, Thayer, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Welker, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—61.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Benjamin, Blow, Broomall, Bundy, Cook, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Delano, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Farnsworth, Ferry, Goodyear, Hart, Hill, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Hubard, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kerr, Laffin, William Lawrence, Lynch, Marston, McIndoe, Miller, Noel, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Raymond, John H. Rice, Shanklin, Starr, Stevens, Stilwell, Strouse, Francis Thomas, Trimble, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—64.

So the substitute was disagreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. BRANDEGEE said: My colleague, Mr. DEMING, is detained at home by sickness in his family.

Mr. LAFLIN said: I desire to state that I am paired on this question with my colleague, Mr. DAVIS.

Mr. PERHAM said: On this question I am paired with Mr. MILLER. Were he present he would vote in the negative and I should vote in the affirmative.

Mr. RAYMOND said: I am paired with Mr. STEVENS, who, if present, would vote in the negative on this question, while I would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE said: My colleague, Mr. FERRY, who has been suffering from indisposition for several days, has been obliged to leave the House to-day on account of sickness.

Mr. WINDOM said: I am paired with Mr. RICE, of Maine.

Mr. ANCONA said: One of my colleagues, Mr. JOHNSON, is paired with Mr. DIXON; and another of my colleagues, Mr. STROUSE, is paired with Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts.

Both my colleagues, if present, would vote against this substitute and for the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE said: My colleague, Mr. WARNER, is detained from his seat on account of indisposition. If he were present he would vote in favor of the substitute.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. KELLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the substitute was disagreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The question was upon reading the bill the third time.

Mr. TAYLOR called for the reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. The engrossed bill is not upon the Clerk's desk at present.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move that the House adjourn, and upon that question I call the yeas and nays. By the time they are taken the engrossed bill will be here.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I appeal to my friend from New York [Mr. TAYLOR] to withdraw his call for the reading of the engrossed bill. Let us take the vote upon the passage of the bill by yeas and nays, and if the majority of the House are in favor of passing the bill, then let them pass it.

Mr. TAYLOR. Very well; I will withdraw my call for the reading of the engrossed bill.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. And I will withdraw my motion to adjourn.

The bill, as amended, was then read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 71, nays 46, not voting 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, James M. Ashley, Banks, Barker, Bidwell, Bingham, Boyer, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cullom, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Farquhar, Glossbrenner, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Hogan, Holmes, Chester D. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Julian, Kelley, Kelo, Kerr, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, LeBlond, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McClure, McCullough, McKee, Mercer, Moorhead, Myers, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Phelps, Pike, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Sawyer, Seofield, Sitgreaves, Taber, Thayer, Trowbridge, Welker, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—71.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Bergen, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brownell, Conkling, Defrees, Delano, Finck, Garfield, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Jenckes, Ketcham, Kykendall, Marshall, McRuer, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, William H. Randall, Ritter, Rollins, Ross, Rousseau, Schenck, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spaulding, Taylor, Thornton, Upson, Van Aernam, and Wright—46.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Benjamin, Blow, Broomall, Bundy, Chandler, Cook, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Farnsworth, Ferry, Goodyear, Higby, Hill, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Hubard, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Laffin, Latham, Lynch, Marston, McIndoe, Miller, Noel, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Raymond, John H. Rice, Shanklin, Sloan, Starr, Stevens, Stilwell, Strouse, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—66.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. LATHAM said: On this question I am paired with the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. JOHN L. THOMAS. If he had been present he would have voted against the bill, and I would have voted for it.

Mr. RAYMOND said: I am paired on this question with Mr. STEVENS. He is in favor of the bill, and I am opposed to it.

Mr. LAFLIN said: I am paired with my colleague, Mr. DAVIS; if he had been present he would have voted for the bill, and I would have voted against it.

Mr. ANCONA said: My colleagues, Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. STROUSE, who are both in favor of the bill, are paired with the gentlemen from Rhode Island, Mr. DIXON, and Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts.

Mr. KELLEY. I move to amend the title of the bill just passed by adding to it the words "and to dispense with and dispose of the site of the existing yard at Philadelphia."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the votes by which the bill was passed and the title of the bill was amended; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had concurred in the passage of House bill No. 15, authorizing documentary evidence of title to be furnished to owners of lands in the city of St. Louis.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER asked leave of absence for Mr. DIXON for one week from to-morrow.

Leave was granted.

Mr. NICHOLSON asked leave of absence till next Tuesday.

Leave was granted.

Mr. LE BLOND asked leave of absence till next Tuesday.

Leave was granted.

Mr. PERHAM asked leave of absence for Mr. LYNCH for one week.

Leave was granted.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS—AGAIN.

Mr. ANCONA introduced the following concurrent resolution, upon which he called the previous question:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on Thursday, the 28th of June instant, at twelve o'clock m.

The previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered, which was upon the passage of the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays. There is most important business still before Congress which must be acted on at this session, and which cannot be disposed of by the time named in this resolution.

Mr. LE BLOND. Work the harder, then, and you will get through the quicker.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division there were—yeas 21, noes 85.

So (one fifth not voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question recurred upon the passage of the concurrent resolution, and being taken, there were, upon a division—yeas 69, noes 39. So the concurrent resolution was passed.

Mr. ANCONA moved to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. MORRILL. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ANCONA. Then I withdraw my motion to reconsider and lay on the table.

NATIONAL BUREAU OF EDUCATION.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the consideration of House bill No. 276, to establish a national Bureau of Education, upon which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MOULTON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GRINNELL. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me that I may make a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution relative to the final adjournment of Congress was passed?

Mr. MOULTON. I yield for that purpose, with the understanding that I do not lose my right to the floor.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS—AGAIN.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution fixing the time for the adjournment of Congress was passed.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. CONKLING. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 34, nays 61, not voting 88; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Sidney Clarke, Coffroth, Dawson, Defrees, Eggleston, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hayes, Henderson, James R. Hubbard, James M. Humphrey, Julian, Kerr, Le Blond, McKee, Moorhead, Niblack, Nicholson, Pike, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Ross, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Taber, Taylor, and Wright—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Buckland, Cobb, Conkling, Delano, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farquhar, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Jenckes, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Laffin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, McClurg, McRuer, Mercur, Morrill, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Perham, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Sawyer, Schenck, Spalding, Thayer, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Welker, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Windom—61.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Barker, Benjamin, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Bundy, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Eckley, Farnsworth, Ferry, Goodyear, Gridler, Harris, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kuykendall, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, McCullough, McIndoe, Miller, Morris, Newell, Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Phelps, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, John H. Rice, Rogers, Rollins, Scofield, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stevens, Stilwell, Strouse, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Woodbridge—88.

So the motion to reconsider was not laid on the table.

The question recurred on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

On agreeing to the motion there were—yeas 49, noes 39; no quorum voting.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at five o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. DAVIS: The petition of W. R. Randall, R. H. Duell, and 500 others bankers, business men, and citizens of Cortland county, New York, praying for an act postponing the imposition of the tax of ten per cent. on State bank circulation to take effect on the 1st day of July next till some period after that time.

By Mr. GARFIELD: The petition of 116 citizens of Thompson, Geauga county, Ohio, asking for increased protection to American wool.

By Mr. LAFOLIN: The memorial of Folger Brothers, of Jefferson county, New York, in favor of the transfer of three Canadian vessels to American bottoms.

Also, the petition of J. L. Leonard, and others, of Lewis county, New York, in favor of a change in the law taxing State bank circulation ten per cent.

By Mr. RAYMOND: The petition of W. W. Richmond, for payment for services as secretary of legation in Brussels and commercial agent in St. Domingo.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 8, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. Gray. The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday.

Mr. CLARK. I move that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with unless some Senator desires to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be dispensed with by unanimous consent only. No objection being made, the reading of the Journal is dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the memorial of the corporate authorities of the city of Georgetown, District of Columbia, against the repeal of the charter of that city, which will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia if there be no objection.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest that it lie upon the table as that subject has been considered by the committee and is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be laid upon the table.

Mr. CLARK. I present the memorial of C. I. Field, president, and John A. Strother, delegate, in behalf of the levee board of the Yazoo valley district, of Mississippi, to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in which they say that the counties of De Soto, Tunica, Coahoma, and some other counties of the State of Mississippi embrace a large and fertile body of land of alluvial formation, nearly the whole of which, being three million five hundred thousand acres, is subject to overflow by the annual floods of the Mississippi, and by the influx of the waters those lands are rendered unfit for use or habitation, and that by the fact of the war they are utterly prostrate in resources; and the planters appeal to the Government at Washington for assistance. The work, they say, is one of vast national benefit, and it concerns the public revenues and public credit and the general interests of the whole country as well as the immediate district which now appeals for relief.

At the same time I present the memorial of the board of levee commissioners of the State of Louisiana, in which they state in substance the same thing, that the levees of the Mississippi are broken and the country to a very great extent inundated, and that they are so impoverished by the war that they are unable entirely, or to any great extent, to build up those levees, and they ask the aid of the Government. I understand that the War Department have had this subject under consideration and have sent a board of engineers, with General Humphreys at their head, to the river to make some examination, which report may be presented to the Senate in a few days.

Mr. President, I present these memorials to Congress with some satisfaction. While we have been in war in different parts of the country, and while those States have not yet been restored to their relations with the Government so that their Representatives and Senators can be here, I take pleasure in presenting these memorials to the Senate of the United States, to show that I would be willing to do anything to aid the material prosperity of that country that can safely be done, and I shall be glad to lend the assisting aid of the Government.

I move that these memorials be referred to a select committee to consist of five members of the Senate, there not being any committee to which such matters would particularly go.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY presented the petition of Samuel Redfield, of Ravenna, Portage county, Ohio, who was a soldier in the war of 1812, representing that the soldiers in that war were very inadequately paid for their services, and praying that they may be included in the provisions of the bill equalizing the bounties of soldiers in the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a petition of citizens of Minnesota, praying for the enactment of just and equal laws for the regulation of inter-State insurances of all kinds; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MORGAN presented a petition of residents of the county of Cayuga, of the State of New York, praying for the repeal or extension of the act of Congress imposing a tax of ten per cent. on State bank circulation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Nancy A. Stocks, widow of Reuben Stocks, praying for a pension, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 358) granting a pension to Mrs. Nancy A. Stocks. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Hopeskill Bigelow, of New Market, New Jersey, praying that he may be granted eleven years' back pay due him as a pensioner of the war of 1812, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 359) for the relief of Hopeskill Bigelow, of New Market, New Jersey. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 336) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Salt Lake City to the Columbia river, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 343) to quiet land titles in California, reported it with amendments.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 601) to grade East Capitol street and establish Lincoln square, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 360) in amendment of an act to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WILLEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 361) to authorize W. J. Sibley and others, trustees, to sell lot No. 9, in square No. 76, in the city of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that all prior orders be suspended, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the special order.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the Senator will not press that motion for the present. I should be glad to proceed with the consideration of Senate bill No. 285, which the Senate had under consideration yesterday during the morning hour, and which we can conclude, I suppose, in a very few minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the motion, and then it will be subject to discussion. It is moved that the Senate postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 127) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not like to antagonize the bill which I have mentioned against the special order, but I desire to have some portion of the morning hour devoted to its consideration.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator will not antagonize anything with the special order to-day, but that we shall take it up so as to be able to get a vote with certainty to-day.

Mr. POMEROY. Is it understood that we are to vote upon it to-day?

Mr. CONNESS. It is so understood.

Mr. POMEROY. We can get that out of the way I will not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa. The motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCIES IN HOUSE CONTINGENT FUND.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask that the consideration of the special order may be delayed for a single moment until I can report a bill from the Committee on Finance, which the House of Representatives think is very important to them should be passed immediately. I report back, without amendment, from the Committee on Finance, the bill (H. R. No. 654) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866. The House of Representatives are anxious to have this bill passed at once. Their appropriations have been very much reduced by sundry special committees that have been raised there. It will take but a moment to consider the bill, and I ask the Senate to proceed to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can receive the report only by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLARK. There is unanimous consent. There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It appropriates for miscellaneous items, $10,000; for folding documents, $17,500; for furniture and repairs, and packing-boxes for members, $10,000; and for stationery, $15,000, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RIDDLE. Some days ago I reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia a bill (S. No. 227) to incorporate the Washington Glass Company. The bill has been shown to the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] and he has assented to it. It is merely an act of incorporation; and, with an amendment, the committee unanimously recommended its passage. I ask the Senate to take it up now and pass it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware moves to postpone the present and all prior orders, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill he has indicated.

Mr. CLARK. I hope not.

Mr. RIDDLE. This bill will not take a minute.

Mr. CLARK. I hope, as the special order is now before the Senate, that we shall go on with it and consider it without any interruption. The bill reported from the Finance Committee was of great importance, and on that account we gave way to it.

Mr. RIDDLE. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will waive his objection. This bill will not take a minute.

Mr. CLARK. That minute can be had after we get through with the special order just as well as now.

Mr. POMEROY. I object to the reception of any bill. If the bill which I asked to have considered cannot be considered this morning, I do not want any others considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Delaware to make a motion, and not merely to ask the consent of the Senate.

Mr. RIDDLE. I presume there is no necessity for insisting upon it this morning, and I withdraw the motion.

Mr. CLARK. I hope the Senator from Delaware will not press his bill just at this time.

Mr. RIDDLE. I will not. I withdraw the motion.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 452) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to accept League Island, in the Delaware river, for naval purposes, and to dispense with and dispose of the site of the existing yard at Philadelphia; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 149) declaratory of the law of bounty.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had passed a concurrent resolution respecting the expediency of purchasing the portrait of the late Brevet Lieutenant General Winfield Scott.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 281) to amend the postal laws.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had passed without amendment the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 140) to grant the right of way to the Humboldt Canal Company through the public lands of the United States;

A bill (S. No. 261) for the relief of Mrs. Anna G. Gaston;

A bill (S. No. 173) to confirm the title of José Serafin Ramirez to certain lands in New Mexico;

A bill (S. No. 189) to confirm the grant of certain lands to José Dominguez in California; and

A bill (S. No. 321) for the relief of Maria Syphax.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 255) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending June 30, 1867.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled bill (H. R. No. 654) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bill and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 452) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to accept League Island, in the Delaware river, for naval purposes, and to dispense with and dispose of the site of the existing yard at Philadelphia—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 149) declaratory of the law of bounty—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 127) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS to strike out the second section and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But whenever the right to vote at any election held under the Constitution and laws of the United States, or of any State, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to ask how those persons excluded are to be ascertained; how the number of them is to be ascertained. How is it to be determined how many are excluded because they have not paid a tax within two years in my State, and how many are excluded because they have not resided in a particular district a certain length of time before voting? I suggest that these things seem to be of some difficulty in the proper determination of this question.

Mr. JOHNSON. I believe, Mr. President, that the question immediately before the Senate is the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon to the joint resolution. Before I proceed to discuss the questions which, as it seems to me, are presented by the proposition as a whole, I beg leave to say a word upon the particular effect of that amendment. The honorable member who offered it, and who I suppose offered it with the concurrence of some of his friends who are in favor of the measure as it originally stood, I think stated to us the other day that it did not substantially change the provisions to be found in the second section of the original proposition. What I suggested to him then I propose very briefly to suggest now, that perhaps in that he is mistaken; and as, in common with every Senator, I am, as I should be, desirous of having these constitutional amendments made as plain as language can make them, so as to avoid the evils sure to result from the existence of any ambiguity, I suggest that I think it will be found that the amendment of the Senator from Oregon is obnoxious to a very serious objection, and goes very much further than the original proposition for which he proposes it as a substitute. The language of the substitute, as far as the exceptions to which the general rule which it states at the same time is to be subject, is, that "whenever the right to vote at any election held under the Constitution and laws of the United States, or of any State, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State," &c., they are to be deducted from the number which is to constitute the basis of apportionment. The language of the original proposition was, that "whenever, in any State, the elective franchise shall be denied to any portion of its male inhabitants, being citizens of the United States, not less than twenty-one years of age, or in any way abridged," &c., then the basis is to be reduced in the proportion that the number excluded shall bear to the whole number of that age and of that sex.

Now, I think it will be found (and in that I believe I have the concurrence of several members of the Senate who are in favor of the proposition as it was originally presented) that the effect of the amendment is to change the basis by deducting from the number which is to constitute the basis, any portion of that number, of twenty-one years of age, who are citizens of the United States, who shall be denied the right to vote at any election under the constitution or laws of any State. In all the States there are elections of a municipal character that are regulated by law, and in which the franchise is different from that which prevails in the general elections of the State; and the consequence would be that where any persons who are twenty-one years of age are denied the right to vote the basis of representation is to be lessened in the proportion that the number excluded shall bear to the whole number falling within the class. I do not know what would be the condition of the State of Missouri, for example, if the amendment is to be adopted. I rather think that she would lose very materially by this amendment, in her representation; and I think the same thing would be found true of the State of Ohio, and I suppose of nearly all the States in the Union. What I suggest; therefore, to the honorable member and to the Senate is, that the phraseology of this amendment, if it is to prevail, shall be so changed as to leave it beyond doubt that all that is meant is to except out of the whole number of inhabitants of the age of twenty-one years or upward, who are citizens of the State, those who are denied the right to vote at any State election, as contradistinguished from any municipal or local election. Without such a qualification I am sure it will lead to very serious doubts, and it may lead, as those doubts may be solved, to a very serious diminution of the representation of several of the States.

What I am about to say upon the merits of the rule itself, whether that rule is found in the amendment or found in the original proposition, will be said as briefly as I can say it, and more for the purpose of explaining to my own constituents the ground of the reasons for the vote which I propose to give than with any hope of influencing the opinions of any member of the Senate who is now in favor of the proposition. It comes before us in such a shape and under such circumstances that it is not to be expected, as I think, that those who were consulted, who deliberated upon, and who advised the measure in the form in which it stands, can be persuaded of the error of that measure in any particular by anything which may fall from a Senator who is opposed to the entire proposition.

The Constitution of the United States, as it now is, in the second section of the first article provides for the manner in which the apportionment is to be made of Representatives in Congress. It is made to depend upon the whole number of the people found in each State; and in relation to the propriety of such an apportionment there did not exist in the Convention by whom the provision as it now stands was adopted, any doubt. In the fifty-fourth number of the Federalist, attributed, whether correctly or not, to Mr. Hamilton—there is some doubt whether he or Mr. Madison was its author—in recommending the adoption of the Constitution to the people of the United States, and commenting upon the manner in which the apportionment was to be made, as well as the manner in which taxes were to be levied, it is said:

"It is not contended that the number of people in each State ought not to be the standard for regulating the proportion of those who are to represent the people of each State."

That rule in the same paper was said to be one "referring to the personal rights of the people, with which it has a natural and universal connection;" and the only doubt which existed in the minds of the Convention or any member of the Convention upon the subject was not whether numbers was not the true rule by which the basis was to be ascertained, but whether the slaves of the southern States should be considered as a portion of those numbers; and that doubt arose because the southern States insisted that the slaves were property, and the North, while recognizing the existence of property in slaves, thought it unjust that the slaves should be considered at all in apportioning the number of Representatives to which the States where the slaves might be found should be entitled. The result was, after quite a struggle upon the subject, a compromise, by which taxation was to be regulated and by which the apportionment of Representatives was to be regulated by counting five slaves as only equal to three freemen.

But, I repeat, neither then nor at any time since, until now, did it ever occur to anybody that in a form of government like ours the basis of representation was not to depend upon the entire number of the people to be represented; and in this amendment that is admitted to be the true basis. It provides, both as it was originally proposed by the committee by whom it was reported and as it is proposed to be amended by the honorable member from Oregon, that Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within the Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State and excluding Indians not taxed. So that the honorable committee and the friends of this particular measure give their sanction to that as the true rule. They stand upon the ground on which our fathers stood when they adopted a rule of the same description in the Constitution, as it now stands, that numbers are to regulate representation. The only question, therefore, which the particular amendment suggests is, whether it is right to qualify the operation of that general rule as is proposed to be done by this provision.

Now, what is the qualification? Only that persons twenty-one years of age inhabiting each State, and being citizens of the United States, whose right to the exercise of the elective franchise is denied or in any way abridged, except in certain exceptions to which I shall refer after awhile, are to be deducted from the whole number, and the basis is to consist of what may remain. But the friends of the measure are not willing—I say not willing because that is not the effect of the amendment—to subject the rule which they themselves admit to be just to the general qualification which a general provision of that sort would make; and they therefore except from the operation of that qualification certain classes. Who are they? I say they except by not including, for all persons not included within this exception are acknowledged within the scope of the general rule of numbers. Now, who are to be found in the States? First, aliens; second, women, black and white, now all the blacks are free; third, minors, those under twenty-one years of age, white and black; fourth, those who may have participated "in rebellion or other crimes." Then what will be the operation of the section if we adopt it? It will be that all aliens are to be represented, all women are to be represented, all minors are to be represented, and all rebels are to be represented. Why is that? This is to go before the people. How will the objection be answered, as it is certain to be made before the people, when the authors of this measure are asked, why suffer the women and minors to be represented, why suffer aliens to be represented, and, above all, why suffer rebels to be represented, and not suffer loyal men to be represented? How will it be answered, I mean to an unimpassioned judgment; I mean to a people who it is to be hoped will not be influenced by the excitement of party passion or by the prejudices growing out of the sad conflict through which we have triumphantly come? It is to be only answered upon the ground that the provision is necessary to secure to the black man the franchise. Is that any answer? Is it any answer that because you cannot acquire for the black man the right to the franchise he is to be denied the right of being represented? Your own theory is, as it was of your fathers, that all should be represented without reference to color, the black as well as the white. The black is a freeman. That is your theory. But the effect of the exception is to deny to the black man the right of representation unless the State shall secure to him the right to the franchise.

Again, Mr. President, the measure upon the table, like the first proposition submitted to the Senate from the committee of fifteen, concedes to the States—and that was one of the grounds upon which the honorable member from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] voted and spoke against that proposition—not only the right, but the exclusive right, to regulate the franchise. His theory was that under the Constitution as it now stands, Congress has the authority to regulate the franchise in the States; and his objection to the original proposition, to which I have just adverted, was that, if adopted, it would surrender that right which he supposed to exist; and yet I imagine it is barely possible that he may vote for the section as it now stands; and what does it do? It says that each of the southern States, and, of course, each other State in the Union, has a right to regulate for itself the franchise, and that consequently, as far as the Government of the United States is concerned, if the black man is not permitted the right to the franchise, it will be a wrong (if a wrong) which the Government of the United States will be impotent to redress.

I see no difference, not the slightest, between the proposition as it now stands, so far as this section is concerned, and the original proposition which we rejected. I call the attention of my friend from Massachusetts, to whom I referred just now, to the language of the original proposition reported to us by the committee of fifteen on the 31st of January last. It says that Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States, &c.; "provided, that whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation." What does this do? The words "race or color" are omitted. Why, if I was an eastern man, I might guess; but no matter what may have been the particular motive for the omission of the words, the effect of the proposition is identical with that of the original proposition. The former was obnoxious to the honorable member from Massachusetts because it surrendered a right which he made a very elaborate speech to prove, in his judgment, existed in the Congress of the United States to regulate the franchise, if not always, certainly in the condition in which the country now is. This accomplishes the same purpose. It says to the States, "If you exclude any class from the right to vote, we, admitting your power to make the exclusion, say it shall have no other effect whatever than to deduct the number excluded from the whole number which is to constitute the basis of representation. If, therefore, you exclude from the benefit of the franchise any who are citizens of the United States, and twenty-one years or more of age, and inhabitants of the State, who belong to any particular race, or who are of any color contradistinguished from the white man, we admit that you have a right to exclude them, and all we propose to do is to say that to the extent of that exclusion your basis of representation shall be diminished."

Now, is it not known to us all that there is not in any one of the southern States, and has not been for years, any exclusion of any white man having the age and having the residence required by the Constitution and laws of the particular State, from the right to the franchise; that the whole exclusion, where there has been any exclusion at all, has been of the free blacks, and will hereafter be of all the blacks, as all are now free? The whole operation, therefore, of the proposition before you, that part of it to which I am now addressing myself, is to say precisely what the original proposition of the 31st of January said—"You who deny to any person belonging to any race or color the right to vote shall have your representation in the Congress of the United States lessened in the proportion that the number excluded shall bear to the entire number." The manner of ascertaining the way in which the representation is diminished is changed in point of form, but the result is the same. By the original proposition of January 31 all of the race or color were to be deducted; by the proposition before us the deduction is to be in the proportion that the number excluded shall bear to the combined number of those included and excluded within the privilege of the franchise.

Let me for a moment call the attention of the body to what will be the operation of that provision. The census of 1860, and I believe that is the case with all previous censuses, does not give us the number of males of twenty-one years of age, but it does give the number of those who are twenty years of age and upward.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Allow me to ask the Senator a question, by way of illustration.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Suppose there are two hundred thousand male citizens in a State above twenty-one years of age, and they are all allowed to vote; then the whole two hundred thousand would be included under this proposition as the basis.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Now, suppose the State denies the right to vote to twenty or fifty thousand of that number, the basis is reduced precisely in that proportion. The language is explicit that the basis shall be reduced in that proportion.

Mr. JOHNSON. We shall see about that in a moment. It is in the proportion that the number excluded bears to the entire number included and excluded.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No; in the proportion that it bears to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age and upward.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course that means those included and excluded. I mean the whole number twenty-one years of age and upward. Now, let us see what will be the operation of the amendment on my own State. I will take that first. In 1860, by the census, it appears that Maryland had 128,371 white males twenty years of age and upward, and that she had of the same age 38,030 black males. The percentage, therefore, that the blacks of that age bore to the whites was twenty-nine and five tenths per cent. Now, in order to make myself understood more clearly, let me turn to the words of the section. If any portion of the male inhabitants of a State twenty-one years of age and upward are denied the privilege of voting, or that privilege is in any way abridged, then "the basis of representation in such State shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age." Then, what are we to do? We are to add together the number of whites of that age in Maryland and the number of blacks, and the aggregate is 166,401. Now, what says the section? That the representation of Maryland is to be diminished, if she excludes all the blacks, in the proportion that 38,030 bear to 166,401. What is that proportion? It is nearly one fourth; it is exactly twenty-two and nine tenths per cent. Let me be understood; for if such is not the purpose of the committee, I am sure they will change it. The basis of representation, in the event of an exclusion, is to be reduced "in the proportion which the number of such male citizens" who are excluded "shall bear to the whole number of male citizens" not less than twenty-one. Is it not manifest, then, that we are to ascertain, first, how many white citizens there are who are permitted to vote; second, how many citizens there are who are not permitted to vote? I assume, now, that in Maryland the whole number of black citizens who might vote with the authority of Maryland will be excluded by her authority, that number being 38,030, and the aggregate of both classes being 166,401.

Having got the entire number, what is the next step toward ascertaining the effect of the proposed amendment? To ascertain the proportion that the number denied the franchise bears to the entire number who it is assumed ought to have the right to the franchise. In other words, to apply it to the case of Maryland, the representation of Maryland is to be diminished by diminishing the basis of her representation in the proportion that the number of citizens excluded bears to the whole number, as well those who are included within the benefit of the franchise as those who are excluded. Then it is a simple question of arithmetic, what is the proportion between 38,030 and 166,401? It is nearly one fourth. The basis would be lessened twenty-two and nine tenths per cent., or in other words twenty-two and nine tenths per cent. of 166,401 would be deducted from that aggregate number. What would be the result of that? The result would be the loss of one Representative, Maryland now having five, and possibly, by force of the fraction, the loss of another, but certainly the loss of one.

But it is a great deal worse in other States—a thousand times worse. I refer now to the same table furnished by the census of 1860. I shall not trouble the Senate with it, except to call their attention to two or three of the other southern States, and then to two or three of the northern States by way of comparison. The number of white male citizens twenty years of age and upward in the State of South Carolina when this census was taken was 68,154. The number of black males of the same age at the same time was 92,923, being a percentage of fifty-seven and six tenths of the aggregate. Here, then, the black males were more numerous than the white males above twenty. What is to be done in South Carolina? You add together the number of whites and the number of blacks, and if the blacks are not permitted to vote, as they are not, then you deduct from the basis of representation such an amount as may be ascertained by ascertaining the proportion that the number of blacks bears to the aggregate number of whites and blacks, and what is that? As 92,923 is more than 68,154, South Carolina loses at least one half of her representation, and in fact she loses more. It is sufficient for my purpose to show that she loses one half.

Go to Mississippi and the result is nearly the same. Her white males above twenty were 84,338, and her black males of the same age 98,510, being a percentage of fifty-three and eight tenths of the whole. So that State would lose half her representation.

Now, Mr. President, how will the rule proposed operate on the northern States? The people of the northern States are, and are correctly assumed to be, just and fair. How does it operate on the State of my friend the chairman of the committee of fifteen, [Mr. FESSENDEN?] Her whites of twenty years of age and upward in 1860 were 167,724 and her blacks of the same age were 362, a percentage of two tenths of one per cent. His State will not suffer by this provision, it is certain. Then go to the State of my friend from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK.] They had 91,944 white males above twenty and 149 blacks, a little over one tenth of one per cent. It is obvious that neither of these two States will lose anything by this rule. I need not fatigue the attention of the Senate by calling their attention to the other northern States. Gentlemen diminish our representation unless we consent to surrender our own judgment of what we believe to be true policy, and they leave their own untouched. It is a ruinous result as far as we are concerned; it is a perfectly harmless result as far as they are concerned. How is it in the State of my friend from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] who has had more especially the charge of this measure since it came from the last special committee?

Mr. CLARK. Do you mean the committee of fifteen?

Mr. JOHNSON. There was but one committee of fifteen; but I believe, or at least it is shrewdly suspected, that there has been another committee.

Mr. CONNESS. What does the Senator know about that?

Mr. JOHNSON. I guess again, and I guess that my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] has some knowledge of it. The State of Michigan, in 1860, had 290,474 white males of twenty and upward, and only 1,898 blacks of the same age, being a percentage of eight tenths of one per cent. There is no terror in the operation of this clause upon my friend from Michigan, whose State will have at least as many Representatives as she has now, even if she stops growing. Ours is to be diminished; hers, at least, is to remain as it is, to be changed only by an increase of her population. Every man in Michigan, every woman in Michigan, every alien in Michigan, every rebel in Michigan, (if they have rebels there,) is to enter into the calculation of the number which is to constitute the basis of representation of Michigan. One fourth of our aggregate male population is to be deducted, more than one half of that of South Carolina and Mississippi is to be deducted. Now, what is it all for? What is the purpose of the exception? There can be but one.

In Maryland we have a contest now going on, which, as I judge from the newspapers, is supposed by one side to involve the question of negro suffrage, and upon the other side to be wholly irrespective of that question. What is this provision for? Is it not to force negro suffrage upon every State by holding out a punishment, or a provision in the nature of a forfeiture, to any State that denies it? Does it not say to the State of Maryland, "You are now represented in the councils of the nation by five Representatives in the House of Representatives; but you shall in future, when this provision goes into operation, be represented only by four, unless, contrary to your judgment, contrary to your past policy, contrary to what all parties among you allege to be your present conviction, you agree to admit to the right of suffrage your black population who are of the age of twenty-one years and upward?"

The effect, therefore, of the measure which I am discussing, and of course its purpose—for gentlemen of the intelligence of those who are friends of this measure must be supposed to know what its effect is and to design to bring about in some way or other some change in the politics of the State—the effect is to strip the South of a portion of her representation unless she will agree to change her suffrage laws. I do not know that the South would adopt—I am sure that it ought not to adopt—the course which I am about to suggest; but suppose that the moment this provision is adopted they admit their blacks by law to the right of suffrage; then their representation will not be diminished. Suppose that when the representation has been apportioned on this basis, they repeal those statutes. The right to do either cannot be denied. The right to do the first is conceded by the proposition before us, and the power which includes the right to do the first necessarily includes the right to do the other. Are you going to change the number of Representatives of those States just in proportion from time to time as the suffrage may be extended or diminished? If that is the object, we shall be in a state of constant turmoil. Why should it be so? What can the northern States apprehend from having the States of the South represented as the Constitution now provides? What, gentlemen, are you afraid of looking at your own section?

What now is the whole number of Representatives? The whole number of Representatives in the other House, under the apportionment made after the census of 1860, in virtue of the act of March 4, 1862, and other acts, is two hundred and forty-two. Of that number what were denominated as free States before slavery was abolished are entitled to one hundred and fifty-seven, and what were known as the slave States eighty-five, showing an excess of Representatives on the part of free States over those from the slave States of seventy-two. In other words, if the States were all represented now as they were represented before the rebellion commenced, there would be a clear majority of Representatives upon the part of the northern States of seventy-two. Then it is an insult to those States, it is to impeach the integrity of their Representatives now in Congress or who may come into Congress at any time hereafter, to suppose that with such a majority as that the respective interests of their States, if such interests shall be supposed to conflict at all with the interests of all the States, will not be protected. It is to tell the country that you doubt your own ability: you, with one hundred and fifty-seven Representatives, doubt your power to cope in the councils of the nation with eighty-five Representatives from the southern States; to tell them consequently that although your majority is a majority of seventy-two, you are apprehensive that in some way or other the South may get the control of the Government. What a reflection upon yourselves! I was about to say, how dishonoring to yourselves, if such an apprehension is entertained, is such an apprehension. What an imputation it is upon the wisdom and the firmness and the patriotism of your own people. What a strong and startling fact will it be considered and be used by those who question the ability of the people to govern themselves, that their representatives upon this floor wish to guard by constitutional amendment their being injured by the efforts of eighty-five men coming from the southern States against one hundred and fifty-seven men coming from the free States. I invoke honorable Senators to be as firm, as decided, and as energetic in defending the interests of their respective States in the councils of the nation as they and their people have discovered themselves firm and energetic in defending the interests of the whole upon the battle-fields of the late struggle. Do not show the white feather now. Do not, above all, say to your fellow-countrymen and to the world, "We are not the equals of the men of the South when we are brought together in the councils of the nation." You do not think so,

I am sure; certainly I do not think so, and never have thought so; but I invoke you, as a friend, not to interfere with the rights secured to the southern States now by the Constitution which our fathers gave us, upon the pretense, utterly without foundation, that the rights of your respective States will be subjected to the slightest peril by continuing the representation as it stands.

Mr. President, I have now said all that I propose to say upon the operation of the second section as it was originally presented to the Senate and as it is proposed to be amended by the honorable member from Oregon, and having upon a former occasion submitted all the remarks that I deem it necessary to submit in relation to the third section of the original proposition, which I do not understand it is proposed to alter—

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood the Senator to say that he had proposed to make some remarks upon the amendment that I offered.

Mr. JOHNSON. So I did.

Mr. WILLIAMS. With the permission of the Senator I will state here that the amendment which I offered I find is subject to some verbal criticism which is plausible, but I do not think well founded. I find it so easy to remove the difficulty that, upon consultation with the committee and the other friends of the measure, I propose to strike out certain words and substitute others which will, perhaps, obviate some of the objections of the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. I had said all I propose to say upon it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I propose to modify it by striking out the words—

But whenever the right to vote at any election held under the Constitution and laws of the United States or of any State—

And to insert the words:

But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or members of the Legislature thereof.

Specifying particularly the officers for which these people must be allowed to vote in order to be counted.

Mr. JOHNSON. That removes some of the objections to which I supposed the original proposition was subject; and that shows how exceedingly cautious we should be in these constitutional amendments; how very difficult it is to change the Constitution of the United States for any good purpose; and I mean by purpose, for the accomplishment of any good end. Now, what is the history of this attempt? At the beginning of the session a joint committee of fifteen was appointed to take into consideration the proper measures to be adopted, and they reported, first, the proposed amendment of the Constitution, of the 31st of January. That was rejected. They reported next, as a second plan, on the 10th of May, 1866, one article consisting of five sections; and here it lay for several days, when it went through an examination elsewhere, and the result was the report made by the honorable member from Michigan on the 29th of May last. Almost the entire thing has been changed since; and here is my friend from Oregon, who, yesterday or the day before, after bringing all the acuteness which belongs to him to the examination of the second section as proposed by the committee, and after calling, no doubt, other friends of the measure to aid him, introduced his substitute for the second section; and only two days have gone by when he has become satisfied that he was wrong.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Or, if he has not, he has not been able to satisfy his friends that he is right; which is pretty much the same thing; and he says very frankly that he proposes to amend it. Sir, without meaning to disparage the members of the Senate of the United States, or the men of the present age found in the public councils, either of the States or of the United States, I have a very shrewd suspicion that we are not the superiors of the men who formed the Convention that adopted the Constitution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg to ask the honorable Senator whether the members of the Convention which originally formed the Constitution of the United States, with all their wisdom, did not have about as much difficulty in making the Constitution as we have in agreeing upon amendments?

Mr. JOHNSON. I know they had; but they accomplished it and it was adopted; and they took a great while to do it, and they did it, not in the midst of a political excitement. No presidential election was looming in the distance or near at hand. No contest for political power, as is about to come off even in the present year. A nation was to be created by means of their wisdom, and a nation they did create, awful in war, happy and conservative in peace. Now we are about to change it in a vital particular, even by the very amendment of the honorable member from Oregon, to change the basis of representation as they established it, although such a man as Hamilton, in the number of the Federalist to which I have adverted, said that not a member of the Convention doubted that that was the proper basis. Upon that they had no difficulty. They said that, according to the republican theory upon which the freedom of the people of the United States was supposed to rest, all ought to be represented. Now it is proposed to deny the right to be represented of a part, simply because they are not permitted to exercise the right of voting. You do not put them upon the footing of aliens, upon the footing of rebels, upon the footing of minors, upon the footing of the females, upon the footing of those who may have committed crimes of the most heinous character. Murderers, robbers, house-burners, counterfeiters of the public securities of the United States, all who may have committed any crime, at any time, against the laws of the United States or the laws of a particular State, are to be included within the basis; but the poor black man, unless he is permitted to vote, is not to be represented, and is to have no interest in the Government. Why, sir, my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] has over and over again said that the State governments, even as they existed before the rebellion, and as they now exist, are not republican governments, and that we should change them by virtue of the obligation imposed upon the Government of the United States to guaranty to the people of each State a republican form of government. What more anti-republican doctrine, looking to the genius of our institutions, can be imagined than that which says that there may be within the limits of any State a people who are not to be represented? The war of the Revolution was not waged because of the miserable tax which England imposed, but because she claimed the right to tax those who were not to be represented; in other words, because the colonies had no representation in the Parliament of England. And yet you tax the freedman; the States tax the freedman; you subject the freedman to the authority of both, while at the same time you say, "You may not be represented, and it is not our purpose to secure a representation to you. Everybody else is to be entitled to the benefit of the doctrine that there shall be no taxation without representation, but you are to be an exception."

Mr. CONNESS. Because you are disfranchised.

Mr. JOHNSON. Because you are disfranchised! So are women disfranchised; so are rebels disfranchised; so are children disfranchised; so are the Chinese in California disfranchised. Why do you want to represent them? You have them all represented under this amendment. I have had occasion before to state what I supposed to be the clear misapprehension of this doctrine. The honorable member seems to suppose that representation and the franchise are identical. They are as different as light from darkness. The Constitution says so; your own amendment proclaims it. You say that representation is to depend upon numbers. So did your fathers say so. They said it and you have followed their teaching, because they said it was a right to be represented, but not a right to vote. In the language of Hamilton, in the Federalist to which I have referred, that was a personal right, which, upon the theory of our institutions, ought to be secured, and just in proportion as it is denied just in that proportion are you trampling upon the theory or violating the theory.

Now you want, I suppose, whatever you do to be adopted. Do you suppose that the States who are to lose representation by this measure, unless they agree to bring about the contingency which it is to avert, will adopt this amendment?

Mr. CONNESS and Mr. WILSON. We do.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then you misapprehend the southern people just as much as you did before the war commenced. I do not mean you gentlemen individually. There was an impression at the North that the South was not in earnest. There was a corresponding impression at the South that the North was not—both fatal errors; the first just as fatal as the last. I say the South will not adopt it, because your people, if you were in a condition in which your rights would be so affected by this amendment as will be its operation upon the rights of the South, would not adopt it. Massachusetts never would agree to an amendment which was to deprive her of a part of her representation unless she would consent to abandon a policy which she had adopted from the beginning of her existence. And yet you ask us to do it. The whole effect and the whole object—I have a right to say that, because that is the whole operation of the amendment—the whole effect of the proposed amendment is to strike a blow at the southern States who are now, according to my theory, in the Union, and who are in the Union upon the theory of this amendment, unless they will agree to a policy at war with the policy illustrated throughout their entire history.

What more do you do? By the third section you exclude from the right of holding any office, State or Federal, a class which will be found to embrace the best men within the limits of these States. Do you suppose that the South will agree to that? There may be a few men imported there from some of the eastern or northern States, who have gone there lately, who will consent to it; but the original southern men will never consent to a constitutional amendment which strikes at a large class, indeed, of the entire class within which is to be found the best men and the wisest men within their limits.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Do I understand the Senator to say that they include all the best men and the wisest men of the South?

Mr. JOHNSON. Some of the best and wisest; I did not mean all.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I understood you to say all.

Mr. JOHNSON. It includes nearly all, because nearly all of them have been in the Legislature or Congress or held some official station; and all who have held any office of any description, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who have been members of Congress or officers of the United States or members of any State Legislature or of any executive or judicial office of any State, and have taken the oath to support the Constitution, as they must all have done, are to be excluded from the right to hold office.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I apologize; I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is not necessary to apologize, I will say to the honorable member from California, because he hardly ever says anything that requires an apology, certainly as far as I am concerned.

I have upon more occasions than one, Mr. President—and I now barely allude to it—stated what I thought to be the present condition of the southern States. The rebellion being ended, in my view the Constitution of the United States and its laws are just as operative upon each of the States where the rebellion existed as they were before it was commenced. All of those States now are organized; all of them, I believe, except perhaps Texas, have their judiciary, their executive, and their Legislature, and they are now in the undisturbed exercise of the functions of each of these departments—and the three embrace everything that a State has a right to do—and they are organized upon republican principles. The Supreme Court of the United States recognizes them as existing States. The Executive of the United States recognizes them as existing States. This very amendment (for there is nothing on the face of it which excludes the necessity of appealing to the States which have been in rebellion to adopt it) recognizes them as existing States.

Now, what are their rights under the Constitution as it stands? The Constitution provides that a census shall be taken at periods of every ten years. You took your census in 1860, and the apportionment was made under the act of 1862. What is there to change that, looking at the Constitution as it is? The very purpose of the provision directing an enumeration of the inhabitants of the States to be taken at each period of ten years was to ascertain the number of the people in each of the States that was to constitute the basis upon which the number of Representatives from each of the States was to be ascertained. That was done by force of the act of 1862, under the census of 1860. Now you propose to change it, and to change it by force of constitutional provision. Why cannot you wait? Why is it not right and just that you should wait until those States are represented in this Chamber and in the other House? Your fathers consulted them, and the weight of their patriotic wisdom in forming the Constitution of the United States was universally admitted, and is known to us historically. Why cannot you wait now? On the contrary, you now deny them the right to appear upon this floor, although they are willing to take the oath of loyalty which you have prescribed; and you undertake to submit a proposition for a change of the Constitution in their absence. How can you know but some man of the South might be found in the councils of the nation who would influence your councils and shape your deliberations as Madison influenced the councils and shaped the deliberations of his associates in the Convention of 1787? Do you not want aid? I should think so. You have not been able yet to agree on any provision for a change which has satisfied you even for a passing day.

Mr. President, I have here—and I have alluded to the condition of these States simply for the purpose of introducing it and bringing it before the Senate—an opinion delivered by one of the judges of the Supreme Court very recently, who is one of the admitted lights of that great tribunal, whose patriotism has never been questioned, and cannot properly be questioned, in a case which involves the question, what is the condition of the States? A man by the name of Egan was confined in the State penitentiary at Albany, he never having been in the military service of the United States or of the confederate States, under a sentence by a military commission held in the State of South Carolina to try him upon the charge of murder, and the sentence of the commission was confinement in that penitentiary for life. He made an application to Mr. Justice Nelson for a habeas corpus. The facts were returned, and the judge in the conclusion of his opinion says, what I think bears upon the question I am discussing, what I will read:

"For aught that appears, the civil local courts of the State of South Carolina were in the full exercise of their judicial functions at the time of this trial, as restored by the suppression of the rebellion, some seven months previously, and by the revival of the laws and reorganization of the State government in obedience to and in conformity with its constitutional duties to the Federal Union."

Indeed, long previous to this, a provisional governor had been appointed by the President, who is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, (and whose will under martial law constituted the only rule of action,) for the special purpose of changing the existing state of things and restoring civil government over the people. In pursuance of this appointment a new constitution had been formed, a Governor and Legislature elected under it, and the State in the full enjoyment or entitled to the full enjoyment of her constitutional rights and privileges.

The Constitution and laws of the Union were thereby acknowledged and obeyed, and were as authoritative and binding over the people of the State as in any other portion of the country. Indeed, the moment the rebellion was suppressed, and the government growing out of it subverted, the ancient possession, authority, and laws, resumed their accustomed sway, subject only to the new organization or the appointment of proper officers to give to them operation and effect.

This reorganization and appointment of the public functionaries, which was under the superintendence and direction of the President, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the country, who, as such, had previously governed the people of the State from imperative necessity by force of martial law, had already taken place, and the necessity no longer existed."

Let me repeat a sentence of that decision. The judge says that the State of South Carolina, at the time this trial was had, was "in the full enjoyment, or entitled to the full enjoyment, of her constitutional rights and privileges." One of those rights and privileges was that of being represented in this body and represented in the other House. Now, we keep them out, unless they think proper—at least I suppose that is the course the matter is to take—unless they will submit to adopt a measure which is contrary to what we know they would do if they were not by compulsion forced to take it.

Mr. President, I have but a word to say in conclusion. We all have an interest in the peace of the country. We have a deep interest in the peace of the country because it is connected with the prosperity and good name of the country. We have a social interest in being together again as brothers, of presenting to the nations of the world ourselves as one, and exhibiting the characteristics of a great and magnanimous people, who, forgetting recent animosities, discarding the prejudices out of which they grow, and looking to the honor and glory of the nation, come together as brothers, one and all. By the highest of moral considerations, therefore, the termination of the present state of things is demanded. But if we cannot raise ourselves to the elevation of being governed by moral considerations, let mere material considerations animate us; let interest, in its most vulgar sense, control us. Let us, therefore, bring back the South so as to enable her to remove the desolation which has gone throughout her borders; restore her industry; attend to her products—those products which enter so materially into the wealth of the whole, so important to the North, and more important, if possible, to the North than to the South, but all-important to the nation—instead of keeping her in a state of subjection, of dishonoring subjection, and, as I think, without the slightest necessity. Peace once existing throughout the land, the restoration of all rights brought about, the Union will be at once in more prosperous existence than it ever was; and throughout the tide of time, as I believe, nothing in the future will ever cause us to dream of dissolution, or of subjecting any part, through the powerful instrumentality of any other part, to any dishonoring humiliation.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It is a work of labor to speak after the eloquent remarks of the Senator from Maryland, who has better expressed what I think than I can express it in any form of words; and yet I think it is due to myself and the opinion I represent (for I think I represent the opinion of my own country) that I should say a few words. They will not be many.

There is an intense love for the Union throughout all the country; there was an intense love of the Union in my own country, and there is to-day, not governed by any form of words, but governed by principles and a high sense of right and justice. I do not care to reason about this thing. It has been reasoned about by eminent men, men who can discourse better than myself, to whom I submit the authority of the argument; but I wish to say that throughout all the States that belong to this Union there has been always a preponderating loyal sentiment, in the South as well as in the North. Two thirds of the people of the South loved our flag, and hailed it in Tennessee as well as elsewhere. These things have not been well observed. They should have been well observed. The observation has been neglected because for this, that in some departments of New England they thought they were the loyalest of them all. It has been the pride of my life to have lived among all these peoples, and from the South, East, West, and North all were loyal. The accident of controversy changed the condition of society and changed positions in States. I witnessed it. It was witnessed by all men who were observant men. I regretted it, for I thought the South were in error, and I always have. The majority of the people of the South are loyal to the banner of our country, always were. This was not known or recognized well in the North, because they were ignorant of the fact. I was not ignorant of the fact, for I was conversant with it.

In the tribulation of a war, with the chances of battle and the chances of sudden death, men differed, and some went one way and some went another. Thus does it always happen in all great civil controversies. I believe there is as much regret to-day in the South as there is in the North for the great error in which they indulged. Gentlemen seek now what is called reconstruction. There is no such thing as reconstruction. There may be rehabilitation. We may take them to our own house at home, those who wandered away, and again embrace them as brothers. That is a duty imposed upon us by the highest laws and the highest principles that govern the conduct of persons among the best classes of mankind.

I do not please to discourse, for all that there is in and about the subject-matter of the present controversy has been discussed with carefulness by men whom I will admit to be my masters. I cannot advise the Senate nor can I instruct them in any form of words; yet it is my duty in my place to state my solemn convictions.

This whole measure is supplying the foundations of our institutions. If I have not forgotten myself, wise men built the foundations; wise men built the superstructure, wise men had to do with all that belongs to its edification. If I have not been badly instructed, tinkers have taken the hands and undertaken to do what their fathers would not dare to do, what I with the instructions I have had would not dare to do. It has been said that "fools rush in where angels fear to tread." It has seemed to me that that was the habitude of men who think they are fit to be Senators of a great nation. If I differ with them in opinion I ask their pardon for the difference. We have got a great work to do. The nations are at war. France and Austria and France and Italy are at war. We not a long time hence will be at war with our legions in the field. These things will happen, and they have to be looked at with a bold eye and a firm front. These things are not to be disguised. Why is Maximilian now-to-day maintained as the house of Hapsburg in Mexico? A trick of political strategy, a trick alone, nothing more, nothing less. He has to leave Mexico absolutely; and why has it not been done? Permit me now to say it is the fault of our own Government, for had it been said by the officer who has charge of the foreign relations of this Government, "Noli me tangere," there would have been no occupation of Mexico by Maximilian, or the house of Austria, or Louis Napoleon. These things have to be corrected, and they have got to be corrected by the stern will and the determined force of the men of the country wherein I was born, whose interests I intend to maintain.

Again, Mr. President, there are other questions—and as I am speaking I am not making a speech, but I am talking—I may ask, what about the trouble on our northern frontier, and what about that trouble in Ireland?

Mr. CLARK. The Fenians!

Mr. McDUGALL. Yes, the Fenians. I know something about 1745, and I know something of Vinegar Hill. Now, I will say that in my judgment the less we have to do with that the better.

But, Mr. President, we have got to look with great carefulness at the question pending—this matter of reconstruction, so called. I do not say reconstruction; I say rehabilitation. These men of the South are, after all, our own brothers. Why should we call them enemies? Is it because we are afraid of them? Is it from a cowardly spirit? Why should we be afraid of them? Why not invite them into our own house? I say to them, come back to our house and sit down with us and dine with us and enjoy our hospitalities. Those who are not willing to say that are violating a great law of truth and a great law of justice, and those who undertake to maintain such a position must themselves be subjugated. I am opposed to subjugation, have been always, but if subjugation has to come, there have been inquiries, who is to be subjugated? I have lived in pretty near all portions of this Republic, and I will not allow the conquered to be subjugated as long as I can spell my own name and dare to call myself by my own nomen. These men were, by the exact contract of the Government, invited to come back and enjoy their rights. They accepted the proposition. When Lee surrendered it was an acceptance of the proposition. By whom is it denied? By brave men? No. Why should they not come back and grasp our hands and say, "We were brothers once; we differed years ago; now we come back to embrace you?" Why should we not accept their embrace? Can any man state why? It is not within the range of thought for expression to state it.

I went down once on the Mississippi, at the opening of this war. I met a general of the confederate army, and I took him by the hand, and took him to my state-room, on board of my gunboat. Said he, "General," throwing his arms around me, "how hard it is that you and I have to fight." That was the generosity of a combatant. I repeated to him, "It is hard," and he and I drank a bottle of wine—or two just as like as not. [Laughter.] This thing of bearing malice is one of the wickedest sins that men can bear under their clothes. I think the general of the confederate army who said that to me—he was an old acquaintance of mine—showed more gallantry in saying it than any person shows who curses them. I took him to my room and treated him kindly. We would have fought at the instant, if it had been a fight, but not being a fight we treated each other generously.

I am for reintegration as soon as possible. No, I do not like that term "reintegration." I prefer the term rehabilitation, which was given to us by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN.] I say let us rehabilitate them as soon as possible and make them friends and brothers. Otherwise we make them enemies; and for what cause? There is no cause. We are all capable of faults. Who is there that is not? There is a lesson, I believe, taught by the Master: "Let him that is without sin cast the first stone." Wickedness belongs to all people that have got bone and nerves and will.

I say this measure is wrong radically, and I say further, it is my opinion that white men of the Caucasian race were made for governors, and that negroes are only fit to be a subject race. I do not care for their subjection here. I wish for them all to be free and away. Nevertheless, not with my consent, not by any force which I can employ, shall they be allowed to have to do with governing me or my kindred. That is one reason why I oppose the whole principle of the measure, and if I fall down, I will fall like Caesar.

Mr. HENDERSON. I propose to discuss the first section only so far as citizenship is involved in it. I desire to show that this section will leave citizenship where it now is. It makes plain only what has been rendered doubtful by the past action of the Government. If I be right in that, it will be a loss of time to discuss the remaining provisions of the section, for they merely secure the rights that attach to citizenship in all free Governments.

Justice McLean, in the Dred Scott case, said:

"Being born under our Constitution and laws, no naturalization is required, as one of foreign birth, to make him a citizen. The most general and appropriate definition of the term citizen is a 'freeman'."

So the learned judge held that "Dred Scott," having his domicile in a State different from that of the defendant, and being a freeman, is a citizen within the act of Congress, and the courts of the Union are open to him.

From his argument it follows that any person, black or white, born upon the soil of a State, is a citizen of that State, unless he be born in slavery, and if he be born a slave, he becomes a citizen so soon as by the laws of the State he becomes a free man. His opinion leads to the conclusion that citizens of States are necessarily citizens of the United States. All born on the soil free are citizens of the respective States of their birth, and therefore citizens of the United States. Those born on foreign soil, he holds, cannot be invested with rights of citizenship without naturalization.

He says further:

"While I admit the Government was not made especially for the colored race, yet many of them were citizens of the New England States, and exercised the rights of suffrage when the Constitution was adopted."

Judge McLean might have gone further and enumerated other than New England States that acknowledged the citizenship of African freemen at that date.

All remember the opinion of the supreme court of North Carolina, delivered by Judge Gaston, and reported in the case of State vs. Manuel, 4 Dev. & Bat. 20. He said:

"According to the laws of this State, all human beings within it, who are not slaves, fall within one of two classes. Whatever distinctions may have existed in the Roman laws between citizens and free inhabitants, they are unknown to our institutions. Before our Revolution, all free persons born within the dominions of the King of Great Britain, whatever their color or complexion, were native-born British subjects; those born out of his allegiance were aliens. Slavery did not exist in England, but it did in the British colonies. Slaves were not in legal parlance persons, but property. The moment the incapacity, the disqualification of slavery was removed they became persons, and were then either British subjects or not British subjects, according as they were or were not born within the allegiance of the British King. Upon the Revolution, no other change took place in the laws of North Carolina than was consequent on the transition from a colony dependent on a European king to a free and sovereign State. Slaves remained slaves. British subjects in North Carolina became North Carolina freemen. Foreigners, until made members of the State, remained aliens. Slaves manumitted here became freemen, and therefore, if born within North Carolina, are citizens of North Carolina, and all free persons born within the State, are born citizens of the State. The constitution extended the elective franchise to every freeman who had arrived at the age of twenty-one and paid a public tax; and it is a matter of universal notoriety that under it free persons, without regard to color, claimed and exercised the franchise until it was taken from free men of color a few years since by our amended constitution."

Judge Curtis, in his dissenting opinion in the Dred Scott case, says: "To determine whether any free persons descended from Africans held in slavery were citizens of the United States under the Confederation, and consequently at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, it is only necessary to know whether any such persons were citizens of either of the States under the Confederation. Of this," he said, "there can be no doubt."

At the time of the ratification of the Articles of Confederation free native-born inhabitants of the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, and North Carolina, though descended from African slaves, were not only called citizens of those States, but such of them as had the other necessary qualifications possessed the franchise of electors on equal terms with other citizens.

In conclusive proof of his reasoning on this subject Judge Curtis cites the action of Congress when framing the Articles of Confederation. The fourth article, it will be remembered, provides "that the free inhabitants of each of these States, paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States." While this provision was under consideration, June 25, 1778, the South Carolina delegates moved to insert the word "white" after "free" and before "inhabitants," thereby securing the privileges only to white persons. The motion was voted down by eight States to two, one State being divided. This proves beyond doubt that the privileges and immunities of citizenship were at that time willingly accorded to all men who were free, who were not slaves, whether white or black.

Judge Curtis, after stating that in five States at least free negroes enjoyed the elective franchise when the Constitution was adopted, concludes very justly that they became "citizens of the new Government," and "so in every sense part of the people of the United States," and "among those for whom and whose posterity the Constitution was ordained and established."

"There can scarcely be a doubt that all persons residing in the several States at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution became citizens of the United States, and no State thereafter can deprive them or their posterity of this right. The power to naturalize is exclusive in Congress, and the foreigner naturalized becomes a citizen of the United States, and necessarily is a citizen of the State in which he is domiciled. The posterity of such foreigner so domiciled becomes a citizen of the State and of the United States by virtue of his birth alone."

If the opinion of Judge Curtis be open to criticism at all it consists in the conclusion to which he arrives—

"That it is left to each State to determine what free persons born within its limits shall be citizens of such State, and thereby be citizens of the United States."

He leaves the inference that Federal citizenship may be given or taken away by State action. He admits that being a State citizen confers the Federal right. If once the character of citizen of the United States attaches, no State, I apprehend, can take it away. This error of Judge Curtis is shown in the opinion of the court in the same case where it is said:

"If persons of the African race are citizens of a State and of the United States, they would be entitled to all of these privileges and immunities in every State, and the State could not restrict them; for they would hold these privileges and immunities under the paramount authority of the Federal Government, and its courts would be bound to maintain and enforce them, the constitution and the laws of the State notwithstanding."

Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, says:

"A person who is a naturalized citizen of the United States by a like residence (the same required of native-born) in any State in the Union, becomes ipso facto a citizen of that State."—2 Story, secs. 1693 and 1694.

In another place he says:

"It has always been well understood among jurists in this country that the citizens of each State constitute the body-politic of each community, called the people of the States, and that the citizens of each State in the Union are ipso facto citizens of the United States."

Rawle, in his work on the Constitution, page 86, uses the following language:

"The citizens of each State constituted the citizens of the United States when the Constitution was adopted. The rights which appertain to them as citizens of those respective Commonwealths accompanied them in the formation of the great compound Commonwealth which ensued. They became citizens of the latter, without ceasing to be citizens of the former; and how was subsequently born a citizen of a State became at the moment of his birth a citizen of the United States."

Chancellor Kent says:

"If a slave born in the United States be manumitted, or otherwise lawfully discharged from bondage, or if a black man be born within the United States and born free, he becomes thenceforward a citizen."—2 Kent's Commentaries, fourth edition, p. 257, note.

Chief Justice Taney, delivering the opinion of the court in the Dred Scott case, says:

"It is true every person, and every class and description of persons, who were at the time of the adoption of the Constitution recognized as citizens in the several States, became also citizens of this new political body."

This opinion, then, concedes to all members of the several State communities, and to those who should afterward, by birthright or otherwise, become members thereof, all the personal rights, privileges, and immunities guaranteed to citizens of this "new Government." In fact, the opinion distinctly asserts that the words "people of the United States" and "citizens" are "synonymous terms." They both describe the political body, who, according to our republican institutions, form the sovereignty, and who hold the power and conduct the Government through their representatives.

The great error into which Chief Justice Taney falls consists in the fact that he arbitrarily excluded all negroes, though free, from this sovereignty. He unfortunately rejected the text of the Constitution itself, and sought judicial light in what he erroneously supposed to be "the legislation and histories of the times." Instead of construing a plain instrument as its language directed, in order to secure freedom and happiness to those who made it and their posterity, he went back seventy years to explore "the State of public opinion" which then existed in "relation to" what he termed "that unfortunate race," (the negroes,) and came to the conclusion that for more than a century before that time they had been regarded by civilized and enlightened nations "as beings of an inferior order and altogether unfit to associate with the white race, either in social or political relations, and so far inferior that they had no rights which the white man was bound to respect." He entirely ignored the fact that in many of the States at that time free negroes enjoyed every privilege and immunity of citizenship. Indeed, the fact is perfectly clear, established beyond all question by "the legislation and histories of the times," that free negroes, in both free and slave States, enjoyed full citizenship, and yet Judge Taney says "it cannot be supposed that they intended to secure to them rights and privileges and rank in the new political body throughout the Union which every one of them denied within the limits of its own dominion." In forming his opinion he abandoned the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence, for he distinctly says "the general words contained in the Declaration would seem to embrace the whole human family, and if they were used in a similar instrument at this day would be so understood." He distinctly admits that he put aside these words, as a part of the history of that period, and based his conclusions upon a certain supposed state of feeling which in reality did not then exist—upon something which he called history, but which was really a perversion of history.

He admits that the Constitution was made for those who framed it and their posterity; in other words, that "every class and description of persons" recognized as citizens in the several States became a part of the political body known as "the people of the United States." This would clearly include the free negroes who enjoyed the full rights of citizenship in nearly half of the States of the Union at that time. Being citizens, then, of their respective States, they necessarily became citizens of the United States, and having become citizens of the United States, no State can divest them of that high privilege. No power inferior to the national sovereignty could deprive them of United States citizenship. They therefore remained citizens of the States in which they might reside, and when they desired to remove from one State to another they had a right to claim in the State of their domicile the privileges and immunities of "citizens in the several States."

Sargent, in his work on Constitutional Law, at page 111, commenting on the clause giving jurisdiction to the Federal courts between citizens of the different States, says:

"This citizenship means a residence or domicile in a particular State by one who is a citizen of the United States."

We have now seen that each judge in the Dred Scott case and all the commentators assert that State citizenship by the adoption of the Constitution became Federal citizenship; and Mr. Sargent says that when one is naturalized he becomes a citizen of the United States, and a residence or domicile in a State gives him State citizenship.

The Federal Constitution failed to define United States citizenship, and equally failed to declare what classes of persons should be entitled to its privileges. If those persons who enjoyed "all the privileges and immunities" of State citizenship at the adoption of the Constitution were not by the Constitution made citizens of the United States, it would be difficult to ascertain who were to be considered such. To deny it in such cases would lead to a total denial of such a thing as United States citizenship at all. But that cannot be the case, for, in defining the qualifications of a Representative in Congress, the Constitution requires that he shall "have been seven years a citizen of the United States." The same instrument, prescribing the qualifications of a Senator in Congress, declares that he "shall have been nine years a citizen of the United States." It is also fixed in the instrument that no person shall be President except a "natural-born citizen or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution." These clauses show that such a thing as United States citizenship existed at and prior to the time when the Constitution was adopted. Another curious fact may be seen in this, that while the Senator and Representative must be a citizen of the United States at the time of their election, it is only necessary that they be "inhabitants" of their respective States. One may be a Senator or Representative in Congress before he has acquired the rights of citizenship in his State. But he must have once been a State citizen. For instance, if an individual, seven years before the adoption of the Constitution, had been recognized a citizen of one of the States, acquiring the right either by birth or by naturalization therein, and had continued to remove from one State to another, failing to remain in any one of them long enough to acquire "all the privileges and immunities" of a citizen therein, he would yet have been a citizen of the United States and eligible to a seat in Congress from the State in which he was domiciled at the time. And so would one have been eligible to the Senate who nine years before had enjoyed State citizenship in one of the States under the Articles of Confederation.

In the clause fixing the qualifications of the President, the language is changed from "citizenship" to "residence." It says no person shall be elected President who shall not have been "fourteen years a resident of the United States." Fourteen years went back to the period of the battle of Lexington. It must be that a higher evidence of attachment to the country was intended to be secured in the President than in a member of Congress, but unless "residence" in the States be regarded as furnishing that evidence equally with citizenship itself, then the qualification of the President is not of so high a character as that of a member of Congress.

It cannot be otherwise than that all free natural-born residents of the States and all who had been naturalized by the States became, at the adoption of the Constitution, citizens of the United States. Their descendants of course followed their condition. All born of such parents became citizens at their birth. The States, after the adoption, could no longer naturalize. This power, by the Constitution, was given to Congress. But now upon the moment of naturalization the foreigner becomes a citizen of the United States, and may become a citizen of any one of the States by the same residence and under the same circumstances as native-born citizens of other States.

Now, if there be any force in the reasoning to which I have referred, or any weight in the authorities cited, United States citizenship is just what it is defined to be in the first section of this amendment. I mean that those persons who are to be made citizens by this amendment are the persons, and none others, who have ever been citizens of the United States under a fair and rational interpretation of the Constitution since its adoption in 1789.

I now proceed to consider briefly the second section of this amendment. It materially changes the Constitution as respects representation in the lower House of Congress. The same change, of course, will be produced in the Electoral Colleges. The Constitution, as it now stands, apportions Representatives and direct taxes among the States according to the number of their inhabitants; but this number is to be ascertained by taking the whole number of free persons, male and female, including apprentices, and adding thereto three fifths of the slaves and excluding all Indians not taxed. It is upon this enumeration, ascertained by the census every ten years, that Representatives have been apportioned to the States since the formation of the Government. At the time the Constitution was framed the large slaveholding States desired that the whole number of their slaves should enter into the basis of representation. This was resisted by States having few or no slaves. The question was one of great difficulty. It was finally compromised, however, by estimating each slave as three fifths of a person for purposes of representation. But it was insisted that if he were three fifths of a person for representation he should also be three fifths of a person for purposes of taxation. The controversy was therefore settled by imposing direct taxation upon the States in the same proportion in which they might be represented upon their slave population. The clause was so adjusted that whenever a slave became free he necessarily became a full person for purposes of representation and taxation. He then was included in the list of "free persons," and not in that of "other persons." Therefore, whenever a State emancipated its slaves, as many did before the late war, it increased its representative power in Congress and fell subject to increased taxation to the extent of two fifths of all persons so emancipated.

The recent war of rebellion has terminated in the abolition of slavery in all the southern States. This emancipation, of course, was against the will of those States; but it none the less increases their representative power because it was forced on them.

This provision of the Constitution, like many others, looked to the ultimate extinction of slavery in all the States. It was so worded, of course, as to be adapted to either state of affairs. It compromised a present difficulty growing out of a state of slavery, but anticipated a period when it would cease to exist. When the former slave became a free man he was to become one of the people. He ceased to be property, and became a person. I confess I can see no good reason why the negro thus emancipated should be excluded from the basis of representation. I believe that no one in the Federal Convention asked the exclusion of any person, white or black, citizen or alien, provided he were a freeman. Indeed, in the fifty-fourth number of the Federalist, Mr. Madison, commending the Constitution to the people, says:

"It is not contended that the number of people in each State ought not to be the standard for regulating the proportion of those who are to represent the people of each State."

And in the same connection he remarks:

"That if the laws were to restore the rights which have been taken away the negroes could no longer be refused an equal share of representation with the other inhabitants."

For myself, I cannot refrain from expressing regret that it becomes necessary for me to give apparent indorsement to a principle contained in this second section. It departs from the views of the framers of the Constitution in several particulars. The first prominent objection is that it separates representation from taxation. If it were proposed to base taxation upon wealth instead of numbers it would be much better. Mr. Madison said that the rule of representation referred to the "personal rights of the people," and therefore should be based upon numbers, irrespective of their political condition. But he remarked that the rule basing taxation upon numbers is "in no case a precise measure, and in ordinary cases a very unfit one." The amendment, as proposed, does not base taxation upon wealth, but leaves the Constitution in this respect as it now stands. If direct taxation be hereafter levied it will be apportioned among the States, according to their numbers, including free negroes as well as all other persons. If I believed it probable that direct taxation would be resorted to in the future legislation of the country, nothing could induce me to support this proposition. A second objection to it consists in the argument furnished, that we admit the necessity, or at least the propriety, of excluding arbitrarily a freeman from the elective franchise; and it will be contended that we render a present doubtful power of the States to do so certain. A third objection which is urged consists in the fact that while it inflicts punishment for the exclusion of the negro from the ballot, it permits the white citizen and the alien inhabitant to be excluded by the States without loss of representative power. A fourth objection will be urged that it presents too great an incentive to the States to extend suffrage to persons who are ignorant and uneducated for the mere purpose of acquiring power, inasmuch as those who may be excluded under this provision on account of the want of intelligence will be equally excluded from the basis of representation.

The amendment fixes representation upon numbers, precisely as the Constitution now does, but when a State denies or abridges the elective franchise to any of its male inhabitants who are citizens of the United States and not less than twenty-one years of age, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, then such State will lose its representation in Congress in the proportion which the male citizen so excluded bears to the whole number of male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age in the State.

The original amendment reported by the committee of fifteen, which passed the House of Representatives and was defeated in this body, put the basis of representation on numbers also, but it differed from this in some important particulars. It provided that—

"Whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons therein of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation."

That proposition seemed to admit in express terms the right of the States to exclude from suffrage on account of color. The words "race or color" are left out of this proposition entirely. The States under the former proposition might have excluded the negroes under an educational test and yet retained their power in Congress. Under this they cannot. For all practical purposes, under the former proposition loss of representation followed the disfranchisement of the negro only; under this it follows the disfranchisement of white and black, unless excluded on account of "rebellion or other crime." The former might have had the effect to keep the negro uneducated, in order that he might be permanently excluded under that pretension. There was to be no penalty on such exclusion, and if prejudice against race exists to the extent supposed in the southern States, perpetual ignorance must have been the fate of the negro unless Congress could have interfered to educate him. If equally educated with the white man, no possible pretext remained for the denial of suffrage except the color of his skin; and if he were excluded for race or color, he no longer constituted a part of the representative population. Under the former proposition the exclusion of ten negroes in a State because of race or color excluded from representation all persons of that race or color, though they might number half a million or more. This encourages to give the ballot, because it gives power in the same proportion as the ballot is given. In some respects, therefore, this proposition is far superior to the one defeated. No amendment can be offered on this subject which would not be liable to objections, but this is not subject to many of the harsh criticisms to which the other was.

I have already said that no one in the Federal Convention asked that a freeman should be excluded from the basis of representation, and that I could see no good reason for excluding the negro now. The same reason, however, which requires that he should be counted in the basis of representation equally demands that he should constitute a part of the political sovereignty in the several States. It is true that no one in the Federal Convention asked that the free negro should be excluded from the representative basis, but is it not equally true that the distinguished statesmen of that day admitted the citizenship of the negro and acknowledged his right to suffrage in the States? I have already shown that in five States of the Union the negro enjoyed the right to vote when the Constitution was adopted. He was therefore a citizen in those States, and the Constitution declared that, being a citizen in one State, he should have the privileges and immunities of citizenship in every other State. Having the right, therefore, to vote in one State, the right would attach to him on equal terms with the white man whenever he removed his domicile to another State.

Mr. Madison expressed confident belief that the people in the several States would not abridge the rights of suffrage, but would rather extend them. Such, no doubt, was the general belief. If these anticipations, in connection with the hope of early emancipation, had been realized, we should long since have had a Government founded upon the consent of the governed. Had such been the case we would have had no war. The war came, however, and brought with it the bitter fruits which we have gathered during the last five years.

The Virginia convention, on the 12th of June, 1776, uttered the sentiment of patriotism, and proclaimed the true theory of republican government, when it declared that "all men having sufficient evidence of permanent common interest with and attachment to the community have the right of suffrage, and cannot be taxed or deprived of their property for public uses without their own consent or that of their representatives so elected; nor bound by any law to which they have not in like manner assented for the public good."

No one pretends now to doubt that slavery and the discussion growing out of it produced the late war. Slavery is the natural result of a certain degree of inferiority. The father is the patriarch and governor of the family, because of this inferiority. Until the child is twenty-one years of age the father has the power of correction and enjoys the fruits of his labor. This rests upon the admitted fact that the minor is incapable of taking proper care of himself. The father is bound only to treat him with humanity, but has the right to control his person and take his earnings. Slavery proceeds from the same argument. "It is assumed that the black man is not only inferior to the white man, but incapable of self-government. Admit the truth of this proposition and slavery becomes justified by the highest attributes of justice and humanity."

Mr. A. H. Stephens, the wisest of the southern statesmen, fully comprehended this theory when commending the confederate constitution to the people of Savannah in 1861. He said "the prevailing ideas entertained by him [Jefferson] and most of the leading statesmen at the time of the formation of the old Constitution were, that the enslavement of the Africans was in violation of the laws of nature; that it was wrong in principle, socially, morally, and politically." He said, further, "the new constitution has put at rest forever all the agitating questions relating to our peculiar institution—African slavery as it exists among us—the proper status of the negro in the form of our civilization. This," he repeats, "was the immediate cause of the late rupture and the present revolution."

Again, he says, the corner-stone of the new Government "rests upon the great truth, that the negro is not equal to the white man." Speaking of the anti-slavery fanatics of the North, he said, in the same speech, "Their conclusions are right if their premises are; they assume that the negro is equal, and hence conclude that he is entitled to equal privileges and rights with the white man. If their premises were correct their conclusions would be logical and just; but their premises being wrong, their argument fails."

The position taken by Mr. Stephens is certainly correct. If the negro be inferior to the white man, and incapable of self-government, modified slavery results as a matter of course. The southern argument, asserting the divinity of slavery, proceeded from this idea. We have declared that slavery in no form shall exist hereafter. In so declaring, we necessarily deny the negro's incapacity to take care of and govern himself. Now, if the abolition of slavery is not to be followed by such privileges and rights as will maintain and perpetuate the freedom of the emancipated, it amounts to nothing. It is "as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal." Mr. Stephens said that this idea of inferiority, upon which slavery was founded upon the one side, and the opposite idea of man's equality on the other, carrying with it equal rights and equal privileges, caused the late war. It was first a contest of opinion, then a contest of force. In the overthrow of the rebellion one idea triumphed, and necessarily the other was vanquished. False ideas, then, and false teachings had corrupted our institutions. These teachings interfered with the harmony of the Government. They had produced disease. That disease had developed itself in a destructive war. It was for us, when violence had ceased, when the paroxysms of acute pain had been allayed, to consider whether the cause of disease should be removed entirely or be left in the system to fester again.

I think it somewhat unfortunate that Congress was not in session when armed hostility ceased. It is possible that, had it been in session, it would have done nothing. It had certainly been derelict in failing to provide for a contingency, which for many months before its occurrence it was evident must soon happen. And why did it fail thus to provide? For the same reason that produced the war. Because we could not agree as to the status of the negro. We feared to grapple with prejudice and did nothing.

President Johnson, finding the rebellion overthrown and himself just advanced to the executive power of the nation, naturally enough felt a desire to see the Union at once restored. He had borne a prominent part among the friends and supporters of the Government, and it would be by no means strange that he were possessed of an ambition, laudable and honorable within itself, to take a yet more prominent and exalted position in rebuilding the shattered columns of the Union. The war had been waged that the States might be kept in their proper relations to the Government. It was the wish of every earnest patriot in the land to see complete restoration, and to see it as soon as possible. It had been a fearful period, those four years of anxiety and dread. The loyal people never desired the war. They accepted it simply as a necessity. They went to the battle without malice toward their enemies, but simply to save the Union, and in so doing to secure the happiness and even safety of both North and South. Hence when victory came the first shout of exultation was immediately followed by an exhibition of charity and magnanimity toward a fallen foe which brought to the national name more true glory than all the achievements of war, and gave each hero a fame that will live when his most daring deeds of martial prowess shall have been long forgotten. The assassination of Mr. Lincoln checked but did not subdue this feeling of mercy.

The incoming President took counsel of his Cabinet advisers as to the course of policy to be pursued. They were substantially the same who had devised a plan of restoration with the lamented Lincoln in 1863. At that time not more than three of the seceded States could possibly be drawn into any scheme of restoration. The rebel government held undisputed sway over all the others. The erection of loyal governments in these three States at that time should have been regarded in the light of a military measure, a means rather to crush out organized treason by fostering a counter-power in its midst. Mr. Lincoln's plan was certainly not designed to build up permanent institutions to exist in a time of peace, founded upon the consent of one tenth of the inhabitants. An oath had been prescribed for the voter, good enough for that period and well calculated for the purposes designed, but wholly unfitted to the spring of 1865, when the armies of Lee and Johnston had returned home and the reestablishment of the Union had become a fixed fact. They had been stripped of the musket. They, of course, expected for the time being to be deprived of the ballot. It was the ballot in the seceded States which had made their rebellion so formidable. It had given the rebellion form and consistency. It had clothed treason with legal sanction. It gave the insurgents a government and lent organized purpose to every movement. The ballot had previously aided treason only because the ballot was partial. If even one half of the negroes could have voted in the seceded States in 1861 secession would have been lost in each one of them. Secession was successful at that time, because it was entirely in the hands of those whose fancied interests and whose real prejudices had brought on the war. One would suppose that when armed violence had been suppressed entirely, they who had commenced it should give a full and not a partial acceptance to the situation. I think the South at first was willing in good faith to do so. They expected nothing else. The more intelligent among them admitted that the whole case submitted to the arbitration of the sword had been decided against them. They did not cease to believe in secession, but the point was decided and they yielded to the decision. They did not believe that slavery should be abolished, but slavery was involved in the case as made up, and they yielded, as yields the unsuccessful suitor in the highest court of judicature. They did not believe that equal rights and equal privileges should be accorded to the negro. But this question they knew was involved in the contest also. The premises taken by the supporters of the Union were proved to be correct, and now, in the language of Mr. Stephens, the whole conclusion was "logical and just."

The Cabinet, however, had committed themselves to a policy, and now came that thing so dangerous always in human conduct—pride of opinion, attachment to preconceived notions. It may be possible that the mind, like machinery, runs best in old and worn grooves. It is certainly true that the change of condition in public affairs made no change in policy. What had been an acknowledged temporary arrangement was now to be made a permanent institution. A plan of restoration was adopted which put the political power of the South right where it was at the beginning of the war. Many persons think that this was designed, and the President and his Cabinet wished to build up a new party, having its strength in the old rebellion. I cannot think so. I do not think so. I think they were actuated by the best of motives, but committed a blunder. They were certainly too hasty, but I attribute their haste, first, to that ambition of which I have spoken, and second, to a false pride of opinion, with which man's happiness must ever contend until his whole moral nature has been reconstructed.

So soon as the southern people found political power again in their grasp, the spirit of humility gradually disappeared, and they conceived a hope that the judgment rendered against them in the tribunal of arms might now be arrested. They supposed that something might be saved from the wreck of their political fortunes, which, properly invested, would ultimately restore them to their former place and grandeur in the Government. If slavery could be saved, this were an investment of the most priceless character, but the President said, "Slavery shall not be saved." For this the country owes Andrew Johnson a debt of gratitude. They then thought if the technical right of secession, even, could be admitted in the words of their conventional proceedings, it would be so much laid up for the future. The President said "that no words must be used upon which an inference could hang favoring the right of secession." In this Andrew Johnson was right, and no true man will withhold his praise. They next endeavored to save treason from odium by providing that the debt contracted in its perpetration should be acknowledged and paid. To this the President gave his refusal, and again the country is thankful to Andrew Johnson for this act of true statesmanship.

For these acts the President was denounced as a tyrant. I only regret that his tyranny did not go far enough. He stopped at the precise point where the greatest degree of moral courage was needed. Southern prejudice against race had started the war, northern prejudice had prolonged it. Southern prejudice, if unsustained, would have given us a war of but short duration. Northern sympathy came to its aid, and doubled its miseries. At this period the South was ready to cast off its prejudices if the demand had been made. The President and his Cabinet had boldly conducted us to the overthrow of southern rebellion. But they now cowed before this spirit in the North which had aided and prolonged the strife. The South saw its opportunity and promptly collected together all the elements of prejudice and hatred against the negro for purposes of future party power. They denied him the right to hold real or personal property, excluded him from their courts as a witness, denied him the means of education, and forced upon him unequal burdens. Though nominally free, so far as discriminating legislation could make him so he was yet a slave. It was at this period, as I have said, that the President and his Cabinet faltered. If they had put their veto upon these measures, their voice would have been the law; the South would have been saved from their worst enemies, themselves, and the whole country would have felt secure in the beginning of a better era. But they were encouraged by this indecision and want of moral firmness in the President and his Cabinet, and adopted a system of laws which doomed the negro to hopeless ignorance, degradation, and misery. They not only denied him the ballot, but denied him the commonest rights of human nature. If this thing were to be continued there was no hope left for his future amelioration. He must be a degraded outcast. The only change made was in the name: he was once a slave, and men called him a slave; men now mocked his condition by calling him a freeman.

Thus encouraged the southern States became insolent in the immediate prospect of power, and presumed to insult the loyal sentiment of the country by conferring honors upon the most obnoxious leaders of their rebellion. They even elected and sent to Congress the men who have held the highest places in the rebel government.

In this condition of affairs Congress convened. The first thing, of course, was to close the doors of Congress against this rebel invasion. The next was to do a simple act of justice to the negroes and poorer whites of the South, who had been always loyal to the Government. For that purpose, "the act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees," called the "Freedmen's Bureau bill," and the "act to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights," called "the civil rights bill," were presented to Congress and adopted. Whatever may be said against these measures, and much has been said, their sole object was to break down in the seceded States the system of oppression to which I have alluded. Their only effect was, after feeding the starving white and black, to give the right to hold real and personal estate to the negro, to enable him to sue and be sued in courts, to let him be confronted by his witnesses, to have the process of the courts for his protection, and to enjoy in the respective States those fundamental rights of person and property which cannot be denied to any person without disgracing the Government itself. It was simply to carry out that provision of the Constitution which confers upon the citizens of each State the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States. These measures did not pretend to confer upon the negro the suffrage. They left each State to determine that question for itself. Their highest aim was to secure what the lawyers call civil rights to every person within the jurisdiction of the Government. The necessity for these or similar measures was imperative. To have failed in this duty would not only have rendered the results of the war perfectly abortive, but would have completely withered the laurels we won in its successful prosecution.

The President saw fit to veto those measures, supposing them to be unconstitutional. I never doubted the power of Congress to pass them. I never doubted that the Government would be disgraced if it failed to establish for the private citizen the muniments of freedom intended to be secured by them. I did have my doubts whether this was the best way to accomplish the end. It would necessarily bring about a conflict between State and Federal jurisdiction. I knew it would meet with resistance in the States. I thought it would be repulsed, as even beneficence itself is always repulsed when forced on an unwilling community. I feared that in the conflict to arise the rights of the weak would be lost sight of, and finally sacrificed. I then believed, and do now believe, that the necessity for these measures is an unfortunate necessity. That necessity cannot exist where the local government is founded upon the consent of the entire people. The people of Georgia know what laws are best for their own happiness and security. But when one half of the people legislate for all this truth ceases in its application. Let all have a voice in making the law and the popular heart will execute it, because the liberty of all consists in its enforcement. It is only where political power is in the hands of a favored few that oppression can be practiced. It is only where oppression exists that the agents of a superior power are needed for protection. Give the negro the ballot and he will take care of himself, because his interest requires it. Give him a bureau agent, and he will sometimes be plundered, because his interest and the interest of the agent may differ.

At an earlier day in the session I offered a proposition which I thought would secure these ends. It was a constitutional amendment in three lines. It prohibited the States, in prescribing the qualifications of voters, from discriminating against the negro on account of his color. Had this been adopted, by its own force it made him a citizen in each State, because it gave him the highest prerogative of a freeman. There would then have been no necessity for declaring who are citizens of the United States, for every freeman would have worn the honored badge of citizenship. It would then have been useless to declare that no State shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, for those simple words presented an effectual bar against it. It would have been superfluous to interdict the States from taking life, liberty, or property from the citizen without due process of law; for liberty being first given, the citizen can protect his own life and property. The provision securing equal protection of the laws against inimical State legislation might then be dispensed with as wholly unnecessary. The very section we are now considering, with all its difficulties of verbal adjustment, might be abandoned and the Constitution be left in that respect as our fathers made it. The necessity for abridging representation would have ceased, for both representative and elector would have been loyal. These few words would have accomplished directly what this proposes to accomplish indirectly after years of political strife, in which truth and conscience and patriotism are too often sacrificed to the attainment of success. Had that been done it were useless to enact an exclusion from office of the leaders of the rebellion. Where all men are interested in the Government, none but peaceful revolutions are needed. Reforms are worked at the ballot-box. Government then, and only then, becomes a divine institution. Rebellion against it not only injures the public weal, but it shocks the moral sense of a contented and happy people. They who lead such rebellions are at once visited with public odium. In public estimation traitors then stand as the greatest of criminals. They are looked upon as monsters in human shape. Cain bore the mark of one crime—murder; but a people perfectly free will never fail to stamp traitors, as they deserve to be stamped, with the mark of all crimes.

If that proposition had been adopted we need not pledge our faith to the payment of the public debt. That faith would have been best secured in the honest convictions and the moral sense of the people. Had it been adopted, we need not have proclaimed by constitutional enactment the invalidity of the rebel debt, founded as it is upon contracts made in contravention of public policy, against the best interests of the State, in violation of the laws of the land, and for the purpose of enslaving the very men whose substance would be required to pay it.

But, Mr. President, in all this I may have been mistaken. The presumption is, I was mistaken, for a large majority have ruled against me. I yet have faith in its ultimate success. Necessity, if nothing else, will soon bring believers. Believers may be now few, but as through the faith of the Hebrew mother, so again they will soon be "as many as the stars of the sky in multitude, and as the sand which is by the sea-shore innumerable."

The old saying is true, that we must take things as we find them. I am somewhat an optimist, and this at last may be the best. The negroes during the war were our faithful allies. They are now steeped in poverty and must remain so unless Congress does something to help them. The poor whites of the South are not in a much better condition. State governments are already in the hands of those hostile, through prejudice or interest, to their improvement or amelioration. The legislation of these governments even now frets with oppression. Within the scope of State jurisdiction there is no such thing as equality in the law. The State courts are already deciding the "civil rights bill" to be unconstitutional. The validity of all laws must depend at last upon human judgment. Judges, even in the highest courts, are but mortals. Should the Supreme Court of the United States affirm the judgment of these inferior tribunals, the present period would be no better for the rights of the negro than that when the Supreme Court once before supposed he had no rights which the white man was bound to respect. Should such be the action of this tribunal, the problem would at once be presented, whether four million people can be peacefully held nominally free, but actually slave.

If it be true that these negroes are not susceptible of education; if they are more nearly allied to brutes than to men; if as free men they can add nothing to the wealth of the country; if they are unfit to take part or lot in the State governments, it may be asked, why should they be represented in Congress? If they are incapable of choosing a Representative for themselves, why should those who treat them as inferior beings, and almost deny their humanity, claim the right to represent them as citizens? It is said that women and aliens in the North are retained in the basis of representation, why should not the negroes be retained in the South?

It may be answered that these women and aliens are treated as human beings; they are regarded as persons and not dumb brutes; they enjoy the right to acquire property, to enter the courts for its protection, to follow the professions, to accumulate wealth, whereby national resources are increased and national power augmented; they are a part of the people. The road to the ballot is open to the foreigner; it is not permanently barred. It is not given to the woman, because it is not needed for her security. Her interests are best protected by father, husband, and brother. The negro is the object of that unaccountable prejudice against race which has its origin in the greed and selfishness of a fallen world. That prejudice belongs to an age of darkness and violence, and is a poisonous, dangerous exotic when suffered to grow in the midst of republican institutions, where we boast an asylum for the oppressed of every land. Why do we shudder to meet this question? Nearly five million people, strong, vigorous, and inured to labor, are in your midst, partially without civil, wholly without political rights. What will you do with them? You have three alternatives before you, and only three. You must kill them, colonize them, or ultimately give them a part of your political power. For this last alternative the country is not yet prepared. With the two former humanity and common sense will successfully struggle.

But I am told that this proposition will operate as a penalty on the South. Suppose it were a penalty from which she could not escape, would it be an adequate punishment for the crime committed? Might it not, if justice untempered with mercy were consulted, be made a permanent rule until the public debt were paid and the curses of treason were effaced from the land? If it be a penalty, it is one which the offender may escape. It is likened unto the penalties of the divine law. The choice of good and evil is before them. The indulgence of evil is followed by punishment, because it is an inexorable law of man's organization. The choice of good is followed by happiness, contentment, prosperity. It is thus wisely ordained, that interest may constrain to duty, in the exercise of which the world is advanced and man is ennobled. This may be called a penalty, but a simple act of justice will fully discharge it. It is equal, for it applies to all the States.

Another advantage consists in the fact that it compels the moral and intellectual culture of the lower classes. If not properly qualified for the exercise of the ballot, the State governments may fall into the hands of incompetent and dangerous persons. Until all can vote, all cannot be represented. All cannot safely vote until a large majority are educated. This provision, then, may constrain to justice in a double sense. The strong argument in favor of it is, that as the Constitution now stands four white voters in the South, formerly soldiers in Lee's army, will be equal in representative power to six of those who followed Grant from the Rapidan to Richmond or Sherman from Atlanta to the sea. I therefore accept it, in the hope that the South, seeing its true interests, will, even before the next census, learn to seek justice for themselves in the exercise of the golden rule.

The third section of this amendment provides that no person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid and comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a two-thirds vote of each House remove the disability. The language of this section is so framed as to disfranchise from office the leaders of the past rebellion as well as the leaders of any rebellion hereafter to come. It strikes at those who have heretofore held high official position, and who therefore may be presumed to have acted intelligently. When the section is closely scrutinized, it will be seen that comparatively few men will fall subject to the exclusion. It does not, as sometimes supposed, reach all who may have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. The civil officers of the Federal Government, previous to the war, were comparatively few. With the exception of postmasters, perhaps not a thousand are yet remaining in the South. The Army and Navy of the United States were very small before the war, and I presume it is doubtful whether three hundred military and naval officers yet survive the rebellion who will be affected, and these will be chiefly officers who were educated in the Military and Naval Schools at the expense of the Government. They not only forfeited their oaths, but committed an act of ingratitude which forever stamps them as unfit for public position. I have but little idea what number of persons will be reached as former members of Congress. The number cannot be very great. Those who were actuated by convictions of duty, and believed themselves right in their rebellion, boldly went to the front and fell victims to their error. Those who sinned against light and knowledge, knowing the iniquity of their conduct, exhibited such want of moral worth as to forbid an honest discharge of public duty hereafter. The executive and judicial officers of the seceding States are supposed to be men, not only of intelligence, but of distinguished abilities. These persons are not numerous, they will not likely exceed two or three hundred. Some of these took so prominent a part, and were so relentless and vindictive in their persecutions of Union men, as to have become especially obnoxious to the loyal sentiment of the country. It will be best for the South itself to discard all such men for the future. Much the largest class of persons to be excluded under this amendment will be found among the former members of the State Legislatures. What may be the probable number I have but little idea. Perhaps fifteen hundred or two thousand will cover all classes debarred under this amendment from the privilege of holding office. If we deduct from this the number who will be able to prove themselves innocent when charged with complicity with the rebellion, we shall have two or three hundred left, consisting chiefly of those who, as officers of the Army, educated at public expense, surrendered their commands into the hands of the enemy, or who as members of Congress met in conclave under the roof of the Capitol to plot treason against a Government which had honored them, and which daily paid them for acts of treachery done under the sacred name of public duty. Those fierce "furies of the guillotine," who came into public life under the reign of terror, inaugurated in 1861, and who sought and obtained the offices of the confederate government because their natures were as wicked and devilish as the treason they supported, will yet be able to hold office, State and national. They are not disqualified by this section. They never took an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, for they were unnoticed until the reign of crime commenced. They were born into public life with the confederate constitution. They were turbulent, dangerous men, who found no favor in times of peace. It required commotion and storm to bring them to the surface. The rebellion was in a large measure their work. It required daring and heartless men to conduct it, and they soon became its leaders. After the adoption of the amendment we shall see these men in public office. The whole country will conclude that those who are disfranchised are no worse than those who yet lead southern sentiment, and Congress, by a vote of two thirds, will remove the disability. I have no doubt that this will be the conclusion of the whole matter.

I would not be understood in what I am now saying as complaining of the provision. I would perhaps be more merciful still, simply because no adequate punishment can be devised for the wickedness of the offense. We cannot punish all. To discriminate among those who are equally guilty wears the garb of injustice. We cannot even punish those who are guilty of the highest crimes, crimes which give treason its darkest hue. To do so would stamp the nation with cruelty; therefore we cannot begin without injustice. We must be merciful. I am willing to make the highest virtue of that necessity. There is so much guilt as to render the task of punishment hopeless. Hence the provision depriving even the worst rebel leaders of the ballot has been wholly abandoned. Lee, Johnston, Wade Hampton, Moseby, and even Jeff. Davis, are left as qualified electors, competent to vote for State officers and members of Congress. Moseby, after the passage of this amendment, may be legally elected to any office in the gift of the Government.

Distinguished Senators tell us that this deprivation of office is a punishment. If it be a punishment, it is so insignificant when compared with the crime that it is scarcely entitled to the name. They tell us that it is a bill of attainder. Suppose it were; are the people in their sovereign capacity prohibited from passing a bill of attainder? The people, in forming a Constitution, said that Congress should pass no such bill. They surely possessed the power to authorize Congress to do so. But for the similar prohibition on the States each State could pass a bill of attainder. The people reserved the power to themselves. They surely can amend their Constitution. If they had the power originally to declare that a member of the lower House of Congress shall have been seven years a citizen of the United States, a Senator nine years, and the President a native-born citizen, a resident for fourteen years, they certainly had the right to say that no man shall hold office who has committed murder, burglary, or larceny; and if they can so declare, they may certainly disfranchise one who has been guilty of treason. It is said the law is ex post facto in its character; what if it is? Have not the people the right, by a constitutional amendment, to enact such a law? It was even feared that Congress would be able to do so, and it was admitted that the States might do so if the people had not inhibited it in the Federal Constitution. I am aware that bills of attainder and ex post facto laws are unjust within themselves, and ought not to be passed where the power to do so is clear.

But I deny that this is a bill of attainder or an ex post facto law. Such laws are criminal and not civil in their character. In the one case they select a particular delinquent, and punish him by the sole act of the Legislature without the forms of law; in the other, they call that a crime which was innocent at the time of the act, and assume to punish it, or prescribe a greater degree of punishment for that which was already punishable. Before this provision can be called a bill of attainder or ex post facto law, it must be amenable to the charge that it proposes in some form to punish. It is sufficient for this argument to say that this is an act fixing the qualifications of officers and not an act for the punishment of crime.

And again, punishment means to take away life, liberty, or property. These are absolute or inalienable rights. To take them away is an injury to the person. It is what we call punishment. They ought never to be taken away without due process of law. Office is the creature of Government. It is true it may be called a right. The right is not absolute but conventional. The Government created it and the Government can take it away. It has never been regarded in the American courts as a punishment when conventions and Legislatures deprived incumbents of their offices. Every State constitution contains provisions inhibiting the passage of bills of attainder, ex post facto laws, and laws impairing the obligations of contracts. The Federal Constitution provides the same limitation upon State power, which opens the Federal courts to any person aggrieved, and yet it is notorious that every State in the Union has turned officials out of office, changed their terms of service, reduced their salaries, and entirely abolished the laws under which they held. Nobody ever supposed that this was punishment, and unless that were punishment this cannot be.

If this provision be all, even if faithfully carried out, it will be an act of the most stupendous mercy that ever mantled the crimes of rebellion. This rebellion was causeless. It was not only causeless but gigantic in its proportions, carrying hundreds of thousands to an untimely grave, and leaving a legacy of debt sufficient to crush the energies of any nation less vigorous and powerful than ours. It was not only a gigantic rebellion, but it was conducted by its leaders in a spirit of fiendish ferocity which renders them wholly unworthy of public confidence hereafter. It is said that these leaders ought not to be condemned unheard, that they should not even be disqualified for official position until their guilt is established in a court of justice. If it were proposed to take from them life, liberty, or property, I would be unwilling to do so except according to the law of the land. But when it is only proposed to fix a qualification for office and deny them future distinctions, which would rather make their treason honorable than odious, I do not hesitate to act.

I know this will do but little good; I doubt whether it will do any. If they shall bring forth fruits meet for repentance, I perhaps will be the first to remove the disability. I never have exercised a malicious spirit toward these people. I have pitied, but never hated. No act of confiscation has ever received my support. No such act ever will. I never but once voted to disfranchise those who participated in the rebellion, and then only because I believed the best interests of my State demanded it. The necessity for such exclusion there has perhaps already passed. They clamor for suffrage, and I for one am willing to grant it to them if they will now be generous enough to extend it to all who carried the musket to defend the Government while they carried the musket to destroy it.

Mr. President, the only remaining section of the proposed amendment pledges the public faith to the honest discharge of those obligations which we have incurred in maintaining the national life. This is but an act of justice to the creditor and a proper precaution against the establishment of parties hereafter appealing to the sordid interests and lowest passions of men. It not only accepts honesty as a principle, but indorses it as the highest and best policy of the State as well as of individuals. It also declares the rebel debt void, and therein it merely adopts an old and familiar principle of the common law. No agreement founded on an immoral consideration, no contract made, the object of which is to resist the law or overthrow Government, can be enforced. It may be asked, then, why adopt this amendment? The answer is, the defendant may not avail himself of his defense. He may be willing to make a new promise, and the debt, though now void, may be sufficient to support this new promise. And again, payment may be made voluntarily, though the debt be void. But the chief argument in its favor is that it forever settles a question, and settles it as it deserves to be settled. It precludes the organization of a political party, which might appeal to the pride of the South and receive material aid from the corruption funds of foreign creditors.

Under all the circumstances I think the country should accept the amendment, for it does much toward settling some of the vexed questions of the past.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, I had not expected to say anything upon this question. I preferred to proceed to a vote immediately. We have had much debate upon it. I know the anxiety which gentlemen feel to come to a vote on this question, and I shall say but a very few words.

I have thought that in consequence of the position which I assumed in the beginning of the session, and from the fact that my heart has not been entirely in favor of the measures which have been proposed, and still not opposed to them, I may say, it became me to explain my views. It seems to be fashionable in this day for gentlemen who presume to think their views should be known to avail themselves of the opportunity to explain their position. I propose to do so now; and that I may speak more directly to the purpose, that I may present the views which I wish to present, and which I promise to detain the Senate but a very few minutes in stating, I will send to the desk of the Clerk an amendment which I propose to be added as a last section to the sections already under consideration, not so much that I care whether a vote is taken on it or not, but simply as the basis of the very few remarks which I shall submit on the present occasion.

The Secretary read as follows:

Nothing in the foregoing sections shall abridge or in anywise affect the rights, franchises, or privileges of any inhabitant of the United States, or of any State or Territory of the United States, guaranteed by the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery within the United States, in force on the 18th day of December, 1865.

Mr. YATES. At the beginning of the session I took the ground that already by the Constitution of the United States, as amended, every man in the United States, without regard to color or caste of any kind, was a citizen, and I offered a resolution to that effect, based upon the fact that by the constitutional amendment we had abolished slavery within the United States and in all the Territories subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, and required Congress, by appropriate legislation, to enforce that provision of the amendment. I offered my resolution declaring what seemed to be an admitted fact by Senators of distinguished ability, that all constitutions, laws, and regulations of any State or Territory of the United States which conflicted with this amendment to the Constitution of the United States were null and void. I took the ground that this being the fact, Congress should resort to the mode prescribed and required by the amendment, to "appropriate legislation," to enforce that provision of the Constitution. I assumed the position that that amendment did not confer freedom upon the slave, or upon anybody, without conferring upon him the muniments of freedom, the rights, franchises, privileges that appertain to an American citizen or to freedom, in the proper acceptation of that term. I took the ground laid down in the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Dred Scott case, (which certainly was a hard rule by which I should be governed,) that when this amendment passed the freedman was no longer a member of a subject race. He became by virtue of the amendment one of the people, one of the body-politic, and entitled to be protected in all his rights and privileges as one of the citizens of the United States. The deductions drawn from the decision in the Dred Scott case were irresistible. The great Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] said—the highest compliment ever paid to me in my life—that in view of the principles laid down in that decision I had assumed an unanswerable position.

I took the ground that the former slaves in every State of the United States, being made free by this amendment, occupied precisely the same position with any other part of the body-politic, that a son of a colored man born in the State of Wisconsin under the broad ægis of this amendment to the Constitution, had the same rights that my son had. I maintained that by this amendment to the Constitution, and by the promises of Abraham Lincoln made in his proclamation of emancipation, the former slave should be maintained in his freedom; that being like any other man, and not unlike him in any respect, under this amendment to the Constitution, he had the same right, the same inherent, if you choose, God-given right; and further, if he had not that right naturally or civilly or politically, he, by his heroic valor, his prowess upon many a glorious battle-field, where he had fought side by side with our own brave sons and brothers, had become entitled to it.

I took the ground which I maintain to-day that suffrage is the only remedy for the evils by which we are surrounded. It is the only thing that can kill secession, the only thing that can divide the South or introduce a loyal element there which will be a counterbalancing force, the only thing which will secure us a loyal representation from the South and a loyal people in the South.

I further held that if we went before the American people without indirection or disguise upon this broad proposition, we should sweep a large majority of the northern States, we should carry some of the southern States, and we should establish this country upon the solid foundations of permanent peace and happiness.

Mr. President, I have therefore sent to the Chair the amendment which, with the consent of the honorable chairman of the committee, I am allowed to propose; an amendment which says that nothing in the sections which we are about to adopt shall be construed to mean that the rights, franchises, and privileges already secured by the Constitution of the United States to any American citizen shall be impaired or in anywise affected. Such an amendment can do no harm. If the power for which I contend does not exist in the Constitution now, these words can at the worst be regarded but as surplusage; while the thousands and the hundreds of thousands of the American people who this day believe that the power does exist there, the hundreds of thousands who believed it to exist there even before this amendment, like my friend from Massachusetts, will the more readily support the amendments which the committee have reported when they see and when they feel assured that there is nothing in the amendments which will deprive the citizen of rights already guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States. Believing as I do a lawyer, believing in my heart that under the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery within the United States every inhabitant of the United States (excepting unnaturalized foreigners whose case is regulated by the Constitution) is as free as I am, and entitled to the same rights and privileges that I am, I have sent to the Chair this amendment which I desire to propose, so that there shall not be even a color for any judicial decision proposing to deprive men of rights which are already guaranteed by the recognized law.

Mr. President, if the Senator from Pennsylvania who sits by my side [Mr. COWAN] were here, I would say to him that it is not radicalism that I fear. My fear is not that this Congress will be too radical; I am not afraid of this Congress being shipwrecked upon any proposition of radicalism; but I fear from timid and cowardly conservatism which will not risk a great people to take their destiny in their own hands and to settle this great question upon the principles of equality, justice, and liberality. That is my fear.

So far as my position is concerned, it is unchanged; my convictions are the rather strengthened, and if I had it in my power to-day, I would write it in plain words upon the face of the Constitution, plain as the stars upon the sky, not in tortuous and hard-to-be-understood propositions, but I would write in the fundamental and unchangeable law of the land, that the Declaration of American Independence was a verity, that all men were created equal; and having the powers which this Congress now has, I would prove my belief by making that Declaration a reality. If this Congress of the United States could adjourn on the 4th day of July, 1866, having accomplished this great result it would be the greatest epoch in the annals of time. At the termination of such a war as this, with its mighty events, signalized by its grand armies and its greater issues, and by the blazonry of the great achievements of our sons upon so many glorious battle-fields, after so much blood and so much treasure had been spent, I could hope that the Congress of the United States would come up to the grand results that are taught by the events of this war, and by the emergencies by which we are surrounded, and proclaim the true principle and the only principle upon which this Government can live.

I am true to the theory of my Government. I believe, I religiously believe, that the strong common sense of all the people, of the populace, of America is the salvation of the Government of the United States. My distinguished friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE], and he is really my friend, claimed that he was the saviour of our party because he had prevented the issue of negro suffrage from being made in the State of Wisconsin last fall. Sir, a man who could claim to be the instrument of conferring these great and inalienable rights upon his fellow-men might with some propriety claim to be the saviour of his party and of his country. Does the Senator remember the gallant regiment from the State of Wisconsin, one thousand strong, who went out and bore up our flag amid the storm and thunder of battle? And he call himself a saviour of the country because he has been the instrument in the hands of Providence of preventing them from exercising the right of suffrage! Sir, his comparison of himself with our blessed Saviour was true in only one respect that I know of, and that is that he will most certainly be crucified. If, on the other hand, he could have come forward and said, "I stood by you; you were true to your country in the hour of its calamity and its affliction; we called you to the help of the Government; you came and stood by us in the hour of our calamity;" if he had made a sacrifice of himself in such a glorious act of humanity and human liberty, (if sacrifice it could be called,) it might not be considered blasphemy to compare himself to Him whose mission upon earth it was to proclaim liberty to the captive, to break every yoke, and let the oppressed go free.

Not so much of a victory was that in Wisconsin. The honorable Senator said with an air of triumph that negro suffrage had been beaten by nine thousand votes. Look at it. After two hundred years of foul oppression, of accumulated prejudice against a race, when politicians dare not assert their opinions, at the very first election in the State of Wisconsin negro suffrage lacked only nine thousand votes, according to his statement, of being carried; and I am prepared to believe that with his powerful influence it would have been carried triumphantly.

Mr. President, we may legislate on this question of suffrage. We may attempt by indirection to find direction. We know what we want and what we have got. Suffrage is upon us. Colored men vote in Wisconsin to-day under the authority of legal decisions. Iowa has boldly proclaimed by a majority of her citizens that she is for suffrage. Connecticut gained upon her last vote. Even in the slave States, Tennessee and Texas are on the verge of suffrage; and before these resolutions shall have passed the Congress of the United States suffrage, in spite of all of our legislation, will be an accomplished fact. Four million people set free in this country will override all political platforms and opposing forces. Seven hundred and fifty thousand voters loyal and true to the Union must and shall be had in favor of the preservation of this Government and the principles of human liberty.

It is to me the strangest thing in the world that while we deny to four million loyal men—men who have been loyal under all circumstances, who have been true to the country everywhere, in war and in peace—while we deny to them the rights of American citizens, we are prepared to extend all privileges to the men who have tried to destroy and to overthrow the Government. There is no propriety, there is no good taste in such yearnings over rebels and traitors, while we deny right and justice to our friends.

We listened to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] a day or two ago, and he seemed to think that to deprive a man of the right to hold an office was the highest punishment that could possibly be inflicted upon him; and he supposed a most affecting case, but a case which is utterly impossible, that my friend from Michigan had been a traitor, and that he wanted to be a candidate for the United States Senate, and his wife and children would gather around him and say, "Why cannot my husband or my father be a Senator? He is as great as any of those men there; why cannot he be a Senator? Simply because he has not the right to hold an office. It is a punishment; it is the mark of Cain upon his brow; it is the wolf-head upon his brow. He has no right to be a Senator; otherwise my husband or my father would be in the Senate as well as other people."

Sir, let us suppose another case. Here is a man, Winder, or Dick Turner, or some other notorious character. He has been the cause of the death of that boy of yours. He has shot at him from behind an ambuscade, or he has starved him to death in the Andersonville prison, or he has made him lie at Belle Isle subject to disease and death from the miasma by which he was surrounded. When he is upon trial and the question is, "Sir, are you guilty, or are you not guilty?" and he raises his blood-stained hands, deep dyed in innocent and patriotic blood, the Senator from Pennsylvania rises and says, "For God's sake do not deprive him of the right to go to the Legislature." The idea is that if a man has forfeited his life, it is too great a punishment to deprive him of the privilege of holding office.

But I stated that I should make but a very few remarks, and I now come to the point which is more interesting to all of us, and that is, strange as it may seem, with these views in my mind, and while I subject myself to the criticism of my distinguished friend from Indiana, [Mr. Hendricks,] I shall support these propositions. They are not such as I approve. They do not come up to the stand-point which I have set for myself. I think that Congress has failed to come up to the stand-point of the people in this regard; but, at the same time, as I cannot get the position for which I have so earnestly contended, I will sit quietly by, as I have sat quietly by, and take the next best proposition that I can get. I believe in the good common sense of my friend from Maine [Mr. Fessenden] who says that if he cannot get the best dinner he will take the next best; if he cannot get the best proposition he will take the next best proposition. I have a good deal of faith like that of my friend from Ohio; and while I would not state the proposition quite so broadly as he does, yet I always feel perfectly safe when I am in the hands of a good Republican Union party; and I would rather trust to the wisdom of the Senator from Maine and the collective wisdom of the Senators by whom I am surrounded than to stand foolishly by myself and assert that I was the only man in the world who understood this question. I only act upon a principle that the Senator from Indiana and myself and all of us act upon here every day. We propose to amend propositions, and if those amendments fail we go for the proposition itself, notwithstanding our amendments are not adopted, notwithstanding the best thing is not in it; and that is my position to-day.

There are other points in these constitutional amendments to which I will not refer, except to say that my judgment approves of them. I am for the exclusion of traitors and rebels from exercising control and power and authority in this Government until they have shown fruits meet for repentance. I am for the repudiation of the rebel debt. I am against compensation for slaves, as I am against compensation for any other rebel property. But above all there is in the first section a clause that I particularly favor. It is this:

All persons born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the States wherein they reside.

And then it goes on to provide that their rights shall not be abridged by any State. We have here, in the Constitution of the United States of America, a guarantee which protects us from future judicial tyranny such as we have experienced under the decisions of the Supreme Court. We have a declaration as to who are citizens of the United States. If this amendment of mine could be adopted, that in the constitutional amendments which we submit we do not propose to conflict with any rights which have been heretofore guaranteed by the fundamental law, the Constitution of the United States, I should be still more satisfied.

But, sir, there is another feature in this proposition, and that is that although we do not obtain suffrage now, it is not far off, because the grasping desire of the South for office, that old desire to rule and reign over this Government and control its destinies, will at a very early day hasten the enfranchisement of the loyal blacks.

While gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber are opposed to these measures as too radical, I am opposed to them, so far as I might present points of opposition, because they are not radical enough. At all events, therefore, we have the medium between extremes; we have moderation. If we do not meet the views of the Radicals on the one hand, nor the views of the pro-slavery Democracy upon the other, we at all events have the medium, the moderation which has been agreed upon by the collective wisdom of the American Senate. I am glad that I can go before my constituents and say that in the whole history of the world there never were such terms of moderation and of magnanimity proposed to a vindictive foe as by these resolutions which have been reported by the committee of fifteen.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask leave to make a report. I have here an extended report from the committee of fifteen, so called, the committee on reconstruction, giving their views and reasons with reference to the joint resolution which they submitted to the Senate and the conclusions to which they arrived. It was my hope that some time in the course of this debate, before the vote was taken, I might have the opportunity to lay the whole report before the Senate and have it read, but it is now so late an hour, and as gentlemen are desirous of taking the vote, and it has been agreed to take it to-day, that I do not feel that it would be right to attempt to have it read in detail. I therefore move that it be laid upon the table and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. It was understood in committee that if there should be any member who did not agree with the majority of the committee he would be at liberty to make a counter or minority report, and I merely rise for the purpose of saying that as such is the condition in which I stand, and in which two or three other members of the committee stand, I shall avail myself of that privilege at as early a day as possible.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. President, there is no one who more admires the rhetoric or the elocution of the Senator from Illinois than I, for I have known him from ancient days; but the people of Illinois a long time ago said by a formal act of legislative power that no person of African blood should go into the State of Illinois; and that is now, I believe, still on your statute-book.

Mr. YATES. It is in the constitution.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I remember very well, for I inhabited in and about that part of the world a long time ago, then it was thought improvident in the State of Illinois to allow colored people to come within their lines, and it was incorporated into their fundamental law; and that has not been, if I am correct, changed up to this time. I ask the Senator from Illinois if it has been.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The constitution has not been altered; the law has been.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I only mention this as the text for my own opinion, for I was conversant with that State at that time, and the people then held that a negro or a man of African descent was not a valuable property in the State of Illinois. That is the opinion there now, and when it comes to be questioned by my friends from Illinois, they will find that there is the same opinion in Illinois yet. They think yet that Government belongs to the white race. That is the simple, clear proposition. It is refuted. The converse is affirmed in Massachusetts and some other places, and I saw there was a meeting in Boston a short time since where they said that if the right of suffrage was not granted to the African there would be a bloodier war than the last war through which we have gone. I will give you a response to that, coming from a different part of the country. It is from a secessionist. I will state it exactly. He came back home, and had reintegrated himself. A friend of mine met him at Louisville, Kentucky, and said to him, "How are you, Benham? How about this being down on Beauregard's staff?" He replied, "I was there." "How about it now?" He answered, "I tell you that I am the best Union man in the United States, and if you will give me a chance I will prove it, and I will prove it in this wise: let Massachusetts and company undertake to secede, and then I will prove my Unionism."

Mr. HOWARD. I do not wish to call the Senator from California to order; but he must be aware that his observations are not very pertinent to the question now before the Senate, and I am very anxious to bring this measure to a final vote before we adjourn.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I will not occupy the floor longer. I mean to say this by way of affirmation of my opinions upon one of the gravest questions that has arisen in these times. I believe firmly, and I believe sternly, that this is a Government where there should be no mongrel races. I would not permit it if I had the power to resist it, and I will give my voice against it, and I give it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The question before the Senate is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] as a substitute for the second section of the resolution. The amendment has been modified by the mover, and it will be read as modified.

The Secretary read the amendment as modified, which was to strike out the second section of the resolution and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive, and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

Mr. HOWARD. I have one word to say upon that amendment. I desire to state, as briefly and clearly as I am able, some of the consequences to which it will lead if adopted. It declares that when the right to vote at any election for those five several classes of public officers shall be denied to any person of twenty-one years of age and a citizen of the United States, that person shall not be included in the count in forming the basis of representation. How is this to be carried out, supposing it to be adopted? What will be its practical workings when made a part of the Constitution by a formal ratification? The census-taker will find it necessary, whenever he makes the count of the inhabitants of the particular State or district where he is acting, to ascertain, as precisely as he is able, and to note down in his tables the various persons within the State who are incapacitated to vote for any one or all of these five classes of public officers. For instance, he will be required to note down in his returns what classes of voters are allowed to vote for Governor of the State; how many are authorized to vote for Lieutenant Governor; who are authorized to vote for members of the State Legislature; who for electors of President and Vice President of the United States; who for the judicial officers of the State; and so on to the end of the category. Without this exact information to be furnished from the State, it will be readily perceived that it will be impossible to fix and settle the ratio of representation which the State shall be entitled to. No one class of the voters for these several classes of public officers is to be held as the standard and test for the number of persons in that State to be included in the count in the formation of the basis of representation. It appears to me that it introduces a rule which is so uncertain, so difficult of practical application, as not only greatly to increase the expenses of ascertaining the basis of representation by Congress in procuring the necessary information, but in many cases the returns must be so inaccurate and unreliable as to be next to worthless.

As I said before, I do not wish to consume the time of the Senate, but it is at once to be perceived that if this rule shall be adopted, its operations will be felt in every election of a justice of the peace, in every municipal corporation of the United States, where, by the municipal law of the place, a justice of the peace is to be elected; for a justice of the peace is a judicial officer in precisely the same sense that the Chief Justice of the United States is such. We know very well that the States retain the power, which they have always possessed, of regulating the right of suffrage in the States. It is the theory of the Constitution itself. That right has never been taken from them; no endeavor has ever been made to take it from them; and the theory of this whole amendment is, to leave the power of regulating the suffrage with the people or Legislatures of the States, and not to assume to regulate it by any clause of the Constitution of the United States.

One class of qualifications may by a State be made necessary in the election of a Governor; another set in the election of the members of the Senate in that State; another in the election of members of the most numerous branch of the Legislature; another set of qualifications may be required by the State in the election of its several judicial officers; another in the election of electors of President and Vice President of the United States; and so on to the end of the chapter. It is a system which must necessarily vary as the laws and constitutions of the States vary; and a system which, therefore, must necessarily lead to great difficulty in its practical operations and results, and in many cases be almost entirely worthless for want of the necessary exact information which Congress should acquire and use in fixing the basis. A class of voters may be excluded from voting for a justice of the supreme court in their State who may, within their municipal limits, be allowed to vote for justices of the peace. This amendment would exclude from the count all those voters, citizens of the State, who were not permitted to vote for a justice of the supreme court; and there is no telling how far this may extend, or where these disabilities may lead, and what the ultimate results may be. I far prefer some simple standard; and if it be in order I beg to submit to the Senate, as the result of the best consideration I have been able to bestow, a simple amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon. My amendment will refer to his printed amendment offered yesterday. If it shall be adopted the whole section will read thus; and I desire the attention of the Senate for a moment to the text of the amendment if it shall be adopted, as I propose to amend it:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But whenever the right to vote at any election held under the constitution and laws of any State for members of the most numerous branch of its Legislature is denied to any male inhabitant of such State, being twenty-one years of age and a citizen of the United States, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

This will leave the simple test to be the qualifications of a voter for members of the most numerous branch of the Legislature of the State; and it has no connection with any other State officer.

Now, sir, let me say one word more. By the Constitution of the United States those persons in a State who are privileged to vote for members of the most numerous branch of its Legislature are the persons authorized to elect members of the Congress of the United States. The rule is invariable throughout the States. Why not introduce into this amendment this ancient, simple, invariable, and easily working test, instead of the variable and shifting qualifications embraced in the amendment of the honorable Senator from Oregon?

I propose also to strike out the words "or in any way abridged" in the eighth line of the printed amendment. I do not know, and I have not yet been able to find any gentleman who did know, what an abridgment of the right to vote really is. It strikes me it is a misapplication of terms. The right to vote is a unit. It is indivisible, as indivisible as a mathematical point, and as incapable of abridgment. If a man possesses the right to vote, he possesses it in its entirety. If he does not possess it, he does not possess it either conditionally, qualifiedly, or at all. He must possess it, wholly or not at all. I am not able to see how this right can be abridged. It seems to me this language is introducing confusion and uncertainty into our constitutional amendment. It is an invitation to raise questions of construction, and it will be followed, in my humble judgment, and as I fear, with an unending train of disputations in courts of justice and elsewhere, and there is no possibility of foreseeing what in the end will be the decision of the Supreme Court as to the meaning of the language "or in any way abridged." To me it is incomprehensible. I felt it a duty due to myself thus to express my objections to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan proposes two amendments to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Oregon. The first amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out in the fourth line of the amendment, after the word "taxed" the words—

But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof—

And to insert in lieu thereof:

But whenever the right to vote at any election held under the constitution and laws of any State for members of the most numerous branch of its Legislature.

So that the amendment, if amended, will read:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But whenever the right to vote at any election held under the constitution and laws of any State for members of the most numerous branch of its Legislature is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, &c.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is not my purpose to delay the vote but a moment. I have desired to accommodate the Senator who wishes to leave, and shall not be in the way of that result, but it is my duty to call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to the language of the first section. He says that the word "abridged" as found in the second section in its connection with the right of suffrage, is of such uncertain meaning that it ought not to be used in the Constitution; that it would carry cases into the courts; and therefore the word ought not to be used. Now, I find the same word used in the first section of this article, and in a very important connection, if possible in a more important connection than that in which it is found in the second section:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.

If the chairman—I was going to say the chairman of the caucus, but I will not say that—if the distinguished Senator who has this measure now in charge says to the Senate that the word "abridged," in its connection with the right of suffrage, is of such uncertain meaning that it should not be used in the Constitution in that connection, is it proper that that word shall be used in the first section in relation to the rights and privileges and immunities of citizens?

Mr. HOWARD. I think so, undoubtedly; because it is easy to apply the term "abridged" to the privileges and immunities of citizens, which necessarily include within themselves a great number of particulars. They are not a unit, an indivisible unit, like the right to vote.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to make the inquiry again, how the abridgment or the extent of the abridgment is to be determined in the several States where it is abridged for non-payment of taxes, or abridged for non-residence and all that kind of thing.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The language of the first section would be identical with the second if it were "denied or abridged." Now the Senator says he cannot understand what it means when we speak of "abridging" the right of suffrage. Then I ask what it means when we speak of "abridging" the rights and immunities of citizenship. It is a little difficult to say, and I have not heard any Senator accurately define, what are the rights and immunities of citizenship; and I do not know that any statesman has very accurately defined them; but even in reference to that, which of itself is not very certain but to some extent vague, a word is now used, as the Senator says, of uncertain legal meaning. He is willing that we shall say "abridge" the rights and immunities of citizens, but not willing that we shall use the word "abridge" the right of suffrage. Of course, the abridgment of the right of suffrage does not apply to the particular individual when he comes to cast his vote, that he shall cast a part of a vote. It does not mean that. It must relate to the class that shall enjoy it. An abridgment of the right of suffrage must relate to the class to which it applies or extends.

Mr. President, my purpose in calling attention to this is to say that this proceeding by the amendment of the Constitution is not so safe as it ought to be. What have we witnessed within the last two days? The measure first came from the committee of fifteen, where it was considered for long sessions of the committee, and brought before us, as it was claimed, in a very perfect state. A little discussion showed that it would not stand the test. Senators were opposed to this and that of the different propositions. Then it went to a peculiar assembly, and was considered there. It comes back, and even the Senator who brings in the report is now dissatisfied. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] yesterday admitted that he was dissatisfied; that it was not what he desired. The Senator from Illinois, [Mr. YATES,] so very able and eloquent to-day, says it is not what it ought to be; and I desire to say, in explanation, that the criticism that I made yesterday on the position of the Senator from Ohio does not apply to the Senator from Illinois. The Senator from Illinois did not understand the logical force of the point which I made. I did not say that when a proposition is before a body, if an amendment is offered to that proposition, and you lose your amendment, therefore you must necessarily vote against the original proposition because you cannot get the best that you think might be done. My point upon the Senator from Ohio was this, that the original proposition being here, and an amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, the Senator from Ohio said in his place that the amendment was the better of the two propositions, but he was going to vote against an amendment which was better than the original proposition. That is the very reverse of the position occupied by the Senator from Illinois. I acknowledge that the position of the Senator from Illinois is a very correct one. I do not choose to vote against a measure simply because an amendment which I think would improve it is defeated, if the original measure commands my judgment.

Now, sir, this measure, which I believe can accomplish no good for the country, is condemned in part by the Senator from Ohio, in part by the Senator from Illinois, in part by the Senator who now proposes an amendment; but all three of these Senators say they will vote for it, not that it is right, but that it is the best they can get under the circumstances. I do not expect the judgment of each man to be perfectly satisfied with every proposition; but, sir, the Constitution ought not to be amended for the purpose of making a platform for a political campaign. The Constitution of the country ought to be amended that it shall be the permanent fundamental law of the country. The embarrassment here is, not that it is difficult to define such general propositions as ought to find their way into the Constitution, but the difficulty in the phraseology here is to include this, and to exclude that, to leave general propositions, to leave a principle, and to fix up a thing for a particular purpose. When the Senator from Michigan says that the southern negroes ought not to be counted if they are regarded as unfit to be voters, I understand that proposition; but when he turns around and says that the people of Missouri, who are decreed by the rest of the people of that State as unfit to be voters, shall be represented, I do not understand such a proposition; and where you undertake to express opposite thoughts in the same sentence you find difficulty of phraseology. If you will say in plain words that nobody shall be represented in Congress who is not recognized by the State as a voter, I understand it; but when you say that a man in the State of Georgia shall not be represented because the people of Georgia count him unfit to be a voter, and in the State of Missouri, a man, who is counted as unfit to be a voter, shall be represented there, I do not understand the principle. When you have to fix up a Constitution to include some things and exclude others, for partisan purposes, you do find difficulties of phraseology. It cannot be made easy. The difficulty is in the thought, not in the use of the English language; and that is the very difficulty that we have in this case. How do you want to "abridge" the right of suffrage? What is meant by it? What is meant by "abridging" the rights and immunities of citizens? We do not know, the Senator from Michigan says. Why shall we allow representation to a non-voter in one State, and disallow it in another, upon principle? You say that the negro in Georgia, because he is not allowed to be a voter by the people of Georgia, shall not be represented, and you say that the criminals, because they are criminals, in Missouri, excluded from the right of voting, shall be represented. Where is the principle and the right of it?

Sir, this thing will be discussed before the people. Although it is clothed in doubtful sentences, it will come to be understood. I believe the people of this country are just; and I do not think the people of this country will say that the voter in Missouri ought to represent two men, when the voter in another State is denied that. But, sir, my purpose was simply to suggest to the distinguished Senator from Michigan that the same doubtful word was used in the first section that he objects to in the second.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that the question may be divided, so that the vote on striking out the words "or in any way abridged" may be taken separately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is a separate amendment. The question now is on the first amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the second amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan to the amendment made by the Senator from Oregon, which is in line eight of the amendment to strike out the words "or in any way abridge."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I now move the amendment which I have heretofore offered striking out the fourth and fifth sections of the resolution and inserting a substitute; and I desire to modify the substitute by striking out the word "forever," in the last line, which does not add anything to its force.

The Secretary read the proposed substitute for the fourth and fifth sections, as follows:

SEC. — The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not understand that this changes at all the effect of the fourth and fifth sections. The result is the same.

Mr. CLARK. The result is the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to insert in the first section, by general consent, after the word "born," the words "or naturalized;" so that the clause will read:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

Mr. HOWARD. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I now offer the amendment which I gave notice of, the effect of which is to submit these several sections as so many separate articles, any one of which may be adopted or rejected by the States. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause of the resolution and to insert the following:

That the following articles be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as amendments to the Constitution of the United States, which, or either of which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE — All persons born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

ARTICLE — Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within the Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But whenever, in any State, the elective franchise shall be denied to any portion of its male inhabitants, being citizens of the United States, not less than twenty-one years of age, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation in such State shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age in such State.

ARTICLE — No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two thirds of each House, remove such disability.

ARTICLE — The obligations of the United States, incurred in suppressing insurrection, or in defense of the Union, or for payment of bounties or pensions incident thereto, shall remain inviolate.

ARTICLE — Neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim on account of the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims, shall be forever held illegal and void.

ARTICLE — The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of these articles.

I shall not make any speech on this subject. I simply state the fact that this is in accordance with the precedents. The first amendments to the Constitution submitted to the States were twelve in number, and they were submitted as separate articles. Ten of them were adopted; two of them were rejected by the States. All the other amendments that have ever been submitted have been submitted as separate articles.

Mr. JOHNSON. And the language was the same, "or either of them."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have not the acts before me, but that is so. The reason is obvious. In all legislation a single member has the right to demand a vote on every single proposition; and as these distinct propositions are to be submitted to the Legislatures of the several States, they ought to be submitted in such a way that they may ratify or reject either of the propositions. Now, they are entirely distinct from each other; the first defining citizenship; the second on the subject of representation; the third in relation to disfranchisement; and, as amended, the fourth and fifth sections are combined in one, having reference to the public debt and the rebel debt. They are all distinct, independent propositions. They ought not to be submitted in such a way that they must all be accepted or all rejected by the States, but the States should be permitted to act upon each of them separately. I will not take up the time of the Senate in discussion, because I know the desire is to vote.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The amendment submitted a year ago was in two sections; so that this is not without precedent.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The last section was simply to enforce the first.

Mr. JOHNSON. They were not disconnected at all.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I merely mention this to correct the statement of the Senator.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It was substantially the same, and gave no other power but to enforce the first; that is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. JOHNSON. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 11, nays 88; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Norton, Riddle, Salisbury, and Van Winkle—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Cresswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Wiley, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—88.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Dixon, Nesmith, and Wright—5.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to move an amendment to the third section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the third section being an amendment agreed to in committee, it is not in order to amend it now, but it will be in order when the joint resolution shall be reported to the Senate.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is now open to further amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I now move to amend the third section, in line thirty-three, by striking out the words "or under any State," and in lines thirty-five and thirty-six by striking out the words "or as a member of any State Legislature or as an executive or judicial officer of any State;" so that it will read:

Sec. 3. That no person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress or as an officer of the United States, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a vote of two thirds of each House remove such disability.

I have barely a word to say in explanation of this amendment. This section operates upon all officers, both of the United States and of the States, who took an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and it excludes them from office in the future, as well in the States as in the United States. The object of my amendment is simply to limit the effect of the violation of the Constitution to cases where the officer who took the oath was a United States officer, to exclude the ineligibility from State officers, and to restrict it entirely to Federal officers.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I have another amendment to offer. It is to insert at the end of section four:

But the obligation of the United States to pay for private property taken for public use in all cases shall remain inviolate.

I will explain this amendment in a word. Section four reads as follows:

The obligations of the United States incurred in suppressing insurrection, or in defense of the Union, or for payment of bounties or pensions incident thereto, shall remain inviolate.

Mr. HENDERSON. That has been stricken out.

Mr. CLARK. But it has been inserted again in another form.

Mr. DAVIS. The effect of my amendment is simply to insert a provision that the obligation of the United States for the payment of private property taken for public use shall also remain inviolate.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I have one more amendment and then I have done. I send it to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the amendment that the Senator proposes is to a part that has been stricken out, and does not apply and cannot be made to apply to the text as it now stands, and therefore is not in order.

Mr. DAVIS. I will inquire if there is not inserted in lieu of that which is stricken out something to the same effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Something to the same effect has been inserted, and the amendment can be made to apply to that.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was in section four, line three, after the word "bounties," to insert the following words:

Including bounties promised to the owners of slaves enlisted into the military service of the United States by the act of Congress of February 20, 1864.

Mr. CLARK. That amendment is in order.

Mr. DAVIS. I have but a word to say on the amendment. The Congress of the United States passed an act which I have before me, but which I will not read, in which they pledged the payment of certain bounties to the loyal owners of slaves that might be enlisted into the armies of the United States either from volunteering or by being drafted. I merely propose a guarantee in this clause for the payment of those bounties.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. The question will be taken on all the amendments collectively unless some Senator desires a separate vote. ["Altogether."] Mr. HOWARD. I wish to reserve the amendment to the second section for a separate vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be reserved.

Mr. JOHNSON. There are two or three of these sections that I should be willing to vote for, but I cannot vote for the whole. I think, therefore, we had better take the vote separately.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better take the vote on the sections separately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator ask for a separate vote on all the amendments?

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that each section be read, and that the vote be taken on them separately.

Mr. GRIMES. That cannot be done, as I understand. They are all embodied in one resolution. The idea suggested by the Senator from Ohio is substantially the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin, which was voted down. I know that his proposition was to submit these sections as articles to the States separately; but all these propositions are before us in one joint resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. Each section has been amended, and as a matter of course we can act on them separately.

Mr. GRIMES. You can act on the amendments separately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, and the question must be taken on each amendment separately if called for by any Senator. The first amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the first amendment, which was to insert at the beginning of the first section the following words:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

Mr. McDUGALL. I move that the resolution under consideration be postponed until Tuesday next at one o'clock.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It was agreed yesterday that we should take the vote to-day.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope it will not be postponed. It was understood that we should come to a final vote to-day.

Mr. McDUGALL. In making the motion, I wish to give the reason why I make it. This business of amending the Constitution should be carefully done; and about many of these provisions I am myself still in great doubt, though I have looked at them as carefully as I could. I do not think we should hasten constitutional amendments. It takes a great deal of hard work to get out foundation stones, and now we are undertaking to lay foundation stones. I say the measure had better be manipulated a little more than it has been, so that we may know that we do exactly right whether we affirm or disaffirm the proposition.

Several SENATORS. Let us vote.

Mr. McDUGALL. I am not disposed to vote upon it at all. Of course I can be subjected to the power of a majority as organized in caucus; but I must say it is the first time in the history of this Republic that legislative matters and great constitutional questions were settled in party caucus. That has transpired for the first time in our history during the recent war and during the past and present Administrations. It deprives men of the right of counsel. Those who have the violence and strength of the majority can exert it; but I have a right to be heard upon all these questions. There is no party organization that has the right, under our system of government, to so organize themselves that they shall supersede the system under which our Government was established, and when they do it it is an act of tyrannous power. It is glorious to have a giant's power, but tyrannous to use it like a giant.

The motion to postpone was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole to the first section of the proposed article.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am decidedly in favor of the first part of the section which defines what citizenship shall be, and in favor of that part of the section which denies to a State the right to deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, but I think it is quite objectionable to provide that "no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States," simply because I do not understand what will be the effect of that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have agreed to that.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand not.

Mr. CLARK. We have concurred in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole to the first section.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is all. You have not agreed to the words to which I now object. I move, therefore, to amend the section as it now stands by striking out the words "make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State;" so as to make it read:

No State shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Mr. CONNESS. Have all the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole been voted upon?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have not been.

Mr. CONNESS. Are they not first in order?

Mr. CLARK. Oh, we may as well vote on this amendment now as it is moved; it saves time.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was to strike out the second section and insert a substitute for it, which will be read.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The will of the Senate in regard to these amendments has been so emphatically expressed that I think we may as well take the vote on all of them without reading them. We all know what they are.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Michigan called for a separate vote.

Mr. HOWARD. Only upon this amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then upon the others let us have one vote and be done with them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The question now is on striking out the second section and inserting another. Let us have the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GRIMES. Is the question on concurring in the amendment or striking it out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On concurring in the amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The question is on striking out the second section and inserting that amendment instead of it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We made the amendment in committee. Now the question is on concurring in it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Very well, but concurring in that strikes out the second section and puts in another section in place of it. Those who are in favor of striking out the second section as it was printed and inserting what was offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] will say "ay," and those who are in favor of adhering to the section as it is printed will say "no."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 31, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Cragin, Creswell, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Guthrie, Hendricks, Howard, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Saulsbury, Sprague, Trumbull, Wade, and Yates—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Davis, Dixon, Nesmith, Riddle, and Wright—7.

So the amendment to the second section was concurred in.

Several SENATORS. Now let us vote on all the other amendments together.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If such be the pleasure of the Senate, the question will be taken collectively on all the other amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON. I hope not. I want a separate vote on the third section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the next section.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not understand this. Can this resolution be adopted by voting on sections separately?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is now concurring in amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. No amendment was made to the third section.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is what I want to understand. I understand that there is no amendment from the Committee of the Whole to the third section.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, we struck out the third section as reported and inserted a substitute for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole to the third section.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. The third section was the original section that came from the House disfranchising the southern people from voting. That has been stricken out.

Mr. HOWARD. The question is on concurring in the amendment we made to the third section.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was to strike out the third section which came from the House and insert another.

The question was taken by yeas and nays, with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Cragin, Creswell, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—42.

NAY—Mr. Johnson—1.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Dixon, Nesmith, Riddle, and Wright—6.

Mr. HENDRICKS, (before the result was announced.) I think the vote just taken is not correctly understood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No discussion is in order; the vote has not been announced.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not going into any discussion, but I have a right to ask of the Chair the precise question in time to let any gentleman change his vote if he desires to do so. The motion was not originally to strike out the third section as it came from the House and to insert another. They were separate motions. Then ought there not to be two votes upon this section now?

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose any Senator can call for a division.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There is no need to call for a division because there were two distinct motions. There was first a motion to strike out and afterward a motion to insert something else. Now, the precise question before the Senate is whether the third section as it came from the House shall be stricken out, and then there will be another question not yet voted upon by the Senate, whether we shall insert the third section which was agreed to as in Committee of the Whole. That is the way it stands.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President—

Mr. CONNESS. I object to discussion at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The discussion is not in order; the vote has not been announced.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not about to discuss the question. The Senator from California need not suppose that I propose to occupy the time of the Senate unnecessarily. I proposed to strike out the original third section as it came from the House.

Mr. CONNESS. I rise to a question of order. It is not in order to discuss a question after the call of the roll has been commenced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The result of the vote has not been announced, but the roll has been called.

Mr. JOHNSON. If I am not in order I will take my seat; but it is barely possible that the Senator from California may not be in order.

Mr. CONNESS. I am quite aware of that; but I believe I have a right to raise the question of order.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not object to that.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well; then let the Chair decide.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No discussion is in order until after the vote is announced; but, by common consent, Senators may be allowed to explain their own votes, but no extended remarks can be allowed.

Mr. CONNESS. There is no right to explain a vote.

Mr. JOHNSON. I moved to strike out the third section as it came from the other House. That motion was carried, and afterward what now appears upon the face of the resolution as the third section was proposed and adopted as a separate amendment. I voted just this moment to strike out what was adopted. The effect of that would have been to restore the original third section, perhaps, but I meant when that was done to move to strike out the third section so as to leave no such section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this question—

Mr. HENDRICKS. What question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question was on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, which was to strike out the third section and insert other words in lieu of it. The result of that vote is 42 in the affirmative and 1 in the negative. So the amendment is concurred in. The Secretary will read the next amendment.

The Secretary read the next amendment, which was to strike out the fourth and fifth sections, and to insert the following section in lieu of them:

Sec. —. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void.

The amendment was concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time. The joint resolution was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This joint resolution having been read three times, the question is on its passage.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Several SENATORS. The yeas and nays must be taken, of course.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 33, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Van Winkle—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Dixon, Nesmith, and Wright—5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is passed, having received the votes of two thirds of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day, it be to meet on Monday next. The motion was agreed to.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

Mr. MORGAN. I submit the following report from the committee of conference on the fortification bill, and I move that the Senate concur in the report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 255) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending June 30, 1867, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to said bill and agree to the same.

E. D. MORGAN,

L. M. MORRILL,

W. SAULSBURY,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

H. J. RAYMOND,

W. E. NIBLACK,

S. PERHAM,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 15) authorizing documentary evidence of title to be furnished to the owners of certain lands in the city of St. Louis; and

A bill (H. R. No. 281) to amend the postal laws.

REPORT FROM A COMMITTEE.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of George W. Tarlton, praying for the restoration of his property confiscated under proceedings instituted in the United States district court for the northern district of New York, submitted a written report and asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject. The committee was discharged and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 8, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MUTILATED NOTES OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia, by unanimous consent submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law, either by the establishment of a Bureau of Redemption in connection with the Treasury Department, or such other mode as may be deemed most advisable, for the redemption of the worn-out, mutilated, altered, or disfigured bank notes issued under the national currency act, so as to obviate the necessity of sending such notes to each particular bank of issue for redemption; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MONUMENT TO LIEUTENANT GENERAL SCOTT.

Mr. HALE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the erection of a monument at West Point to the memory of Lieutenant General Winfield Scott, and to report by bill or otherwise.

RICHARD L. LAW.

On motion of Mr. NIBLACK, Senate joint resolution No. 100, for the restoration of Lieutenant Commander Richard L. Law, of the United States Navy, to the active list from the reserved list, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

DIVORCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WELKER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill regulating divorce in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

MRS. ANNA G. GASTON.

Mr. TAYLOR, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back Senate bill No. 261, for the relief of Mrs. Anna G. Gaston, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Anna G. Gaston, of the city of Washington, widow of Albert G. Gaston, deceased, late a lieutenant in the sixteenth regiment of Virginia volunteers, from the date of the discharge of her said husband from the military service of the United States, on account of disability arising from disease contracted in the said service, until the date of his death, namely, from the 5th day of May, 1863, to the 7th day of February, 1865, and to cause to be paid to the said Mrs. Anna G. Gaston a pension at the rate of seventeen dollars per month for the said term, without prejudice to the pension heretofore allowed her by the Commissioner of Pensions.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. TAYLOR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HUMBOLDT CANAL COMPANY.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back Senate bill No. 140, to grant the right of way to the Humboldt Canal Company through the public lands of the United States, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that the right of way for a canal through the public lands of the United States lying in Humboldt county, State of Nevada, and the use of the land for tow-paths, cuttings, and embankments, to the extent of fifty feet on each side of the center of the canal, shall be, and is hereby, granted to the Humboldt Canal Company; provided that in cases where deep excavation or heavy embankment is required, such greater width, not exceeding two hundred feet, may be taken by said company as may be necessary; that in order to create a reservoir for said company sufficient to feed said canal, in all seasons, said company shall be, and is hereby, authorized, by a dam across the Humboldt river, at such point at or near the gap in the Frémont range of mountains through which said river passes, to flow so much of the public lands above said dam as may be required for the purposes of said reservoir; and that there shall be, and is hereby, granted to said company the necessary sites along said canal for waste gates, mill sites, depots, and other uses of said canal, so far as places convenient for the same fall upon the public lands, and also the privilege of discharging the waste waters of said canal over any public lands, into the said Humboldt river, at such places as may be suitable for that purpose; provided that the proper officers of said company shall transmit to the Commissioner of the General Land Office a correct plot of the survey and location of said canal, and of the sites needed for mills, depots, waste gates, and other uses of said canal, before the appropriation thereof for said uses shall become operative: and provided further, that unless thirty miles of said canal shall be excavated within one year, the whole within three years, from date hereof, the grants hereby made shall cease and determine; and provided further, that if said canal shall at any time after its completion be discontinued or abandoned by said company, the grants hereby made shall cease and determine, and the lands hereby granted shall revert to the United States; and provided further, that nothing in this act shall be so construed as to interfere with any grant of the right of way and of public lands heretofore made to any railroad company.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the fact that this bill secures exclusive right to this company of fifty feet on either side of this canal, so that parties who may hereafter purchase public lands of the United States will be excluded from this strip on each side of this ditch.

Mr. JULIAN. It was deemed necessary for the right of way. It has been carefully considered by the committees of the Senate and of this House, and they are both satisfied with it.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. But this concerns the people who may settle there. A man who locates a quarter section through which this canal passes will be excluded from fifty feet on each side of this ditch. I think there should be a provision to correct this.

Mr. BIDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I can obviate the objections raised by the gentleman from Ohio, by stating that the land through which this canal will pass is generally of a very barren and worthless character. I have some knowledge of that region from personal observation, having been there, and I can say that very little of the land will ever be settled upon, and especially if this canal and enterprises of this kind should fail to be carried out, in order to develop the mines and thereby create a market for agricultural products.

The space of one hundred feet in width for a canal is a small consideration in comparison with the enhanced value of the land by reason of the canal; and settlers on the public lands in such a distant and desolate region can well afford to have their quarter sections diminished by the breadth of a canal which will double the value of the remainder.

Mr. JULIAN. This right of way is deemed important, and this grant is necessary to make it enjoyable. I can see no objection to the bill, and demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POSTAL LAWS.

Mr. ALLEY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back the amendments of the Senate, merely verbal, to House bill No. 281, to amend the postal laws, with the recommendation that they be concurred in.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. ALLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. THAYER. I call for the regular order. The SPEAKER stated as the first business in order the unfinished business of last evening, being the motion to reconsider the concurrent resolution for the final adjournment of Congress, the pending question being the motion to reconsider the vote by which it was adopted.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on Thursday, the 28th of June instant, at twelve o'clock m.

The question being taken on the motion to reconsider, there were—ayes 52, noes 42.

Mr. ROGERS and Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. ANCONA demanded tellers on calling the yeas and nays.

Tellers were refused.

So the vote by which the resolution was passed was reconsidered, and the question recurred on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move to refer the resolution to the Committee of Ways and Means. That committee are better qualified to judge when this House should pass a resolution to adjourn than any single member of this House, much less a member of the Opposition. It will be time enough when this House gets through with its legitimate business to have a resolution of this kind introduced. Therefore I move its reference to that committee, and on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion to lay the resolution on the table was not agreed to.

The question recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question on the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee of Ways and Means, and it was seconded.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is it in order to move to refer the resolution to the committee on reconstruction?

The SPEAKER. It would be if the previous question were not seconded.

The main question was then ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to refer was agreed to—ayes sixty-five, noes not counted.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BOUNTY LAW.

Mr. BLAINE, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs a joint resolution declaratory of the law of bounty.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That where any enlisted man has been or may be detailed for duty as a clerk, or for any other duty, in any executive bureau, at headquarters or elsewhere, he shall not by such detail be deprived of any rights to bounty now due or hereafter to become due, but shall be as fully entitled thereto as though no such detail had been made.

Mr. BLAINE. The object of this resolution is to get over a difficulty in the auditing of certain claims for bounty where men have been detailed by superior officers, or by their own volition, as clerks, and are still held as enlisted men liable to court-martial. They have been deprived of bounty, and this resolution is merely declaratory of the law, placing them where they stand according to law. I hope the resolution may be put upon its passage now.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, and ordered to be engrossed; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. BLAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HEIRS OF WILLIAM CRAWFORD.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the heirs of William Crawford for a pension; and the same was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

MORGAN RAID.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of a resolution relative to the claim of Ohio and Indiana for property seized by the rebel Morgan; and the same was referred to the committee on war debts of loyal States.

EQUESTRIAN PORTRAIT OF GENERAL SCOTT.

Mr. DAVIS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That the Joint Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of purchasing from the owner thereof the equestrian portrait of the late Lieutenant General Winfield Scott, which now adorns the walls of the Capitol, and to take such action as they shall deem proper.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

An act (H. R. No. 654) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866.

COURTS OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. PHELPS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to enlarge the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court of the District of Columbia in chancery; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HORSES AND HORSE EQUIPMENTS.

Mr. GRINNELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill amendatory to the law relating to the loss of horses and horse equipments in the service of the United States; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRINTING OF A REPORT.

Mr. LAFLIN submitted, from the Committee on Printing, the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That five thousand extra copies of the last Report of the Smithsonian Institution be printed. Two thousand for the use of the Institution and three thousand for the use of the members of this House.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF THE PENSION LAW.

Mr. CULLOM, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending section five of the act to grant pensions as to allow the issuance of pensions to date from the discharge of the soldier or sailor when the application is made within two years of the date of such discharge.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. W. J. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bill of the House No. 654, making appropriations for the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the session of to-morrow be devoted exclusively to debate upon the President's annual message as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL BUREAU OF EDUCATION.

Mr. BEAMAN. I now demand the regular order of business.

The House resumed the regular order of business, being the bill (H. R. No. 276) reported from the select committee on education, to establish a national Bureau of Education; upon which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MOULTON] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. MOULTON. Mr. Speaker, some four weeks or more ago this bill was reported from the select committee on a national Bureau of Education, and printed and laid upon our tables. I regret to say that, so far as I can understand, it has not been examined by the members of the House. It is of great national importance at this time. I am satisfied that if the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] who spoke against this bill, had examined its scope and what it proposes to accomplish, he would not have made the observations that he did; for, so far as I have observed his course here, he has been kindly disposed toward all measures for the general interests of the country.

Now, sir, what is the scope and object of this bill? What does it propose to do? It is simply a measure for the benefit of universal education. It proposes to establish a Bureau of Education here that shall have a general supervisory power for the purpose of collecting statistics, of showing the advantage of each system, of collecting facts, and collating and bringing them together as we find them in the different States and foreign countries. There is no complication about the bill. It is exceedingly simple. It simply provides that there shall be appointed a head of this department, with the necessary number of clerks, and that the Superintendent of Public Buildings shall provide him perhaps two rooms. And here let me answer the question of the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] that the entire cost of this proposed department will not exceed ten or fifteen thousand dollars per year.

Now, how is this bureau to be established and organized? In the first place, it is to be created by the passage of this bill; in the second place, the appointment of the head of this bureau is to be by the President of the United States, who represents the entire people, by and with the advice and consent of Senators, who represent the respective States. The head of this bureau should be a man of national character; of the most enlarged capacity; a man of culture, science, and experience. And I assume that the President, in the discharge of the delicate duty that will be devolved on him by the passage of this bill, will appoint the man best fitted to carry out the object and purpose of this bill.

Now, let me call your attention to another important fact in this connection. If this bill has been thrust upon this House without anybody asking for its passage, without anybody desiring its passage; if there is no necessity and no want in the country that requires it, of course it should not be passed. Now, how has this subject been brought to the attention of this Congress? By the leading educational men all over the United States, from Maine to Georgia, for the South has been heard in this matter.

In last January or February the leading educational men of this great Republic met here in this city of Washington, and after a long and careful conference, and a full discussion and hearing upon all sides, they came to the conclusion that a department of this kind was absolutely necessary for the benefit of the whole country and the promotion of the educational interests of the country. That convention was composed of such men as Hon. Newton Bateman of Illinois, White of Ohio, and Adams of Vermont, and other representative men, who stand at the head of the educational interests of their own States—men who have devoted more than thirty years of their lives to the discussion and consideration of educational subjects. These men were entirely disinterested, remarkably so, if the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] is correct in his objection to this measure, that it will do away with the State systems of education. The very men who recommend this measure are the men who inaugurated the existing systems of education in their own States, and are at the head of those systems at the present time. As they readily perceive, one of the great objects of the establishment of this bureau is that whatever advantages there are in a particular system may be pointed out by it, and the mischievous errors, whatever they may be, may be corrected. This might change particular systems, and improve them, and this is the very object of the bill.

Allow me to make another statement in reference to the character of the men who are demanding the passage of this law at this time. This national convention of educational men appointed three of their most eminent members to memorialize Congress in regard to this matter. And I will say that the men thus selected were eminently qualified for that purpose. One was Hon. Newton Bateman, of the State of Illinois, who has been identified with the system of education there for years, and has given it complexion and consistency, and has by his energy and ability established one of the finest school systems in the world. Another was Professor White, of Ohio, a man of the most enlarged capacity, who is at the head of the common-school system of that great State. Another was Professor Adams, of Vermont, a man who from his eminent ability and services in that direction is entitled to have his opinions upon questions of this kind regarded as of great weight. Now, those are the eminent men who came up here and presented their memorial to Congress with this simple bill for the purpose of inaugurating this machinery for the purpose of supplying a want that has been felt in this country for more than thirty years.

Now, one of the objections which was urged against this bill by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] was that it was a new thing; that this is an innovation. Permit me to say to members of this House that this is no new thought. This great question has been discussed by the educational men of this country and its necessity has been felt for many years. Any one who has been familiar with the educational journals and educational conventions of our country knows that this very question has been one of the most prominent topics of discussion—the want of an authoritative head here at the seat of Government. Besides, we have the example of nearly all European Governments in this regard. I will simply allude to France, Prussia, and Great Britain, who have set us an example in this regard. Therefore the charge that this is a new thing, and has its origin in the chimeras of to-day, is in fact not true.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the true, genuine spirit of our institutions? Upon what are they founded? The two great pillars of our American Republic, upon which it rests, are universal liberty and universal education. We have established universal liberty through a bloody conflict, through four years of carnage and war, and Congress by the passage of the civil rights bill has provided the machinery by which universal liberty can be enforced and guaranteed, and the citizen everywhere protected. One of these pillars, then, rests upon a solid and firm foundation. The other pillar is universal education. In this republican Government it is admitted upon all hands, even by the gentleman from New Jersey, that the perpetuity of our institutions depends upon the intelligence of the people, and without that intelligence we can have no guarantee of the continuance of our republican form of government.

Now, sir, in order to make education universal, what do we want? What is the crying necessity of this nation to-day? Why, sir, we want a head. We want a pure fountain, from which a pure stream can be poured upon all the States. We want a controlling head by which the various conflicting systems in the different States can be harmonized, by which there can be uniformity, by which all mischievous errors that have crept in may be pointed out and eradicated. We want a head to this great system for the purpose of giving direction and vitalizing the whole educational interest of the country.

Now, sir, let us look at the practical results which we may reasonably expect from the adoption of this measure, for the remarks which I shall make will be directed entirely to the practical operation of this bill. If the measure is going to do no good, if it is to produce no beneficial results to the country, of course it ought not to pass. But if it will accomplish the objects we expect, then we think there is a necessity for it and that it ought to pass.

I have said that a part of the duties of the head of this bureau will be to compare the different educational systems, to collect the facts and statistics connected with them, and to point out the merits and advantages of each, and in a philosophical and popular way present these to the people generally. Let me illustrate the importance of this national system by a simple reference to the manner in which a similar system on a smaller scale has operated in the different States; and I think this consideration should be conclusive as to the importance of this measure. Take, for instance, my own State, of which I have a right to speak here. Her educational system up to 1853 was substantially, I may say, in chaos. We had really no educational system at all. There was no such thing as a common-school system there. The people had schools when they pleased; and when they did not, there were no schools. Everything was in confusion. Hence the immense amount of land which had been given by this Government to the State of Illinois for educational purposes was substantially dissipated.

That was the condition of the school system, if it may be called a school system, in the State of Illinois up to 1853. This resulted from the fact that there was no head to the system. There was no common center; no one to advise, direct, and suggest. In other words, there was no one to vitalize the system, to bring it directly before the people, and show them the proper path. In 1853, however, a free-school system was inaugurated in the State of Illinois. Under that system a superintendent of public instruction was appointed. Some of the most eminent men in the State of Illinois have filled that position. While I do not desire to disparage others, I may be permitted to mention that the free-school system of the State of Illinois has been for many years under the charge and control of Hon. Newton Bateman, whose name is appended to this memorial; and he has given that system vigor and vitality till to-day we present a free-school system of as high a character as can be found in the world. It has had a good practical effect by having a common head and center to control and direct the system.

Now, by the result of that, in nine or ten years in the State of Illinois, we have twelve thousand school districts established, with magnificent school-houses dotted all over the prairies, and every Monday morning when the clock strikes nine o'clock half a million of bright-eyed girls and boys are within the walls of the common schools of Illinois. That is the result of appointing a competent head to that system.

Now, that is only one State, a State of one hundred counties. What is the reason the result would not be similar if a competent head to discharge the duties be appointed at the seat of Government, one who will take general control in regard to the thirty-six States of this Union. I know of no reason why the results would not be the same. Naturally they would be the same.

Here are thirty-six States, all with different school systems. The people of the western States do not know what you are doing in the middle States. They do not know what is being done in the New England States. They have no means of knowing what are your school systems.

The very object of establishing a Bureau of Education is that these different systems may be brought together. We want all these school systems all over the land brought under one head, so that they may be nationalized, vitalized, and made uniform and harmonious as far as possible. But we are met on the threshold of this argument by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] who I am sure has not examined the subject, that we have no constitutional power to do this thing. Let us look at this for a moment. Let us see whether we have constitutional power. The Constitution provides that it shall be the duty of Congress to pass all laws which shall be necessary for the common good and welfare. Let us look at an example in this Government which my friend admits has existed ever since its foundation. Take an analogous instance. Take the Department of Agriculture. He says we cannot put our hands upon the specific provision of the Constitution for this bureau we propose to establish. You cannot put your hand upon the specific constitutional provision which gives you the power to appropriate thousands, at least half a million, of dollars a year for the purpose of keeping up the Department of Agriculture? Where is the power to do it? On what authority is it done? We say that it promotes the general welfare and the common good. It is part of the necessary machinery of this Government; and we say the same thing in reference to this Bureau of National Education. The bureau here proposed is not so limited in its operations as the Department of Agriculture.

I desire now to consider another proposition in this same connection, that it invades the system of the States. The same argument can be made in regard to the Department of Agriculture. No one ever dreamed that the Department of Agriculture was invading the rights of the States. Why? Every State in the Union has its own agricultural societies incorporated by the several Legislatures. Every county has its own agricultural society. The Department of Agriculture at the seat of Government here does not invade any rights of property in the States. What does it do? What we propose in this bill. It gives the result of experiments, it collects facts from California, from Maine, from all of the States, and all parts of the world, prepares those facts in popular form and presents them to the people. Here are two hundred and fifty Representatives of the people. What has been the greatest demand made on you? Has not the greatest demand from your constituents been for the Agricultural Report. The demand has been for agricultural information, seeds and plants, the results of experiments, &c.

The Department of Agriculture applies only to one class of men. The bureau we propose here applies to every man, woman, and child in the country.

Talk about this not having foundation in the Constitution! Upon what constitutional provision have you established the Interior Department? There is no specific power given. But it is a great and necessary part of the machinery of the Government. It promotes the general welfare. Our bureau does the same. If we decide that it is necessary to promote the general welfare, no other department of this Government can question our power.

It is said that this matter should be left to the States, or to individuals. Permit me to say in answer to this that the advantage of this bureau is this: we do not propose to invade State rights, to go into Massachusetts and say, you shall change your system and conform it to our views. We do not propose to go into Ohio or any other State, but we propose to correct whatever is wrong or mischievous in any of these State systems by pointing out and showing to them that their systems are wrong and what the better plan would be; just the same as the Bureau of Agriculture, by disseminating information all over the land, giving the results of experience, corrects errors in the method of the cultivation of lands, and promotes the interests of agriculture in the different States.

But now, Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to another fact. I want to say to the members of this House that this Government has a direct interest in the establishment of a Bureau of Education. I have already stated that the perpetuity of our institutions rests upon the intelligence of the people. Let me illustrate that by an example afforded by the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS.]

In reply to the statement of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY,] that the ignorance of the southern people had been one of the causes that led to the late rebellion, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] asserted that the rebellion had been inaugurated, not by the poorer classes, not by the ignorant people, but by the intelligent men, such as Davis, Slidell, and others. Now, that fact is true; but it does not disprove the truth of the statement of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY.]

Let us see how the matter stands. Grant that the rebellion was inaugurated by the intelligent classes of the South. Suppose that the poorer and more ignorant classes, the great mass of the people of the South, had been educated to the extent that the people of Ohio, New England, and the middle States are educated, do you imagine that the scoundrels, traitors, and demagogues of the South could have led such a people into rebellion? Why, sir, the same thing was actually attempted in some of the northern States, but the intelligence of the people repudiated all such appliances made by traitors in the North.

Now, one of the objects of this proposed Bureau of Education is to diffuse information and give vitality to dead systems wherever its operation is made necessary by the condition of things. And I repeat again, if the people in the southern States had been fairly educated, had had the means of obtaining information to the extent that the loyal people of the North had, a thousand Slidells, Davises, and Toombses could never have led them astray into rebellion.

In that view, then, I take the high ground that every child of this land is, by natural right, entitled to an education at the hands of somebody, and that this ought not to be left to the caprice of individuals or of States so far as we have any power to regulate it. At least, every child in the land should receive a sufficient education to qualify him to discharge all the duties that may devolve upon him as an American citizen.

This is as much a natural right as the right to breathe the air and to be provided with food and clothing. The Government, therefore, has an interest in establishing this bureau, because its tendency will be to shed light in the dark places by disseminating facts and statistics, vitalizing and influencing by persuasion rather than by authority.

There is another point of view in which this Government is interested in this measure. By the laws of Congress, as they now stand, statistics in regard to education have been collected from all over the country every ten years. Now there is a great mass of facts of various descriptions, statements of the number of children at school, how many can read and write, number of school-houses, and other important facts collected by the census-takers under the law of Congress. But what good does it do? None whatever; because there is no one here to take charge of those pregnant facts, those figures, when they are brought here by the census-takers. There is no bureau to collate and compare, to make deductions and suggestions, and propagate and disseminate the information in a proper form for the benefit of the people. Therefore it is an expenditure of money for the collection of those facts without any practical benefit, and in amount ten times more than it would take to pay the full expenses of this bureau. Let this bureau be established and take possession of all the facts and figures that come up and send forth the information in some popular form.

There is another fact which gives the Government a direct interest in this bill. Already the Government has given to the different States more than fifty million acres of the public lands for school purposes. All the new States have had their sixteenth section for their school, college, and seminary fund, and who of you here knows how it is disposed of? Where do you go to get any official information as to how this great and munificent gift to the people has been disposed of? Who can go to any Department here and find out one single fact other than that so much land has been given to Illinois, so much to Ohio, and so much to Indiana, and so on?

Well, now, fifty million acres of public lands have been given to the States for these purposes. It is made a part of the business of this bureau to collect all the facts connected with the subject, so that we may know what every State has done, whether the lands have been squandered and what rules have been adopted for the disposition of the same. If there has been a vicious system in any State in regard to the disposition of those lands, is it not important that that information should be given to the States in order that they may avoid the rocks upon which other States have dissipated and lost their lands? And here let me say that my State had such a donation, every sixteenth section, with which it parted mostly for the pitiful sum of $1 25 per acre, thus receiving but $800 per section for that land in each township, which to-day, or even many years ago, would have been sold for $8,000 per section instead of $800, thereby affording a perpetual fund to educate the children of the respective townships for all time to come; and upon these considerations I believe the Government has a direct interest in the establishment of a bureau whereby this kind of information may be obtained and disseminated, in order that the whole country, and particularly the State to be admitted, may profit by the good or bad example of the different States in regard to this matter.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will say but a word or two more. I think I have gone through the various features of this bill. It seems to me that there is nothing objectionable in it.

So far as the question of finance is concerned the bill provides for four clerks. If the number were limited to two, perhaps that number would be sufficient to start the bureau. Now, with a head of the bureau and two clerks, and with two rooms that may be assigned to the bureau in any one of the public buildings, the cost to the Government will not exceed $16,000; and it seems to me that the advantages to be derived from the establishment of a bureau of this character here at the seat of Government would more than compensate for the appropriation for a purpose of this character. I trust, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the members of this House will vote for this bill. I believe that it is required by the people. I believe that the necessities of the Government require it. Its passage has been urged by gentlemen who are better able to judge of its necessity than we are here. I am willing to take their judgment. Let this bill pass. Let us have a common center. Let us have a uniform and harmonious system of education if possible, and then let us popularize and vitalize that system, and all these desert places, all these dark places that now exist in the central and southern portion of the country, will have light shed upon them, and a good free-school system of education will shortly be established for the education of every child in this great land.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, early in this session, in December or January last, I presented to the House an elaborate memorial from the friends of education in the district I represent, asking for the passage of a bill similar to that which has been reported by the special committee on a national Bureau of Education. And did I not fear that the question might suffer from inadvertence on the part of some members of this House I would not trespass upon its attention for one moment. But I feel a deep interest in the success of this measure, as I think it most essential to the welfare of the country that it should become a law.

I listened with great attention to the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] the other day, who objected to the passage of this bill on the ground of the centralization of power in this city at the head of the Government. Did I think that objection well founded I would not urge upon members of this House to vote in its favor. I do not desire unnecessarily to concentrate the power of the country here, for I have as little desire for that as any member of this House, I am sure. But I think if the gentleman will look into the machinery of the bill he will see that it is entirely free from any well-grounded objections of that character.

In the first place this bill provides only for the appointment of a Commissioner, and, as the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. MOUTON] said, four clerks, the expenses of which will be only $13,000 a year. There is no dangerous centralization of power in this. This bureau will have no executive influence; it has no color of executive power either here upon Congress or in the States, and therefore it is not amenable to that objection.

Then what is this bureau to do? Simply to collect information; nothing more than that. It will be but an extension of the census of the people. It will be but a collection of information, not for the benefit of the Executive Departments, not directly for the benefit of the people of the States, but for the benefit of Congress alone; because the information to be collected by this bureau is to be transmitted to Congress, and the only action to which it can lead is the action of Congress. Therefore the bill in that regard is not amenable to the objection of centralization; if it were I would not press it. And I am sure that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] will see when he analyzes the measures and features of this bill they are not objectionable in that respect.

This bill is but temporary in its nature; it is not interwoven with the government of the country so far that it cannot be dispensed with at any moment. Every year an appropriation must be made for its continuance; and the failure of the appropriation will lead to the discontinuance of the bureau, without any effect whatever upon the administration of the country. And in that respect it is unobjectionable.

Now, sir, I ask the attention of the House for a moment to the importance of this measure at this time. I am reluctant to refer to my own experience, but I think the importance of the bill justifies it. I have passed the greater part of the time for the past four or five years in the insurgent States. I have seen much of the elements of life that control opinions in that part of this country, and I am sorry to say that I have formed very strong convictions as to what is necessary in the reconstruction of the Government and the restoration of that amity and comity of feeling which must exist between the people of the different States and the General Government in order to promote that Union we all so much desire.

I do not underestimate, I am sure, the importance of legislative measures, or constitutional amendments, or any action of Congress or the executive department of the Government in that respect; yet I think I am justified in saying that any or all of these measures are but initiatory; they do not complete the work of reform; they do not perform the duty of restoration. Those results must depend upon other elements of power, which may flow from but which are not embraced in the statutory or constitutional measures to which we have given so much consideration.

The true source of power to which we must look for the ultimate restoration of perfect peace, the restoration of the Government in a form as perfect as before the war, in a more perfect form, even, than it has before existed, is the education of the people. Of course I do not mean to say that we must wait until the people shall be educated. On the contrary we must begin immediately in this duty. But the completion of the work requires that education shall be considered as among the first and most important elements of this work. And could information be collected and spread before the country of the almost marvelous results of education in the last three or four years in the insurgent States upon that class of people who most need the attention and protection of the Government, I am sure the House with almost entire unanimity would give its approval to any measure tending to that end.

I believe, sir, and I wish to express my conviction as it really exists, that it is impossible so far to reform opinion, so far to change the basis of political society; as to secure a perfect restoration of the principles of our Government without giving efficiency to this fundamental element of social, of public, and of individual power. I trust, sir, that in this view alone, whether gentlemen of the House have made up their minds to pass this measure or not, they will give it serious consideration, as a measure equally important, if not more important in its final results, than any which may proceed from the committee on reconstruction, honorable and thorough and intelligent as that committee has been in the performance of its duties, and essentially necessary for the Government as are the measures which that committee has reported.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to close the debate; but I propose to yield for a short time to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE.]

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I rise to ask a question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] who has charge of this bill. I am a member of the committee that reported the bill, although I was not present at the meeting at which it was agreed to. I desire to have an opportunity to discuss the bill and the amendment which I have offered; and I wish to know whether that opportunity will be afforded me.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will give the gentleman a part of my time. I cannot feel it right that much more of the time of the House should be occupied in the discussion of this bill.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Surely a member of the committee should receive from the chairman of the committee the courtesy of being allowed an opportunity to discuss this measure.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania shall have as much time as I have. He will be under no greater restriction than myself. I now yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] for five minutes.

Mr. PIKE. Am I to be hedged in by the limitation of five minutes? I may possibly wish to occupy six minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON. I would like to be allowed eight or ten minutes for a few remarks on this bill.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I will yield to my colleague a part of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine is entitled to the floor for five minutes.

Mr. PIKE. By what authority am I limited to five minutes?

The SPEAKER. By the authority of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] who has charge of the bill, and who is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. PIKE. Three or four speeches of an hour each have been made in favor of this bill; no opposition, I believe, has been made to it. In the consideration of a bill like this, involving the Government in an expense of $50,000, or $100,000, or $200,000, it is strange that a member cannot be allowed more than five minutes to express his views in opposition to the measure.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman inform me how much time he will want?

Mr. PIKE. I may not want more than five minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, then, the gentleman can have five minutes.

Mr. PIKE. If I should want to occupy ten minutes, I should like to have that too.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to the provisions of this bill; in the first place to its machinery. The bill provides for a new department of this Government, following the language of the act establishing a Department of Agriculture, and I suppose following the eminent examples we have had in that department. We are to have a new department of the Government; and I am very sorry to see that the Commissioner of Agriculture is to be so far thrown into the shade as to have but three fifths of the salary that is provided for this new office. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] suggests that this new department should be attached to the Department of Agriculture. He may make that motion; and I will yield to him for that purpose, if I have any time remaining when I conclude.

Mr. Speaker, the proposition is to have a new department; and I am very happy to see that the bill provides very liberally for expenses. Of the several thousand officers at the other end of the avenue, there are, if I recollect aright, but two who now receive a salary of $5,000. One is the Treasurer of the United States, and the other the head of the banking department. The others mainly receive no more than the modest salary that we get for the performance of our duties here in Congress.

Five thousand dollars is to be the salary of the new officer. Then follow the body and the rest of the department, summing up some thirteen thousand dollars. Quarters are to be provided in a corresponding liberal scale by the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds. Whether a new building is to be erected we do not know. I understand all the present public offices are occupied. I understand that the Government, in addition, are hiring other buildings at great expense. Whether a new structure is to be erected, or a building is to be hired, I know not. But all accommodations are to be provided liberally.

I make no quarrel with this matter in detail; I only speak of the machinery which is provided by this most intelligent committee for the purpose of accomplishing this work.

Now, what is the work to be accomplished? The bill provides, in the first place, that the business of the bureau shall be to collect statistics. Whether it is to have original jurisdiction of these facts like the Census Bureau, and to send out its agents to gather them up and embody them; whether it is to collect new facts in relation to public schools, or whether they are to take the returns of the different States and analyze them, the bill does not indicate. The machinery would indicate that this department is to have original jurisdiction of these facts. They are to collect these facts. That is the first great business of the bureau.

Secondly, it is provided it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Education to present annually to Congress a report. Of what use is it to present that report and have it filed away here among the archives of Congress? Of course it will be of no use unless ordered to be printed. It will be no use to print it unless it is printed in large numbers and distributed throughout the country. The gentleman from Massachusetts says we will take care of it when it comes here. How will you take care of it? It will be printed in large numbers. We are not going to slight this new department of the Government. We are to have it distributed in like numbers with the agricultural report. Each one of those reports cost the Government $1 50. The chairman of the Committee on Printing [Mr. LARLIN] just now tells me that the agricultural report costs $200,000 annually, and that is outside of the monthly reports on cholera, hog disease, and various other items of intelligence. Following that eminent example we are to have unlimited expense in public printing.

The gentleman from New York, chairman of the Committee on Public Printing, told us the other day that the expense of public printing runs up to two millions a year. We have a printing office, the largest in the known world, consuming year by year, at least last year, one thirteenth of the whole value of printing paper of the country according to the census of 1860. I should think, therefore, that office is at present sufficiently engaged.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. PIKE. It is to gather statistics of the common schools of the country. Of course there is no need to go into the statistics of those who are studying the higher branches of mathematics. We do not want statistics of colleges in this country. I submit whether all this machinery for the collection of facts had not better be left to the States. I ask whether it is not better that the States of the Union should not be left to have something to do. We have bills to reorganize the railroad systems of the United States. We established railroad corporations in the ignorant State of Pennsylvania which did not know its own needs and wants. We have a serious proposition that all the telegraphic wires shall center here and shall be under the control of the Postmaster General. And here we have in addition a scheme of governmental control of all the common schools.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] says it is merely an initiatory measure. He means by that, I suppose, that this measure, which commences in criticism upon the public schools of the country, shall end in making direct appropriations for that purpose. I think he said something about the Government undertaking the education of all the freedmen of the country. If they would confine their efforts to that I should not be so much opposed as I am to this measure. But now we have the initiation of a system. At another time it will be more fully developed. The school-houses of the country will go under the control of the General Government. Churches, I suppose, are to follow next. So, taking the railroads, telegraphs, school-houses, and churches it would seem Congress would leave little to us but our local taxation and our local pauperism. If they would take them too I do not know as I would object.

But I submit in all seriousness that these matters of education had better be left to the States where they are much more economically managed and where they properly belong.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PIKE. Certainly.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I ask the gentleman how many people there are in Maine who can neither read nor write.

Mr. PIKE. About half as many, I believe, as there are in Connecticut. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. There are none in the State of Connecticut who cannot read or write except those who come from Maine and other foreign countries. [Laughter.]

Mr. PIKE. We educate our foreign population. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I would like to ask one question farther. Congress has been accustomed from time to time to donate large amounts of public land to Maine and other new States for purposes of education, and I would like very well to know what use has been made of those benevolent grants, especially by the State of Maine.

Mr. PIKE. I suppose the gentleman ought to be aware that the State of Maine has got nothing out of the Government for her public schools, either in the way of public lands or otherwise. So that we will not talk about that, but will talk seriously for a few moments about this bill.

College professors in this country do not get on an average more than $1,500 a year salary. I doubt if they get that. I am told that one of the wealthiest institutions in this country (Harvard) gives its president but $2,500 a year. These men are diligent. They attend to their business day by day. They are educating the youth of their localities. The State Legislatures are also engaged in this work. They have their common schools everywhere.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I will now yield a few minutes to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania.]

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Before commencing my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I desire to have the amendment which I propose to this bill read.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That there shall be established, by the Secretary of the Interior, a Bureau of Education for the purpose of collecting such statistics and facts as shall show the condition and progress of education in the several States and Territories, and of diffusing such information respecting the organization and management of schools and school systems and methods of teaching as shall aid the people of the United States in the establishment and maintenance of efficient school systems, and otherwise promote the cause of education throughout the country; and for this purpose he is hereby authorized to appoint two clerks, at a salary of $1,800 each per annum.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to present annually to Congress a report embodying the results of his investigations and labors, together with a statement of such facts and recommendations as will in his judgment subserve the purpose for which this department is established. In the first report made by the Secretary of the Interior under this act, there shall be presented a statement of the several grants of land made by Congress to promote education, and the manner in which these several trusts have been managed, the amount of funds arising therefrom, and the annual proceeds of the same, as far as the same can be determined.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. It is my object, as far as possible, to promote education; and if I thought any necessity whatever existed for the establishment of a new bureau in connection with the education of the youth of the country I should lean to that side more strongly than I do. But I conceive at this time, and under present circumstances, that there is no necessity whatever for the establishment of a Bureau of Education, to be controlled by the central power here. The systems of education throughout the country have been left to State authority. The raising of the revenue for educational purposes, the method of its expenditure, and the system of instruction have all been left entirely with the States.

Now, my amendment proposes to leave this question of statistics in reference to the State educational systems to the Secretary of the Interior, where it properly belongs, if it belongs to any Department of the Government. It is, as has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] a part of the system, or should be part of the system, of taking the census.

I have not relied solely upon my own judgment in regard to the subject. I have sought information from those who I believe are qualified by experience wisely to advise me how to act in reference to it as a member of the committee from which this bill is reported, and I now wish to read a portion of a letter I have received from a distinguished gentleman connected with education in this country, Mr. Frederick A. Packard, upon this subject. He says:

"It is nearly fifty years since I was actively concerned in the public school system of Massachusetts, and nearly forty since I came to reside in Philadelphia. My connection for several years with the direction of Girard College obliged me to look with some care into the schools and school-books of the country." * * * "You will perceive that I am not for the new scheme referred to your committee."

I have been associated with Mr. Packard and know him well, and I know that he would not pass his judgment except upon well-founded experience. His judgment upon this subject I will read:
